

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE RUSSIAN CIRCULAR—Questions, Observations,

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS—RESOLUTION—

Moved to resolve, "That direct legislative interference with the details of railway management tends rather to increase than diminish the danger of accident by dividing responsibility; that Parliament in dealing with regulations for the prevention of railway accidents has hitherto always recognized this principle; and that in any legislation which may from time to time become necessary on the subject, the necessity of maintaining the undivided responsibility of Railway Companies for the safe conduct of their traffic ought to be kept steadily in view,"—(Viscount Bury) .. 3

Amendment moved, to insert after the words ("the details of railway management") the words ("except so far as it relates to the systematic overwork of railway servants,")—(The Duke of Saint Albans.)

After debate, Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Then an Amendment moved—

To leave out all the words after the words ("dividing responsibility,") and to insert ("without, however, impairing the responsibility of railway companies for the safety of their traffic, it is expedient that further precautions should be taken for the prevention of accidents on railways by enforcing on railway companies by legislative enactment the adoption of those mechanical contrivances and recognised improvements, the value of which has been thoroughly ascertained. That the recommendations contained in the Report of the Royal Commission on Accidents on Railways are deserving of the fullest and most favourable consideration; and if they be adopted by Parliament, subject to such modifications and amendments as on further inquiry it may be proper to suggest, many causes of accident will be removed, and additional security will be afforded to all persons who have occasion to travel by railway, and to the servants of the railway companies,")—(The Lord Cottesloe.)

After a short debate, the said Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Provisional Orders (Ireland) Confirmation (Holywood, &c.) Bill—Presented (The Lord President); read 1st, and referred to the Examiners 29

"2. That, until such conduct shall have been essentially changed, and guarantees on behalf of the subject populations other than the promises or ostensible measures of the Porte shall have been provided, that Government will be deemed by this House to have lost all claim to receive either the material or the moral support of the British Crown."
"3. That, in the midst of the complications which exist and the war which has actually begun, this House earnestly desires the influence of the British Crown in the Councils of Europe to be employed with a view to the early and effectual development of local liberty and practical self-government in the disturbed Provinces of Turkey, by putting an end to the oppression which they now suffer, without the imposition upon them of any other Foreign Dominion."
"4. That, bearing in mind the wise and honourable policy of this Country in the Protocol of April 1826, and the Treaty of July 1827, with respect to Greece, this House furthermore earnestly desires that the influence of the British Crown may be addressed to promoting the concert of the European Powers in exacting from the Ottoman Porte, by their united authority, such changes in the Government of Turkey as they may deem to be necessary for the purposes of humanity and justice, for effectual defence against intrigue, and for the peace of the world."
"5. That an humble address, setting forth the prayer of this House according to the tenour of the foregoing Resolutions, be prepared and presented to Her Majesty," —(Mr. Gladstone .)

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE RUSSIAN CIRCULAR.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CAMPBELL: I wish to put a Question to my noble Friend the Secretary of State, of which I have given him private Notice. On Wednesday there appeared in the morning journals a Russian Circular, and in that document it is alleged that the Emperor of Russia represents the views and interests of Europe. As regards "interests," the assertion may be passed over—every aggressor and spoliator is in the habit of asserting that he was acting in the interests of the world. But the assertion in the Circular that the Czar represented the "views" of Europe involves the dignity and compromises the policy of every Power that does not distinctly repudiate it. I therefore wish to ask my noble Friend how far the assertion is correct as regards the views of Her Majesty's Government?

EARL GRANVILLE: It appears to me that the Question of the noble Lord is one that opens up considerable matter of debate, and I would therefore ask whether it is one which should be put without public Notice to your Lordships?

THE EARL OF DERBY: When my noble Friend gave me private Notice of the Question he was about to put it struck me that in point of form it was one of a somewhat unusual character; because my noble Friend does not ask what the Government has done, or what it is doing, or what it proposes to do, but asks whether it concurs in certain statements expressed in a document which has been addressed to us, and to all the European Powers by a foreign Government. It is obvious, as the noble Earl (Earl Granville) has observed, that this is a question which it is not easy to answer by a simple "Yes" or "No," and one which might lead to a very considerable debate. I think, therefore, that I shall best deal with the question of my noble Friend by saying this—that we are in no way bound by the expression of opinion issued by the Russian Government, and that, as a matter of fact, we do not accept or admit the arguments and conclusions embodied in that document.

RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.—RESOLUTION.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that in calling the attention of their Lordships to the Report of the Royal Commission on Railway Accidents and to move a Resolution, he felt that on this subject he was speaking to an assembly of experts, so large had been the share taken by their Lordships in railway legislation and in inquiries as to the working of railways. He had, however, brought forward his Motion in order that the matter might be fully and fairly discussed. The principle on which Parliament had hitherto acted was that they should exercise a general supervision over railways, but that it would be injudicious to interfere by legislation with the details of railway management. That principle had received the sanction of several Royal Commissions and Parliamentary Committees; and the Royal Commission, to the Report of which he was about to call attention, and which was appointed in 1874, having given a summary of what had been done by the Committee of 1857-8 and by the Committee of 1870, and of the results attained by the labours of those Committees and by several statutes, commenced the second part of its Report by laying down in broad and simple terms that it would be highly injudicious for Parliament to interfere with the details of railway management. But having done that, the Commission—strangely enough—proceeded to contradict its own proposition and to make a series of recommendations which were a direct interference with the details of railway management. His noble Friend (Lord Cottesloe) had given Notice of an Amendment to the Motion, which proposed in effect the adoption of the recommendations of the Royal Commission. He (Viscount Bury) thought he was entitled to ask his noble Friend what part of those recommendations he would have Parliament adopt. Was it that part which condemned the interference of Parliament or that which, if adopted, would be a direct interference on the part of the Legislature? It might be well, in the first place, to consider in what our railway system consisted. When, in 1846, railway losses became so severe and the profits on railways almost nil, shareholders' railways were no longer constructed. Small lines were then amalgamated, and the great trunk systems were formed by amalgamations. The public was not satisfied with that state of things; every market town wished to have its line to the Metropolis; and railway contractors discovered the means of "financing" railways and so perpetuating the schemes by which they had become rich and prosperous. Thus the railway system of the country was extended in a hap-hazard manner, and was not based on any sound conditions. Taking all Europe, there were three systems of railway management. Under one of those, railways were entirely subject to Government control. Under another the railways were governed by Railway Boards, but were subject to Government supervision; and under the third the Railway Boards were subject only to Government interference. Now, he thought it could be easily shown that from the earliest period of railway legislation in this country the principle steadily adhered to had been that Parliament should not interfere in the details of railway management or take in any degree from the responsibility of a Railway Company for the safety of its traffic. Lord Campbell's Act, under which compensation could be obtained for injuries on railways, went on that principle; and it was obvious that for the State to enter into the details of railway management would be a hopeless undertaking unless it took the railways into its own hands. Except in the latter circumstances, it must acquire its experience through railway managers, and could only be their mere mouthpiece. What he objected to, therefore, in the Report of the Royal Commission was that, by the 12 Resolutions therein contained, the Commission subverted and controverted the general principle with which its Report set out. The Commission had shown very considerable industry, for it had asked about 40,000 questions. The noble Earl (Earl De La Warr), who succeeded the Duke of Buckingham as Chairman of the Commission, had also shown great ability throughout the inquiry, and upon upon him, in the first instance, devolved the labour of drawing up a Report; but unfortunately the Commissioners were not of one mind, and instead of having one Report to guide them, their Lordships would have to consider a number of Reports. Only four of the Commissioners signed the Report of the Commission without comment; and Mr. Ayrton, one of the ablest men on the Commission, refused either to sign the Report or give any written opinion of his own, though he had closely attended to the labours of the Commission during the examination of the witnesses. The noble Earl (Earl De La Warr) drew up a separate Report; and Mr. Harrison—a late President of the Institute of Civil Engineers and a most able man—though he signed the Report of the Commission, signed a separate one also, in which he quarrelled with the Commissioners on nearly every point of their Report. So that the Report was not only discordant with itself, but was signed without comment by only four of the Commissioners. He would remind their Lordships as to the present state of the law and as to the authority under which the Railway Companies carried out their functions. As their Lordships were aware, a special Board was constituted in 1845 which exercised powers similar to those now vested in the Board of Trade. But in 1861 this separate Board was abolished, and the Board of Trade was restored to the provision assigned to it by former legislation, and resumed the authority which it had formerly exercised. The functions of the Board of Trade in this respect were derived under several Acts of Parliament. The Board granted certificates to Railway Companies authorizing them to enter into agreements with each other, and to enter into provisional contracts. No railway might open for traffic till the Board of Trade gave it a certificate. In the case of a disagreement between various Railways the Board of Trade might, with their consent, arbitrate between them. The Board of Trade might authorize the construction of bridges over level crossings, condemn illegal and dangerous gauges, regulate the speed of mail trains, sanction bye-laws, and, in certain circumstances, authorize the abandonment of schemes and extend the time for taking lands. But no Act of Parliament conferred anything like executive authority on the Board of Trade in respect of railways. It could not initiate any new policy or command anything to be done. To confer executive authority on the Board of Trade could only be justified by some failure of the present law that could only be obviated by such a step. Was it true that railway accidents had increased so much of late years as to render it necessary to depart from the present system? He found from the Report of the Commission that the number of passenger journeys in the years 1872-3-4-5 were, in round numbers, 1,863,000,000; and during the same period the number of deaths caused by accidents to trains was 155: so that the proportion of passengers killed by causes beyond their own control amounted to 1 in 11,500,000, and the proportion of passengers injured 35 in 11,500,000. No doubt the total number of persons injured was considerable; but when the extent of railway travelling in the United Kingdom was considered, he thought it could hardly be said that our railway travelling was otherwise than extremely safe. In speaking of the causes of railway accidents the Commissioners, adopting a word invented by Captain Tyler, stated that “human fallibility” was the great cause. It was impossible to eliminate the carelessness of human beings from the calculation of railway accidents. Human fallibility was the principal thing to be guarded against. That might be done by discipline and improved machinery; but legislation would not be effectual against it. The Report of the Commission recommended the extension of the civil liability of Railway Companies for accidents to their servants and of the criminal liability of the latter for negligence endangering human life. The noble Duke (the Duke of St. Albans) had before their Lordships a Bill relating to the liability of Railway Companies in respect of their servants. If there was to be legislation on that subject, it would be better in the form proposed by the noble Duke than in that recommended by the Commission; but he did not believe that such a Bill was necessary, because the subject could be dealt with in the general question of masters and servants, which was before the other House of Parliament. Then, as to the recommendation that there should be a tribunal for the trial of cases of unpunctuality by railways, that was not desirable—and for the obvious reason that where the traveller passed over several lines in the course of his journey the question of responsibility for the unpunctuality might be an intricate one. To fasten the offence on the last of the concurring lines might be very unjust; and therefore he did not think that any tribunal could deal cheaply, speedily, and satisfactorily with such questions. Then, as to brake power, the Railway Companies were at present in communication with the Board of Trade on that subject; he thought the Board of Trade would be able to come to a satisfactory conclusion; but he thought the Railway Companies themselves might be left to make their own regulations on that head. An important point involved in the question of brake power was the excessive speed at which trains were now run. He believed that if the speed were diminished the enormous brake power of which their Lordships had heard so much would not be required, and that a great source of danger would be thereby eliminated. The Commissioners did not report that excessive speed was a source of danger; but he thought common sense showed that excessive speed constituted a real and fruitful source of serious casualties. Only for excessive speed there would be no occasion for extraordinary brake power. When trains were driven at a speed of 55 or 60 miles an hour great weight must be placed on the driving wheel of the engine to make it bite the rail, and the engines of such trains must have driving wheels of very large diameter, or otherwise they could not effect the revolutions with sufficient velocity. The consequence was that those express trains running at enormous velocity knocked the line about in a manner that trains running at moderate speed—say 40 miles an hour—did not. There were a great many railways on which trains were run at a velocity exceeding 40 miles an hour; but in his opinion, and in the opinion of many competent engineers, 40 miles an hour constituted the limit which could be obtained with safety. If the public, however, insisted on being carried at the rate of 55 or 60 miles an hour it was only right they should know that that could not be done without the risk of imminent peril, and that when under such circumstances an accident happened the responsibility rested morally on those who insisted upon being driven at such an enormous speed. Again, as to continuous brakes—he held that great danger might result from their use. There were engine-drivers who would drive at the highest speed to the last moment, and there was in consequence every chance of running 30 or 40 yards beyond the station at which the train was to stop, and then the brake would be put on, and every time they were used on a train travelling at high velocity, they would cause a strain that would initiate mischief to the rolling stock. The strain of a continuous brake on carriages recently taken from a siding and attached to a train which had been travelling would be greater than on the other portions of the train, and might cause axles to break. His opinion, and that of men who were much more competent to form an opinion on the subject, was that continuous brakes would be a source rather of danger than of safety. There was another consideration—namely, that if the use of any particular appliance was made compulsory on Railway Companies the effect would be to stop all improvement in that direction. Captain Tyler considered that if the annual reports of Railway Companies were continued, those Companies which had adopted improvements would, in consequence of their own experience, go on improving, instead of relying on what they had already done. But Captain Tyler considered that it would be extremely unwise to impose on the Board of Trade the duty of deciding between rival appliances of brake power. Having quoted the testimony of Mr. Farrer and others against allowing the Board of Trade to determine whether increased station accommodation was required, the noble

Lord said that all the evidence came to this—that if such a power was given them the Board of Trade must assume the total responsibility of the line. With regard to the appellate jurisdiction, Captain Tyler's evidence was conclusive, for he said that if that was given, the Companies would be relieved of their responsibility, further invention and improvement would be discouraged, and undue responsibility would undoubtedly be thrown on the tribunal. There was a great deal more to the same effect; and all the evidence he had been able to collect proved that if you increased the power of the Board of Trade and gave it, not a consultative, but executive authority, you must go further, and assume the control of the railways by the State. The amount of money at present invested in railways was so enormous that such a proposal would not for a moment be entertained. But that was not the question now. The question was whether the position of the Board of Trade should be changed—whether, instead of being a merely consultative body, with power of investigation, report, and constant supervision, it should be enabled to say to the Railway Companies that such and such things must be done. His belief was that the principle laid down by the Royal Commission was the right one, but that the Resolutions they founded on it were not right. His noble Friend (Lord Cottesloe) would, he believed contend that the Resolutions of the Royal Commission ought to be carried out. It appeared to him, however, that, instead of giving further powers to the Board of Trade, it would be far more reasonable to embody in a Bill such requirements as ought to be demanded from Railway Companies, and then to give to the Board of Trade, as the representative of the Legislature, the power of remitting those requirements where it thought that could properly be done. Such a course would save the principle, which he believed to be a just one; would not impose on the Board of Trade other duties than those which from the earliest times of our railway history had been recognized to be right, and would preserve the logical consistency of our legislation. Let it not be supposed that in the arguments he had used he had spoken in the interests of the Railway Companies. He had spoken in the interest of the public safety, because he believed that interference in the details of railway management would introduce a new danger into railway travelling. He thought the Royal Commission deserved every credit for what they had done, but it was their principles and not their Resolutions that should be carried into effect.

Moved to resolve, "That direct legislative interference with the details of railway management tends rather to increase than diminish the danger of accident by dividing responsibility; that Parliament in dealing with regulations for the prevention of railway accidents has hitherto always recognized this principle; and that in any legislation which may from time to time become necessary on the subject, the necessity of maintaining the undivided responsibility of Railway Companies for the safe conduct of their traffic ought to be kept steadily in view."—(Viscount Bury.)

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS, in moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice, to insert after the words "the details of railway management" the words "except in so far as relates to the systematic overwork of railway servants," said: It is not my intention to trouble your Lordships with the battle of the brakes and many of the subjects which this Report deals with in connection with railway management. I would ask your Lordships' indulgence to refer to that portion which deals with the overwork of railway servants, and to bring before your notice the disastrous consequences which have arisen in consequence. I go, to a certain extent, with the Motion of the noble Lord (Viscount Bury), believing that the public interest will be best served by not interfering with the responsibility of the Railway Companies, and by punishing them severely when they fail. I go, however, further, and think when it does appear that by the action of Railway Companies life and property confided to its charge have been imperilled, though no actual loss has occurred, the Company ought to be liable and summarily punished. On the question of the "systematic overwork of railway servants" the Report of the Royal Commissioners is clear—the Great Eastern Company holding a dishonourable distinction. The Commissioners, after much care and after many difficulties thrown in their way by some Companies, have proved that in many cases the duties ordinarily exacted from the men are too protracted. Having established this, they relinquish the result they have arrived at, and say it is obviously true that railway managers and superintendents are the best judges of the capacity of their employés. The subject of overwork has come before the Commissioners in reference to accidents on railways, and is referred to in the evidence. I have to ask your Lordships' permission to read certain facts in Captain Tyler's Reports to the Board of Trade of 1875 and 1873, and your Lordships will judge if it is so.

Captain Tyler's General Reports to the Board of Trade, 1875.

Lancashire and Yorkshire :

"January 1st.—Seven persons injured. The guard was to blame for not having lighted the tail lamps. There was some excuse, however, for those men. They had at the time of the collision been on duty for an uninterrupted period of 22 hours.

Potteries and North Wales Railway, 1875 :

"28th December.—Four persons injured. The station master had to do the guard's duty when he was taken ill. The hours of the signalman were too long."

Midland Great Western, Ireland :

"30th October.—One killed and seven injured. The engineer and his firemen had been on duty 18½ hours."

Waterford and Limerick :

"4th November.—Engine driver had been on continuous duty 21 hours."

Lancashire and Yorkshire, 1873 :

"6th November.—Fourteen passengers, the driver and guard injured. The engine driver of the goods train had been 25 hours on duty."

North Eastern :

"21st December.—Six persons bruised. The inquiry disclosed the objectionable practice of keeping a signalman on duty 16 hours."

North Staffordshire :

"26th September.—Guard injured, and died in consequence. He had been 19 hours on duty, and was over-fatigued and omitted to apply his break. The driver of the pilot engine was stated to have been confused by drink after having been on duty for 32 hours. He was employed altogether for 40 hours. The fireman had been asleep on the engine, and was unfit for duty."

These are cases which have been brought under our notice, because accidents occurred ; we hear nothing of many narrow escapes. I wish to know from Her Majesty's Government if they intend to remove or lessen this source of danger to railway travelling, especially as the

The Duke of St. Albans

Report states that the Board of Trade have no power in the matter. I am surprised when I read these Reports, that the Board of Trade have rested content, but I suppose it requires a Plimsoll to rouse that apathetic Department. The Board of Trade does, no doubt, much useful work ; but if it had been left to that Department, rotten ships would still continue to navigate our seas ; and I am afraid if we have to wait for the Board of Trade to move, tired pointmen and overworked engine drivers will continue to hurry the public to destruction. It is true that the Commissioners deprecate interference on this head, since Parliament has never applied the principles of the Factory Acts to adult labour. This case is, however, not one of two parties, sui juris, and able to take care of themselves. It differs, because not only Railway Companies and their servants, but also the public in the matter of their safety are affected ; and therefore it is not one of those cases in which contractor and contractee alone have an interest. Mr. Cross, in 1875, acknowledged this in the Conspiracy Act in which he drew a distinction between workmen employed in ordinary work, and workmen engaged in supplying a town with water, gas making, &c., &c.—and in the latter case, where the safety of the public was involved, he made them punishable in a criminal, as well as in a Civil Court. I have had the honour to lay upon your Lordships' Table a Bill on this subject, which I hope to explain at the proper time. I should, however, be most glad to be relieved of the responsibility by the Government incorporating the subject in any measure they bring in. I should be most glad if some simple means could be adopted to restrain Railway Companies from keeping men employed 20 and 40 hours at great risk to the public safety ; but when a strong Government recoils in evident terror from interfering with so powerful an interest, I must acknowledge the difficulty of a private Member being successful. The Crown cannot, nor does it desire to, influence the decisions of Parliament. It is a much more real danger, lest some great interest created by the flow of capital, in this country, should become too powerful in Parliament. Against this no safeguard exists. Of existing interests the Railway Companies are most powerfully represented both in your Lordships' House and "elsewhere." I do not mean that a Member of either House would sacrifice his convictions because he is a Railway Director, but it is natural; and to be consistent a Railway Director must support in Parliament the policy he has approved on his Board. I mean they do not come with independent views having prejudged the subject. I am not surprised that in the face of this powerful phalanx, the Government should have shifted their responsibility in the matter on to a Commission, and now we have the Report that they should be anxious to deal tenderly with the railway interests. The travelling public, however, may well think sufficient time has already been allowed to pass, that the courtesies between the Board of Trade should cease, and that something should be done in the matter.

An Amendment moved, to insert after the words ("the details of railway management") the words ("except so far as it relates to the systematic overwork of railway servants.")—(The Duke of Saint Albans.)

LORD COTTESLOE, who had given Notice to move an Amendment, to leave out all the words after the words ("dividing responsibility") and to insert—

"Without, however, impairing the responsibility of railway companies for the safety of their traffic, it is expedient that further precautions should be taken for the prevention of accidents on railways by enforcing on railway companies by legislative enactment the adoption of those mechanical contrivances and recognized improvements, the value of which has been thoroughly ascertained. That the recommendations contained in the Report of the Royal Commission on Accidents on Railways are deserving of the fullest and most favourable consideration; and if they be adopted by Parliament, subject to such modifications and amendments as on further inquiry it may be proper to suggest, many causes of accident will be removed, and additional security will be afforded to all persons who have occasion to travel by railway, and to the servants of the railway companies," said, that he had given some attention to this subject, and that was the reason why he had given Notice of his Amendment to the Motion of his noble Friend. With regard to the Resolution of his noble Friend, he saw no objection to it; it seemed to be carefully drawn, and its principle was that which had been admitted by the Railway Commissioners.

But his objection was that if it should be agreed to, it would be saying, in effect, that the labours of the Commissioners should be passed over, that it was unnecessary to make any changes, and that the public safety was sufficiently cared for and required no additional protection. But, in his opinion, the Report of the Commissioners contained many recommendations that ought to be carried out. It was wonderful that as things were there should be so little loss of life. The noble Lord (Viscount Bury) objected to a Government interference with the internal management of railways: but that was no new principle—it was done already in the cases of mines and factories, and had been recently applied to shipping. Now, he (Lord Cottesloe) thought that as there were many Departments of the Government which had Inspectors to see that the provisions of certain Acts of Parliament were carried into effect, so the Board of Trade ought to have Inspectors to see that the Railway Companies performed their duties; and it should be left to the Board of Trade to say whether certain things were properly done. The Report showed that stations and sidings were much too small, and were a great source of danger; and the Board of Trade could be properly employed in seeing that they were made larger and gave more accommodation to the public. Again, the Report showed that the rate of speed was too high, and also that the platforms should be continuous. At present they were a gratuitous danger placed in the way of the public, and nothing could be easier than to remove it.

THE EARL OF BEACONSFIELD: My Lords, your Lordships' attention has been called to-night to a great subject—perhaps the greatest domestic subject that can come under your consideration—and I would wish to induce your Lordships not to arrive at any rash conclusion on this occasion. My noble Friend behind me (Viscount Bury) who brought forward the whole matter in an able speech, appeared to wish to concentrate the whole responsibility for the management of the railroads on the Railroad Directors. He wishes, to use the language of his Resolution, to establish "the undivided responsibility of Railway Companies." Now, my Lords, I am perfectly willing to bear my testimony—as I am sure all your Lordships would be equally willing to do—to the efficiency with which the Railway Companies of this country are managed. At the same time, I am not prepared to support any change which would remove that degree of control—not, in my opinion, an extravagant one—which at present exists, and, therefore, I feel it my duty to oppose the Motion of my noble Friend. I must, however, bear testimony to the able manner in which he has introduced the subject and to the acquaintance with its details which he has shown. Well, the Amendment of which Notice has been given by my noble Friend who has just addressed us (Lord Cottesloe) is in favour of a policy exactly opposite to that which is recommended in the original Resolution. My noble Friend would remove to a great degree the responsibility that now rests upon the Railway Boards, and he recommends a course which your Lordships would at once see would be a great departure from that policy which hitherto has been observed with respect to all these enterprizes. We have always held that the responsibility of the managers of the railroads should be as great as is consistent with public safety; but, having regard to the public safety, we have established a control which, though certainly not a stringent control, is yet a salutary one, and which in practice is much more powerful than it would appear to be from the letter of the statute—because, as the exponent of public sentiment and armed with great experience, the Board of Trade is listened to when it makes suggestions with as much attention as it would be if those suggestions were backed by legislation. I am unwilling for my part to recommend or sanction in any way any deviation from the policy which has hitherto been pursued, and which is contrary to that which is recommended in the Amendment of my noble Friend who last addressed us. But that Amendment was preceded by another—that of the noble Duke (the Duke of St. Albans). I regret that I do not find myself in a position to agree to any of the courses which have been proposed this evening. I understand the plan of the noble Duke to be to apply the provisions of the Factory Acts in the case of railway servants. Now, I think there is no Member of your Lordships' House who is a warmer supporter of those Acts than myself. I think they have contributed much to the happiness and in a great degree to the prosperity of this country. But hitherto, although we have applied the qualifications and conditions of the Factory Acts to female and infantile labour—to women and children—we have hitherto been always strictly on our guard not to extend them to adult males; and I cannot believe that the proposal in the present case is one that would really be popular with the great body of the railway servants, or that it would tend to the convenience or safety of the passengers;—because it is easy to conceive circumstances in which a sudden withdrawal of a railway servant from his duty at the close of the statutory hours of labour might occasion considerable danger, and, perhaps, disaster. The principle upon which the recommendation of the noble Duke is founded is in my opinion a vicious one, for between men and their employers, the law, to my mind, should not interfere. Well, after noticing the original Motion and the two Amendments, we come to consider the recommendations of the Report of the Royal Commissioners. I can assure my noble Friend who last addressed us that I have no wish in any way to diminish the authority of those recommendations. In answering a Question at the beginning of the Session, when Government were pressed to act upon their very voluminous and elaborate Report, which was founded on labours extending over two years, I did remark that the Report was not introduced to our notice by a unanimous opinion of the Royal Commissioners. My Lords, I must say that was a fact which at the first blush would naturally make any one responsible for acting on the Report hesitate in order that he might well consider it. There is no wish on my part to undervalue the labours of the Commissioners—indeed, those labours cannot be too much appreciated, because in the evidence which was collected, and collected by men of acuteness and ability from persons of much experience, there is an inestimable mass of knowledge on a subject which is one of the most interesting to this country. All that I wanted then and wish now to do is to impress upon your Lordships that it would be well not to be precipitate in acting upon the recommendations or suggestions that may be in that Report, and that it is desirable to let those recommendations and the evidence on which they are founded be well digested both by Parliament and the Government, in order that such propositions may be made as the necessity of the case may require. Now, in the first place, we must remember that in many of the recommendations of the Commissioners there is involved a great transference of the powers of the control of Parliament to the Board of Trade or some other body, and I would remind your Lordships that that operation alone is a matter which induces considerations of the utmost gravity and difficulty. It opens the whole question of Private Bill legislation and of our system of Provisional Orders. Now, it would be perfectly unfair—and would be not only unfair but useless—to call upon the Railway Companies to increase, for example, their sidings and their stations, to build bridges and lodges, and greatly to alter and increase the accommodation which they provide for the public, without at the same time giving them the necessary powers to carry these improvements into effect. You must give new powers. To the new Department that is proposed you must give power to buy land compulsorily and to raise new capital adequate for the occasion. All these are important considerations which require the closest attention before such a plan should be adopted. Suppose you say—"We will trust these new powers to the Board of Trade—we will agree to a transfer of this authority from Parliament to the Board of Trade." You would have to consider then whether you would have new legislation independent of all preceding legislation on the subject, or whether you could attain your ends by an extension of the general Acts that now exist; or you might have to consider whether you could not effect your object without forfeiting your authority in Parliament; whether the Board of Trade might not have power to consider these particular points in the administration of particular railways, and whether they might not report to a Parliamentary Committee. Then your Lordships would have to consider whether it should be a Joint Committee, and also the powers which it might be necessary for that Joint Committee to possess. These are the first inferences which occur to me from the speech of my noble Friend. Your Lordships will see that these are complicated considerations, and that it is impossible, without careful discussion, that we can arrive at clear and safe results. There was another point referred to by my noble Friend who introduced the subject, and also by my noble Friend who last addressed us—the question of the Appellate Courts. I do not wish to give anything like a definitive opinion on this occasion; but I must say the suggestion of Appellate Courts in the Report of the Royal Commission is not to me an altogether satisfactory one. It is not one at all in harmony with the Parliamentary practice of this country that there should be a Department of State presided over by a Minister of the Crown sitting in one of the Houses of Parliament, and responsible—clearly and evidently and momentarily responsible—to Parliament, and that its decisions should be subject to an Appellate Court which is altogether irresponsible. That is not the way in which hitherto we have been accustomed to carry on the public business of this country, and I should hesitate very much—I should require much consideration—before I could accept an Appellate Court such as the Royal Commission recommends. Then there are in the Report of the Royal Commission suggestions about the Railway Commissioners which, I think, are hardly well considered. It appears to me that under the recommendations of the Royal Commission the present Railway Commissioners might really have no small share in the management of railways. Now, the duties thrown upon the Railway Commissioners are eminently and essentially judicial; and it has always been held as a principle—and, I believe, a sound principle—that you should refrain as much as possible from mixing up judicial duties with executive functions. I foresee great confusion and dissatisfaction that might arise unless we guard ourselves carefully in these matters. Then there is the block and interlocking system. I must say that my noble Friend, who is well informed on all the details of the subject, did not appear to me to place that matter before the House quite in the light in which I think it might truly be placed. The block and interlocking system is not a new subject for legislation. We have attempted to legislate for it in this House itself. My noble Friend the noble Earl (Earl De La Warr) who takes great interest in this subject, dealt with it in a Bill, and a Bill well worthy of consideration, which was read a second time and referred to a Select Committee. That Select Committee which was presided over by a noble Duke who sits, unfortunately, opposite (the Duke of Somerset), but whose vigorous mind was particularly well qualified to deal with the subject, took evidence of the highest quality from men who were perfect masters of the subject; and what did they report? They reported that it was advisable not to legislate, because the evidence which they had received showed that all the chief railways were giving great attention to the subject, and were making experiments, and even improvements; and they recommended that they should place themselves in constant communication with the Board of Trade,—at least, that is my recollection of the Report of the Committee, and I believe it to be accurate,—and that the Board of Trade should at times and periods specifically inform Parliament and the country of the progress made in that respect. Well, I am not myself aware that there has been any failure of the expectations of that Committee, and what I heard from my noble Friend who last addressed us, when he quoted the evidence of Mr. Moon, was an eulogium of the admirable manner in which that gentleman, distinguished for his management of railways, had carried into effect all the recommendations and suggestions which had been made with regard to the block and interlocking system as far as was practicable. Therefore, I should hesitate before taking any too decisive a step in that direction. Well now, I confess that although my noble Friend who last addressed us did full justice to the subject, I cannot bring myself to believe that continuous foot-boards really depend upon legislation. If they cannot have continuous boards without coming to Parliament, I really think Railway Directors must be in a state of great degeneracy. I believe that to be a subject which Boards of Directors could deal with amply and efficiently. There are two other subjects of great importance which, though at the first glance they appear easy to deal with, the House will, I think, admit should not be dealt with too hastily. The one is punctuality, and the other is continuous brakes. Now, there is not the slightest doubt but that a great virtue—perhaps, I might say the greatest virtue—in railway management is punctuality. There is nothing, evidently, that contributes so much to the convenience and to the safety of passengers as punctuality. But there may be some circumstances in which an artificial punctuality may be not only not to the convenience, but to the extreme danger of passengers. That punctuality which is to be secured by fines and penalties in case of its not being observed stimulates and encourages unsafe expedition. Not long ago a great railway disaster occurred because the driver had lost time through a severe snowstorm, and had put on steam in order to avoid unpunctuality and its penalties. Therefore, it is not quite clear that you can by a dash of the pen or the issuing of an order obtain punctuality on railways. It is a subject which requires consideration, and must be approached with that feeling with which one always approaches problems that are difficult of solution. On the question of continuous brakes there is a great difference of opinion. To decide upon an efficient form of continuous brake is no doubt one of the chief objects which those connected with railways are desirous of accomplishing. Are not the Directors of all the great lines giving their attention to the subject? The Board of Trade is, I know, in negotiation with all the railways, and is constantly receiving reports, upon the subject. Experiments are making; inventions are being examined and tried; and soon, I have reason to believe, a Report from the Board of Trade in reference to these matters will be placed on the Table of your Lordships' House. In these circumstances I hope your Lordships' House will not be required to express an opinion upon the questions before it. The subject of railway communication is one which every year will become more and more important. I do not know that at this moment there is one to which more science, attention, or capital are ready to be devoted. In the remarks I have made I do not mean to say that it may not be necessary to legislate upon the subject. There are some points on which it is clear that we could not act without legislation. Extreme or excessive speed on bad lines is, no doubt, a subject which requires attention. The use of brake power generally is a matter which requires legislation. The conditions as to the opening of new lines are again a subject on which legislative power is needed. But still, even in these instances, the moral influence of the Board of Trade would have great effect in mitigating evils. What I wish is that, having these documents before us, having the Report, with this immense body of evidence which the Government have now been for some time examining and digesting, we may not at this period of the Session be called upon to legislate; but, taking the general view I have done of the position, which I believe is a just and candid view, we shall be allowed an opportunity of further considering this matter.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, their Lordships would probably all agree that it was far better in the interest of the public and of Parliament that the Government should maintain their entire freedom of opinion and decision on this extremely difficult subject of legislation. Their only wish could be that the Government should feel and bear the responsibility of forming their own decisions on the extremely difficult matters of legislation which were contained in the Report; and that when the time arrived the Government might find themselves in a position to give an opinion to Parliament either in favour of the necessity of legislation or against it. His noble Friend opposite (Viscount Bury) desired to hold back the Government altogether from any action in this matter. After the speech of the Prime Minister he did not think that the Government required much holding back. It would be exceedingly unwise for the House to give its authority to all the recommendations of the Royal Commission, and he trusted it would turn out that in regard to many of those recommendations legislation might not be necessary. As to some of them, there were great reasons for hoping that what was requisite might be done by the voluntary action of the Companies themselves, under the pressure of the opinion of the public and of Parliament. A great deal had already been done, and was still being done, in respect to the block system, and the system of interlocking points and signals under the pressure of public opinion and of the Report of the Committee of that House, which had been alluded to. But he was not so sure about all the points included in the recommendation of the Commission. Continuous brakes would no doubt be an important means of safety, considering the rate at which many trains travelled; and in that matter the Companies up to this moment were in an extremely unsatisfactory position; and he was not persuaded by what had fallen from his noble Friend opposite that that arose from any idea of danger to the public from the use of such brakes. On the contrary, he believed that the importance of their use for safety in railway travelling was established. There were a number of competing interests of a pecuniary kind which made it difficult for the Companies to decide on one or more of the different inventions which had been introduced; but if the Companies held out and refused to meet the views of Parliament and the public in that matter, he was not prepared to say that compulsory legislation might not be necessary. In regard to the condition of the permanent way and the rate of speed at which it would be safe to travel over it, he thought that Parliament might do more than it had done for the purpose of obtaining additional securities in those respects. The Board of Trade had certain powers in that direction already on the opening of a new line; and there would be no insuperable difficulty in the Board of Trade afterwards interfering to repeat the process if necessary, and requiring the Company to put the permanent way in a safe condition. The late accident at Long Ashton, though it was not attended with great loss of life, was nevertheless by its nature one of the most formidable accidents they had had, and one that was well calculated to alarm the travelling public; and he thought the Board of Trade, or whatever other body might be entrusted with such functions, should have the power of forbidding a Company to run its trains at beyond a certain rate of speed on a line which was in a defective state. There was another point to which he wished to direct attention, and that was as to the body which should exercise compulsory powers. He did not think the Board of Trade was adapted for that purpose; but other means might be found for carrying into effect the recommendation on the subject. In the Railway Commission—a body which had acquired the confidence both of the Railway Companies and the public—a tribunal such as was required might, he thought, be found. The Board of Trade might be kept strictly within administrative limits; it might bring cases of sufficient importance before the tribunal and support its views by the ample means at its disposal, while the Companies could defend themselves in the same way. The objection of the noble Earl (the Earl of Beaconsfield) would not apply in this case, because the tribunal would be judicial, and once it had given its decisions the Board of Trade would carry them into effect. He was content, however, to leave the Government free on their own responsibility to deal with all these points. He did not think, from what they had heard to-night, that there was any reason to fear rash or rapid legislation.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN said, that as a Member of the Commission which had inquired into the subject he desired to make a few remarks. And, first, with regard to the objection pointed out by his noble Friend (Viscount Bury) that many, or some, of the recommendations made by the Railway Commissioners were inconsistent with the principle they had laid down—namely, that the responsibility of Railway Companies in working their traffic ought not to be impaired. But he denied that that was the case. For instance, as regarded the application of mechanical inventions and appliances the Commissioners carefully abstained from specifying any, so as to leave free scope for the ingenuity of inventors. Then came the question as to excessive speed. On that point he might remind their Lordships that the most eminent and experienced engineers in the country held that speed in itself was not a source of danger, provided the permanent way was in good condition, and capable of bearing the strain thrown upon it. Next came the recommendation of the Commissioners with regard to brake power. But the Commissioners did not pretend to say that Parliament ought to specify the means by which trains should be stopped within a certain distance. The Companies were left free to devise whatever means they might find best for accomplishing that object. Neither did they say that continuous brakes were the only means—scope was thus left for future ingenuity. The noble Earl had alluded to the recommendation of the Commissioners of continuous footboards. It might seem as if that matter was too trivial for legislation; but the want of continuous footboards was a matter that was constantly insisted upon in the Reports of the Board of Trade, and it must therefore be supposed that they attached considerable importance to these footboards as a means of safety. Continuous footboards were, no doubt, very useful and very important; but he did not think they would be sufficient in themselves to remove all cause of danger so far as the carriages were concerned. As some reference had been made to the relations subsisting between the Board of Trade and the Railway Commissioners, he would beg to observe that he spoke for his brother Commissioners when he said that in the recommendations they had made, the last thing that could have entered their minds was to show any disrespect towards the Board of Trade, or any want of appreciation of the importance and dignity of its functions. The fact that they wished to confer additional powers on the Board showed what confidence they felt in the Department. He thought that the Reports of the Board of Trade would have additional dignity and weight if the name of the President instead of the officers of the Board was attached to them. Looking now at the question of the railway servants, and the remarks that had been made on the subject, not only by the noble Duke, but also by some other noble Lords who had spoken, it was no doubt true that a great many accidents were attributable to the failure of railway servants to perform their duty accurately. But it should be remembered that it was easy to suppose an accident which should be caused apparently by the failure of a railway servant to do his duty; while, at the same time, by looking into the matter a little more closely, they might find that the servant had not at hand all the means necessary to enable him to perform his duty. For instance, there was the case of an accident arising from a servant having given the wrong signal: the accident was therefore attributed to the signal; but the Inspector pointed out in his Report that the accident could have been prevented if some particular contrivance had been adopted. That was one instance, and several might be adduced; and it was a reason why further attention should be devoted to all such cases. With regard to railway servants, it was sometimes said that in these days they expected every advantage and even luxury. That was not true: on the other hand, increased demands were made upon them, owing to increased traffic and an increased number of trains and of signals. But though our ancestors used rushes for carpets, and rode in waggons, a good carpet was not looked upon as a luxury—and there were certain lines upon which the Directors might improve the condition of their servants by a comparatively small outlay—such as giving protection for their engineers, which had been adopted on some lines, but not on others. Many points had been brought out by the Report on Accidents which deserved to be inquired into; but at that late hour he would not further detain their Lordships. For the last 15 years he had opportunities of studying railway work in all its branches, and these opportunities had been given him by the courtesy of gentlemen responsible for the management of railways. But men of the greatest experience who had been in the habit of observing things from one point of view might, perhaps, receive useful suggestions from others who had no interest or bias in any direction.

LORD HOUGHTON said, that the tone of the debate would be most grateful to all persons connected with railway management, and he could assure the noble Earl (the Earl of Aberdeen) who had conducted the labours of the Commission with so much intelligence, that the Companies would do all they could to carry into effect the recommendations of the Commissioners. With regard to the use of continuous brakes, he wished to state that on two-thirds of the whole railway mileage experiments were going on under the direction of the most skilful engineers, and if there was delay in the adoption of any one particular brake, it proceeded not from negligence, or from any mistaken economy, but solely from the conflicting opinions of experts as to which brake was the most effective. As to speed, he was sure that Englishmen could no more be prevented from desiring to travel at a high rate of speed, even at considerable risk, than their Lordships from desiring to go across country at the best speed of the best and fastest hunter. It was the habit of the English, and they would indulge it. The noble Duke (the Duke of St. Albans) had alluded to the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway. He regretted the accident which had occurred as much as anyone, but every possible precaution had been taken. The noble Earl opposite had given due credit to the Railway Companies for their zeal, which zeal, strange to say, was sometimes the cause of accidents. And there were many other causes, of which one was, in very exceptional cases, over labour.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that having been one of the Commission, he desired to offer a few remarks. The noble Viscount (Viscount Bury) stated that the principle had been laid down that the responsibility of the Railway Companies was by the Commission not to be impaired; but he thought he should have referred him to the chapter of the Report in which that responsibility was laid down. There were some exceptional cases in which Railway Companies had been found not to act up to their responsibility, and in those cases it was recommended that power should be given by which certain steps could be taken. He would like to say a few words on the question which he thought the most important of all—namely, the question of brake power. The Commission had recommended the adoption of no particular brake—they simply recommended, what had been proved to be practicable, that every train should be supplied with a brake capable of bringing the train to a stand-still within 500 yards. Two years ago very extensive experiments had been made at Newark, and though no particular brake was adopted, it was found perfectly possible to bring up the train within that distance. Officers of the Great Western and Great Northern Railway Companies had told him as witnesses the result of certain experiments. A Great Western Railway train of ordinary weight, with seven carriages, one with a brake, one brake van, and tender brake, travelling on the broad gauge at 55 miles an hour, stopped in 890 yards in 58 seconds; at 64 miles an hour stopped in 1,185 yards in 67 seconds; on the narrow gauge a similar train travelling at 52 miles an hour stopped in 965 yards in 70 seconds, at 47 miles an hour it stopped in 853 yards in 68 seconds. On the Great Northern Railway a train of 15 carriages with Smith's vacuum brake, travelling at 56 miles an hour, stopped in 356 yards in 21 seconds; at 40 miles an hour stopped in 153 yards in 17 seconds; at 45 miles an hour stopped in 271 yards in 16 seconds; at 60 miles an hour stopped in 346 yards in 23 seconds. In the face of these facts, he hoped that brakes for stopping trains in 500 yards would be adopted. With regard to the recommendations relating to the Board of Trade, it was clear that some tribunal should have authority over the Railway Companies, and what the Commissioners meant was, that some steps should be taken in the direction recommended by the Commission to modify the power already possessed by the Board. When a Parliamentary Committee had allowed a new Company to come into an existing Company's stations and goods sheds, and had made no regulation as to the responsibility or management, a great deal of difficulty and risk of public danger had arisen. There were, of course, two engineers and two Boards of Directors to consult;—and he might mention Huddersfield station as an instance of an arrangement of this kind. Indeed, it was the case of Huddersfield which mainly led to the recommendations contained in the Report of the Commissioners. As to the rate of speed, the Report showed what the opinions of the Commissioners were, and their recommendations in that respect would, no doubt, be duly considered. The noble Earl at the head of the Government had made some remarks on the powers which the Commissioners proposed to confer on the Board of Trade or some other tribunal, and had observed that this would deprive Parliament of powers which it at present possessed. It was true that the Commissioners did make some recommendations to allow Companies, with the permission of the Board of Trade, to purchase land for the purpose of affording increased accommodation. They did not for a moment propose, however, that any tribunal should be enabled to authorise Companies to raise capital without Parliamentary sanction. It was felt by some of the Commissioners that if Parliament gave extensive powers to the Board of Trade to compel Railway Companies to increase their station accommodation, there ought to be some mode of appeal on the part of the Company from what they might consider an unjust order. This Court was proposed entirely in the interest of the Railway Companies; but his views had been rather modified since Mr. Harrison, who had particularly represented the railway interest on the Commission, had stated in his counter Report that he was not in favour of an Appellate Court; and he now thought that if the Railway Companies did not really want an appeal, but would be content to act upon the suggestions of the Board of Trade without one, the matter of the proposed Court might be allowed to drop. The Commissioners had anticipated the objection of the noble Earl at the head of the Government as to the difficulty of making any Court superior to the Board of Trade. One object in recommending the Board of Trade in preference to a new Court was that it was presided over by a Minister who was responsible to Parliament. Of course, the question immediately arose as to how an appeal could lie from the Minister himself, and he admitted that there could be no Court of Appeal, unless it were presided over by a Judge equal in rank to the Judges of the Supreme Court. There were some other points in the Report of the Commissioners to which he would have directed their Lordships' attention; but in the present state of the House, and considering the full manner in which this question had been discussed, he would not trouble their Lordships with any further remarks.

EARL DE LA WARR said, that as one of the Members of the Royal Commission on Railway Accidents, he would gladly have made a few remarks to their Lordships; but in consequence of the late hour and the present state of the benches on either side of the House, he would defer his observations to some future occasion. After what had fallen from the noble Earl at the head of the Government, he hoped his noble Friend would not press his Amendment to a division.

Then an Amendment moved—

To leave out all the words after the words ("dividing responsibility,") and to insert ("without, however, impairing the responsibility of railway companies for the safety of their traffic, it is expedient that further precautions should be taken for the prevention of accidents on railways by enforcing on railway companies by legislative enactment the adoption of those mechanical contrivances and recognised improvements, the value of which has been thoroughly ascertained. That the recommendations contained in the Report of the Royal Commission on Accidents on Railways are deserving of the fullest and most favourable consideration; and if they be adopted by Parliament, subject to such modifications and amendments as on further inquiry it may be proper to suggest, many causes of accident will be removed, and additional security will be afforded to all persons who have occasion to travel by railway, and to the servants of the railway companies.")—(The Lord Cottesloe.)

After a short debate, the said Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Then the original Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

QUESTIONS.

THE SUGAR CONVENTION.—QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he is in a position to give the House any information as to the present state of the Sugar Bounty question; and, if he can hold out any prospect that the Convention on this subject is likely to be ratified?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the draft Convention was drawn up by the delegates representing the various Powers at Paris, and it is now under the consideration of those Powers. Until their Representatives have expressed their opinions upon that Convention, it is impossible for me to say whether it is likely to be ratified.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—REGULATIONS RESPECTING THE PORT OF ODESSA.—QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can inform the House whether it be true that the Russian authorities have ordered neutral ships arriving off and bound to Odessa not to enter that port; if he has, or is, negotiating with the Russian and Turkish Governments to allow neutral vessels a specified period in which to enter and leave harbours protected by torpedoes or blockaded by ships of war; and, if he has ascertained whether the belligerents intend observing the Maritime Rules of the Declaration of Paris during the continuance of hostilities; and if the Turkish Government intends treating the Dardanelles and Bosphorus as inland waters for ships of all nations, or only as against those belligerent Powers?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, in reply to the first part of the Question of the hon. Member for Sunderland, I have to say that in answer to a message that was sent from the Foreign Office two days ago, Consul General Stanley at Odessa reports to us that no English vessel has been prevented from entering in or going out of that port; and that yesterday in fact an English vessel was unloading there and would proceed, when her cargo was unloaded, to go out of the port. He adds that all vessels are obliged upon entering the port to enter with Russian crews, and that while they are going through the channel, termed the "Mined" Channel, which I suppose is a channel where torpedoes are laid down, their own crews are obliged to go below, and that these regulations apply to Russian as well as to foreign vessels. With regard to the second part of the Question of the hon. Member, we have no notice with regard to any harbours that are protected by torpedoes, except Odessa, the one just mentioned, nor have we received any information of a blockade being established, either by Russia, or by Turkey. Then with regard to the third part of the Question, we have received telegrams from Mr. Layard, who says that it is the intention of the Turkish Government to issue a proclamation declaring that it does mean to be bound by the maritime rules laid down in the Declaration of Paris. Mr. Layard adds, in the telegram to which I have just alluded, that regulations are about to be issued by the Porte stating what their intention is with regard to the right of search for contraband of war. I do not think it would be desirable that I should say anything about those regulations until I receive them, and therefore I can only say that whenever we hear of those regulations being published—and we understand they are to be published immediately—by the Porte, we shall make them publicly known in this country without the slightest delay.

COAL MINES—THE TYNEWYDD COLLIERY INQUEST—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will direct that some one will attend the inquest to be held on the 3rd proximo, to find out the cause of the death of the men who lost their lives in the Tynewydd Colliery, South Wales; and, if he will order that the inquiry will be of the most searching character, to see if the provisions of "The Mines Act, 1872," in respect to bodies of water, were being fully carried out prior to the inundation?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that in accordance with the Answer already given by the Home Secretary, and by the instructions of that right hon. Gentleman, he (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) had that day given directions that a lawyer should attend the inquest respecting the death of the men who lost their lives in the colliery referred to in the Question, as was done in the case of the last colliery explosion inquiry.

Mr. Bourke

NAVY—DOCKYARDS—ADMISSION OF FOREIGN VISITORS.—QUESTION.

MR. OWEN LEWIS asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it is the case that—if he considers it advisable, under present circumstances, that such unlimited access to these establishments should be granted to foreigners; if similar facilities are afforded to Englishmen in Russia and other continental countries; and, if he has any objection to communicate the Russian officer's name to the House?

"A Russian officer has received permission to make a tour of inspection of all our dockyards and such Government establishments as he may desire to visit;"

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, I am sorry to say, is not able to be present here to-night. He would have been better qualified to answer this Question than I am; but I understand that about three weeks ago a Russian officer, Lieutenant Artsayooloff, was recommended by the Foreign Office to the Admiralty to receive permission to see the dockyards at Chatham, Sheerness, Portsmouth, and Devonport. It is the practice of the Admiralty to grant permission to see the Dockyards to persons so recommended, and, moreover, I may mention that it is the practice to allow naval attachés to the Embassies to visit the Dockyards without any special recommendation or permission. These facilities are given reciprocally by other nations, and I believe it is the case that the same facilities are given by the Russian Government to English officers. Under these circumstances the permission was given, and, as far as I understand, this gentleman was allowed to visit those establishments. I do not see that there is any object at present in making any alteration in the existing practice.

ARMY—THE COURT MARTIAL ON CAPTAIN ROBERTS, 94TH REGIMENT. QUESTION.

MAJOR O'GORMAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is intended that Lord John Taylour, who was in command of the 94th Regiment at Belfast, while the Court Martial on Captain Roberts was being proceeded with, is to be placed in command of a Brigade Dépôt: and, if so, whether, considering the evidence given before the Court Martial in question, relating to the noble Lord's conduct as commanding officer, his appointment to a Brigade Dépôt will be delayed until the Motion of the honourable Member for Dundee has been discussed by the House of Commons?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, Lord John Taylour, not being on half-pay, is not qualified to be appointed to a Brigade Dépôt, and no such intention has been entertained.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT, 1876—THE FRENCH STEAMER "LABRADOR."
OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

MR. MAC IVER said, that in putting a Question on this subject to the President of the Board of Trade, he wished to make a personal explanation. On the previous day he had had to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman which was of great importance to the shipping interest, and he thought he was entitled to receive a courteous and accurate answer. The right hon. Gentleman replied that the facts of the case were the reverse of those stated in the Question. He (Mr. Mac Iver) would be unworthy of his place in that House if he were to put a Question of the description implied in that Answer, and he felt sure the right hon. Gentleman, on reflection, would see that the terms of his answer were not altogether justified. The Question was misunderstood by the right hon. Gentleman, for he (Mr. Mac Iver) was not complaining specially of the Labrador, against which vessel he had no charge. She had been properly surveyed, and if all emigrant ships—

MR. SPEAKER, interposing, said, the hon. Gentleman was entering into matters of argument and debate.

MR. MAC IVER said, his Question had reference to the state of the law, rather than to the particular case of the Labrador, which, however, was the first vessel to come under the law. He now wished to ask, Whether it would be permitted to any British steamer to commence her voyage at a foreign port and to embark steerage passengers at any British port of call on the same conditions as those upon which the French steamer "Labrador" did so at Plymouth on Sunday 15th instant; whether it is not true that specific compliance with the Passengers Acts of 1855, 1863, and 1870 has always hitherto been required from all vessels alike, without distinction of nationality, and that there was no such compliance in the case of the "Labrador," but only a general compliance; whether it is intended to continue to enforce specific compliance as regards British vessels generally, or whether any exception will be made in the case of vessels registered in Canada and trading from continental ports, viâ Great Britain, under circumstances where it can be shown that the ordinary Board of Trade requirements have been substantially complied with; and, whether foreign certificates countersigned by British Consuls, as in the case of the "Labrador," are in all cases to be regarded as conclusive evidence of general compliance with such requirements?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY, in reply, said, he was extremely sorry the hon. Member should have felt that there was anything discourteous in his answer. He thought he had merely taken the shortest possible way of putting the House in possession of the facts, as the hon. Member had entirely misconceived the law, which his argumentative Question attempted to impugn; and they distinctly showed that the truth was the exact reverse of what was implied in the Question. The hon. Gentleman now resumed his argument in another form, as against the 19th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of last year. That section was fully discussed at the time and agreed to, its purport being to relieve foreign passenger ships calling at an English port from a second survey. If British steamers took to starting from foreign ports with emigrants and called at British ports for more, if they had been surveyed sufficiently at the port of departure they would not be subjected to the same survey again. A specific compliance with the law for the time being had been, and would be, required from all passenger ships. The Labrador under the Act of last year was exempted from a second survey of hull and machinery at the port of call; but the emigration officer of the Board of Trade had to examine and be satisfied about the arrangements made for any fresh passengers taken in, and no further survey could be of any use or validity. The ship would have to be unloaded to make the survey anything but a useless annoyance. The 19th section of the Act of last year placed duly surveyed foreign ships calling here for additional emigrants on the same footing as France had always placed duly surveyed English ships calling at a French port, so far as survey was concerned. Canadian registered ships would come under precisely the same conditions as other British ships. The attestation of a British Consul was not conclusive. The Board of Trade must be satisfied, and did satisfy itself, that the requirements were substantially complied with, and Her Majesty might, by Order in Council, direct that the section should not apply where corresponding provisions were not extended to British ships.

ABOLITION OF PURCHASE ACT — THE REGULATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. CALLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in view of the present critical position of foreign affairs, Her Majesty's Government have taken into consideration the advisability of taking the necessary steps to enable officers who had purchased their commissions previous to the Abolition of Purchase Act, 1871, the value of which was guaranteed to these officers by the Act of Parliament, to bequeath or otherwise assign the value of their commissions, to which they would be entitled were they now to sell out?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that, as he understood the Act for the Abolition of Purchase, officers were to be secured in the same rights which they enjoyed before that abolition. So far as payment was made for the purchase of a commission, the regulation that was in force previous to 1871 was still in force, and therefore officers and their families would be treated in exactly the same way as they would have been if purchase had never been abolished. It was not the intention of the Government to make any change in this respect.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR. NOTICES.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Mr. Speaker, I beg to give Notice that

Sir Charles Adderley

I shall, on Monday, ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government have received official intelligence of the outbreak of hostilities between Russia and Turkey; and whether it is the intention of the Government to issue a Proclamation of Neutrality?

MR. C. HOWARD: On behalf of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), who is absent from indisposition, I beg to give Notice that it is his intention to move Resolutions on the Eastern Question and the prospective policy of the British Government. The terms of the Resolutions will be given by the right hon. Gentleman on Monday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE IRISH LAND QUESTION.

RESOLUTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, in order to ensure to the Irish tenantry the benefits intended to be conferred on them by the Land Act of 1870, it is essential that steps should be taken to prevent the exaction of rents which virtually confiscate the improvements declared by that Act to be the property of the tenant, and also that steps should be taken to prevent the eviction of tenants for refusing to submit to such rents," said: Sir, I think I am strictly accurate in saying that the Irish agricultural occupiers, who represent a population of little less than 4,000,000, live in constant apprehension of being called upon to pay increased rent, and of being turned out of their holdings if they refuse. This does not arise from a natural aversion to rent in any shape, but is a fear engendered by the power exercised by landlords of asking for whatever rent they want, and compelling its payment under pain of eviction. The great aim of modern land legislation has been to make land, as far as possible, an ordinary marketable commodity for the landlord, freed from such incumbrance as occupiers with even the slightest hold upon the soil. This has been accomplished by devising a system of rapid eviction, which has practically detached the whole of the agricultural population from the land, and which prepares them for utter ruin by putting them through a short preliminary process of legal torture. In the opinion of some, one of the unpardonable sins committed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) has been his partial recognition of a continuous right of occupation in the occupier by giving him, in certain cases, a claim to compensation for disturbance. What is the effect of this rapid system of eviction upon the tenant? It forces him to pay whatever rent the landlord makes up his mind to ask for. This is a consequence of which the injustice is so self-evident that a doctrine has had to be invented for its defence, and is constantly being repeated by a chorus of landlords and agents. It is that the value of the land is whatever the landlord can get for it. This is the landlords' contribution to the principles of political economy, and a very handy one it is for their purposes. It rests upon the monstrous assumption that the land belongs absolutely to the landlord, and may be dealt with by him in whatever way is most advantageous to his pocket. We are referred for its justification to the fact that owing to the intense craving for land there is always some one found to gratify the cupidity of the landlord. With an air of the utmost innocence, and as if he was the helpless victim of an irresistible law, the evicting landlord says in effect, if not actually—"I am offered so much more for this farm than you say you are able to give me, and am I to be prevented from making money, because if I take your farm from you, you and your family will be consigned to utter misery?" Sir, when in the interest of humanity we resist the doctrine that the value of the land is whatever the landlord can get for it, and assail it as a false and mischievous proposition, we are treated by some with as much derision as if we had been guilty of an absurdity as great as the denial of a mathematical axiom. But the common sense and the innate sense of justice of mankind will never permit the selfish interests of landlords to be weighed against the rights which occupancy confers upon the farmer. I have frequently argued in this House that Ireland must be dealt with as, what she is, a fully occupied country, and not dealt with as an uninhabited country, put up to auction to be knocked down in various allotments to the highest bidder. I can imagine an uninhabited island, or an uninhabited portion of a Continent, the ownership of which is vested in a few individuals — if they want tenants, and there is competition, they will, of course, let to the highest bidder; but that the tenant should be liable to lose his land merely by being outbid supposes a state of things incompatible with the peaceful enjoyment of life, with the adequate remuneration of labour, and for which history outside those islands furnishes nothing approaching to an example. And yet this is the principle upon which some Irish landlords maintain they have a right to traffic in the soil of Ireland, with this incident of aggravation—that in innumerable instances the ownership of the landlords is but a thing of yesterday when compared with the occupation of the tenants. The longer the occupancy the deeper its roots, and the greater and more painful the wrench required to separate the farmer from his home. Sir, I believe that the very nature of the man so treated is changed, that he is at the mercy of the fiercest passions, and becomes the irreconcilable enemy of the State that refuses him protection. Well, when we consider that every farmer in Ireland is liable to be torn from his home, if he fails to furnish the rent deemed necessary by the landlord for his general convenience, we may form a very clear idea of the feelings entertained by the Irish farmers towards a Government which allows such a system to exist. Sir, the Irish farmers are, and ever have been, prepared to give the landlord his fair share of the value of the land, but they insist that its value is only to be determined by ascertaining the producing power of the soil in the case of each particular farm. I am not to be met by being told that neither Mr. This nor my Lord That is a rack-renter. I do not know whether they are or not. I know that the law enables the landlord to fix his rent to suit his necessities, and it needs no profound knowledge of human nature to see what this must lead to. I take it to be almost as certain as any of the immutable laws of the physical world that where there is power of rapid eviction there will be rack-renting. It cannot be denied that the landlords have the power of rack-renting, and what we want to do is to take this power from them and from their heirs and successors in ownership. It is a standing menace to the happiness of the farmers—that is, to the happiness of 4,000,000 of people; to the quiet enjoyment of their property, which may at any moment be confiscated by an undue increase of rent; to the safety of the State, by placing in the hands of a small class a controlling influence which must be injurious to public liberty. So overpowering is the terror with which the prospect of eviction inspires the farmers, from the fact that, generally speaking, they are very poor men, that they silently submit themselves to burdens with which they struggle through life rather than expose themselves to the dreadful consequences that rapidly and inevitably follow any serious opposition to the wishes of the landlords. From a practical, common-sense point of view what may we assume as most likely to be the nature of the rent of the tenant who has to choose between agreeing to the rent proposed to him or relinquishing his only means of providing for the support of himself and his family? We are bound to assume as reasonable men that a rent agreed to by a tenant so situated will be unfair in its nature, and the dilemma I have mentioned is one which the occupiers of Ireland, with scarcely an exception, have presented to them. The power of rapid eviction and the ruin which eviction entails form a lever with which the landlord can raise his rent to any height he pleases. The knowledge that he has this instrument at his command banishes the idea of resistance from the mind of the tenant, who falls back upon the most abject submission as the only policy he can with safety pursue. I may be told that the landlords do not and will not avail themselves of the facilities the law offers them for oppressing the farmers by exorbitant exactions. Can I be told they have not done so? And if I cannot, what guarantee can be given that they will not do so again? When the rack-renter has been found out—no one is so devoid of decency as to defend him. All admit that he has done wrong—that he has committed an act that ought never to be repeated—that any honest man will avoid. The idea suggested to the public mind is that of an impoverished man from whom another has extorted money, to which he had no right, by means which are technically legal, but which are felt by all to be a gross outrage upon justice. The threat of eviction is the means employed, often used directly, always implied. Sir, is it not impossible to resist the conclusion that it is the duty of those responsible for the happiness and welfare of the people to prevent the perpetration of those acts? Of one thing at all events I am certain—that the Irish people believe this to be the duty of a Government claiming their confidence. Rack-renting is an evil of long standing. In the correspondence of the Duke of Wellington, when Chief Secretary, with the Chiefs of his Administration, I find numerous references to the exorbitant rents—that is the phrase he used—which the landlords endeavoured to exact. But then eviction had not been made easy—it was always a difficult matter, often an impossibility; and rack-renting frequently resulted in great accumulation of arrears, in periodical seizures of the tenant's stock, and in embarrassment often not very unfairly distributed between landlord and tenant. Although the House cannot be so oblivious of the past as to receive with incredulity the statement that Irish landlords are capable of rack-renting, I shall refer to two or three recent cases which in the shape of appeals came before Chief Justice Morris at the Spring Assizes, 1876, in Armagh. John Warnock, a tenant on the Harte estate, held a farm at a yearly rent of £10 8s. The entire holding had been reclaimed by himself and his father, and the fact was not disputed. He was served with a notice increasing the rent to £15 per annum. In the Court below the Chairman suggested, by way of compromise, that the tenant should pay £12 10s. 3d., but he rejected the offer and was refused any compensation. On the hearing of the appeal the Judge suggested a rent of £11 8s. The claimant said he would pay that rent sooner than leave his farm; but the agent said he could not agree to it. During the hearing of the appeal the Judge made some very strong remarks on the case, and said he did not see the justice of charging a man for his own improvements by an increased rent, when he had reclaimed his holding and put up all buildings on it. In Meath, on the estate of Lord Gormanstown, there has been considerable rent raising. The tenants at first resisted, but when four were evicted the remainder had to succumb, the increase varying from 19 to 100 per cent over Griffith's valuation. I will detain the House while I give Griffith's valuation, the present rent of seven tenants on the estate of Captain Humphrey, in the county of Kilkenny, and the rent demanded:—Wm. Tynbol—Griffith's valuation, including buildings erected by tenant, £34; present rent, £49; rent demanded, £76. James Pool—Griffith's valuation, including buildings erected by tenant, £37; present rent, £57 17s. 10d.; rent demanded, £77 4s. Widow Shelly—Griffith's valuation, including buildings erected by tenant, £14; present rent, £20 4s. 4d.; rent demanded, £29 4s. 4d. Thomas Lalor—Griffith's valuation, including buildings erected by tenant, £12; present rent, £16 16s.; rent demanded, £25. Robert Shane—Griffith's valuation, including buildings erected by tenant, £33; present rent, £53 5s.; rent demanded, £68 1s. Michael Dwyer—Griffith's valuation, including buildings erected by tenant, £7 18s.; present rent, £7 19s.; rent demanded, £28. John Comerford—Griffith's valuation, including buildings erected by tenant, £19 15s.; present rent, £29 7s.; rent demanded, £35. The tenants will have to comply with these exorbitant demands or quit their homes. Upon the property of Mrs. O'Brien, of Ballinasloe, 11 tenants are under notice to quit for refusing to agree to increased rent. One of them is a man named Killan. Griffith's valuation of his holding is £13 10s.; his present rent is £23 15s. 2d.; and the rent demanded is £43. An increase of rent varying very little from this is demanded in the other 10 cases. Of course, the tenants must pay or go. In all the cases I have referred to the improvements had been wholly affected by the tenants. No doubt before this debate closes many other instances of rack-renting will be cited; but the House must keep before it the fact that the tenants are afraid to complain, and do not like to be referred to specifically. Let the House remember that the only cases of rack-renting that meet the public eye are those in which the tenant actually breaks down. Until he falls under his load nothing is known of his misfortunes outside his own circle. There cannot, however, be a doubt that multitudes of farmers in Ireland are in a tottering state from the excessive rents which they are forced to undertake; and that this must continue till an impartial tribunal has been established to which the tenant can appeal against the exactions of the landlord. It seems to me that we have reached a point at which the Legislature, in order to give proper effect to its own actions—in order to prevent their being nullified—must take away from the landlord the power he now exercises of himself fixing the rent he will have. We know that this power has constantly been abused in the past. It would be a renunciation of the faculty of reasoning not to infer that it will be abused in the future; and I feel that I would be guilty of a suppression of the truth if I did not express my firm conviction that at this moment it is being abused in innumerable instances. The Act of 1870 declared the improvements made by the tenant to be absolutely his property—that is, that he alone is entitled to derive any pecuniary benefit from them. This being so, is it not highly probable that, since the passing of the Act of 1870, every increase in the rent of an improving tenant has been an appropriation by the landlord of property declared by Parliament to be the tenant's? Whenever rent is raised, no matter what the real reason may be, some plausible reason must, at all events, be assigned for the proceeding. No one has the effrontery to say, point blank—“I want money for this, that, or the other purpose; I want money to meet this, that, or the other liability.” If the reason given is the improved condition of the farm there is an open violation of the Act of Parliament, and appropriation of the tenant's property. It may be said the improvements made by the tenant have had nothing to do with the proposed increase of rent—it is looked for solely in consequence of the rise in prices. But, Sir, this does not dispose of the difficulty, because the quantity and quality of the commodities produced in the case of each particular farm will have been increased and enhanced by the improvements of the tenant, so that, even when the rise in rent is ostensibly based upon prices, the greatest precautions must be taken to prevent encroachment upon the property of the tenant. It is clear that the sum derived from the increased productiveness of the farm and the enhanced value of the commodities produced upon it is the property of the tenant, as it is the result of his improvements. I ask, is there not a manifest necessity for the establishment of some means of fairly deciding the questions which, since the passing of the Act of 1870, must arise whenever a landlord proceeds to raise his rent? If a dispute occurs between landlord and tenant as to the fact of improvements having been made, or as to their value, what chance under the present system has the tenant of maintaining his view in opposition to that of the landlord? The landlord says that there are no improvements at all, or that they are only worth so much. The tenant says the improvements are considerable, and that their value is so much. If the tenant insists upon getting the fair value of what he believes to be his own—that is, if he insists upon the rent not being raised to a point which will give the landlord the benefit of the improvements, he does so at the peril of being driven from his home, and as this is a peril which no man who loves his wife and children can encounter, what comes to pass is this—the tenant's property is confiscated, the intentions of Parliament are defeated by the superior authority of the landlord, and the tenant naturally resolves that he will not exhaust his strength nor his capital in labour of which the fruits are to be enjoyed by another, and that other, his landlord. It is evident that, under the operation of the Act of 1870, difficult and delicate questions must arise touching the tendency of increased rent to absorb the property of the tenant; and is it in accordance with received notions of fair play, with the ordinary method of transacting business, that the decision of these questions should be left absolutely to one of the parties interested? I venture to say that if the parties concerned did not happen to be an Irish landlord and an Irish tenant there would be a general agreement that to leave the decision of a dispute involving the title to property to one of the parties interested was simply to give the property to the person to whom the decision of the dispute was left. Let me impress upon the House that the Irish farmer does not, as is pretended, object to pay rent, but that what he does object to is, in the first place, to pay rent which is not solely based upon the value of the produce of the land, and, in the next place, that he objects to such an increase of rent as will deprive him of the benefit of improvements which he knows, and which Parliament declares, to be his property. But what is his position? It is this—that he cannot assert his claim to his property without running the serious risk of being turned out of his farm. Surely it is nothing short of mockery—and of wilful mockery Parliament could not even be suspected—to tell the Irish farmers that the improvements made by them are their property, and then to turn round and tell the landlords they may evict the tenants who resist the confiscation of that property by the imposition of an excessive rent. I cannot see how Parliament can sanction the eviction of tenants under such circumstances without stultifying itself, without being exposed to the charge of the grossest inconsistency, without admitting the truth of the statement that the provisions of the Act of 1870, which declare the improvements of the tenant to be his property, are so much waste paper until the tenant has been evicted. Until this time arrives the tenant as the law now stands can lay no claim to his improvements. When this calamity has befallen him he may, after a desperate wrangle, get something. Those who are acquainted with the work of the Land Act must acknowledge that it does nothing whatever to secure for the farmers the ownership of their improvements till, as I have already pointed out, they are no longer occupiers of the soil. Is not this a glaring defect in the Act of 1870, and is Parliament not bound to find a remedy? Under the Act, as it works at present, a farmer stands a chance of getting something after he has been evicted. What is it that we want to do? We want to amend the Act, so as to secure for the tenant the enjoyment of his improvements while he continues in occupation, by preventing the landlord from appropriating those improvements wholly or in part by an increase of rent. He has no right to take the smallest portion of what belongs to the tenant. The Act of 1870 provides that, in certain cases, it is open to the Court to consider the character of the rent for non-payment of which the tenant has been evicted. If the Court considers the rent unfair, it must impose upon the landlord for having been guilty of eviction, a fine, which the law has fixed at a very limited amount, and which the Court may still further limit at its discretion. What is it we seek to do? We seek to amend the Act, so that in no case shall the landlord have the power of evicting while the tenant pays a fair rent, and we propose to give the tenant the right of referring the decision of the question what is a fair rent to a tribunal equally representing landlord and tenant. As the House is aware, the tenant has hitherto had no voice in the decision of the vital question—What is a fair rent? The landlord makes up his mind what he will have; the tenant has to pay or go, and this in itself ought to satisfy everyone who realizes what are the consequences of eviction to Irish tenants, who know how industrious they are, that in the vast majority of cases of eviction for non-payment of rent under such conditions of assessment, the tenant is the victim of unjust demands. If it be true that the number of evictions for non-payment of rent as compared with the number of holdings is not great, the reason is that the farmer, knowing to what eviction certainly leads, makes almost superhuman efforts to meet his engagements, and clings to his land with the tenacity of a drowning man to the plank which affords him his only chance of life. I believe that I am strictly accurate in stating that it is only after a hard struggle, that the vast majority of Irish tenants are able to pay their rents, and that they have to deny themselves and their families many of the necessities of life in order to be able to do this. Is not this the inevitable result of a system that enables the landlord to fix his rent irrespective of the value of the produce of the land—of a system that permits him to settle his rent, to meet liabilities he may have incurred, that he may have inherited, that he may have had imposed upon him—of a system that enables him to apply to the occupier the spur of competition, and threaten him with such a dreadful weapon as rapid eviction. Sir, there is no getting rid of this fact—that the power the landlord exercises of determining the rent he will have renders the Land Act almost useless in three out of the four Provinces of Ireland. In the words of Chief Justice Morris, the landlord can charge the tenant for his own improvements by putting increased rent upon him. It is plain, then, that as long as this can be done, the portion of the Act which declares the improvements made by the tenant to be his property is so much waste paper. The state of the case is simply and shortly this—that the tenant has to choose between eviction or submitting quietly to the appropriation of his improvements by the landlord. But in every way the Act of 1870 is rendered worthless by the rent-raising power of the landlord. In 1870 a Select Committee of this House recommended the division of rates between owner and occupier. The Act of 1870 enacts that in all new lettings of agricultural and pastoral holdings the Grand Jury cess shall be divided between landlord and tenant. This sounds very well, but there is not a tenant in Ireland who is not convinced that the landlord will add the barony and county rate to the new rent, and I for one do not entertain a doubt that every burden imposed by the State upon the landlord will be transferred by him to the tenant at the earliest possible opportunity. There is the case of the National teachers. The Government are anxious to add to their emoluments, and propose a rate, to be equally divided between owner and occupier. The occupiers cannot be got to entertain the proposal, because they feel certain that eventually they will have the whole of the rate thrown upon them, no matter what may be its amount. The House may rest assured that the landlord will never allow his income to be diminished as long as he can raise his rent at pleasure. We admit that the principles underlying the provisions of the Act of 1870 are admirable, and also the arrangements for the equal division of burdens between landlord and tenant; but what is wanting is an independent system of arbitration to insure to the tenant the advantage of those principles and those excellent arrangements, and an authoritative declaration of the Legislature which will put an end to what all professedly condemn—the eviction of a tenant who is willing to pay a fair rent. Sir, the Irish farmers are making strenuous efforts to push the principles of the Act of 1870 to their natural conclusion. The tenantright movement was never so vigorous as it is now; and this is owing not, as some affirm, to the machinations of designing agitators, but to the recent acquisition by the farmers of a share of political influence, and to their determination to use that influence for the most legitimate of all purposes—the protection of themselves and their property. The farmers see with alarm that their property can by an increase of rent be appropriated by the landlords, and certainly their apprehensions have not been diminished by the Valuation Bill of Her Majesty's Government. The Schedule giving the prices upon which the valuation is to be based leads the farmers to think that the object of the Government is to make the valuation as high as possible. They do not object to a fair valuation; but experience has taught them that a high valuation must have a tendency to increase rent, because the landlords have laid it down as an axiom—and I challenge them to deny it—that the valuation cannot be taken as representing the letting value of the land. It is true that the valuation represents the value of the land calculated upon the prices the farmer obtains for his commodities. There is, however, a fancy value which the land acquires from the forcing qualities of competition and the threat of eviction—30, 50, 100, often 200 per cent above what must be admitted to be its real value—and this fancy value, from long habit, the landlords have come to claim as their lawful perquisite. Sir, I have to apologize to the House for having occupied their attention so long; but I hope I have said something to show that I did not put my Notice on the Paper without some reason, and that there are grounds for the active interference of Parliament. I shall only refer for a moment to what the legislation of 1870 was intended to accomplish. It was intended to check eviction; it was intended to give the tenant an indefeasible title to his improvements. The provisions respecting improvements evidently had a three-fold object—in the first place, to prevent the landlord from committing, what the late Lord Clarendon described as a felonious act, by appropriating the property of the tenant; in the next place, to stimulate the exertions of the tenant, by assuring him that he would reap the full reward of his labour; and, lastly, to serve the whole community by that increased productiveness which it was thought must result from the renovated industry of the tenant. Well, Sir, it has been proved by Returns made to this House that eviction has not been checked, and all who have any knowledge of Ireland are aware that the landlord evicts with as much rapidity as he ever did, and incurs no pecuniary loss whatever by eviction. It is absurd to say that the provisions of the Act of 1870 respecting improvements have succeeded, seeing that the tenant cannot avail himself of them till he is, in fact, no longer an occupier. Rent-raising is going on all over the country, and the landlords are making as free with the improvements of the tenant as if the Act of 1870 had never been passed, and as if the tenant had no more right to resist the appropriation of his improvements by the landlord than to oppose the sale of the fee-simple interest. The tenant, therefore, sees that now, as formerly, he is working altogether for the landlord, so far as improvements are concerned, and there is an absence of that incentive of self-interest to which Parliament looked to rouse the farmers to efforts of which men only are capable when they feel that their labour will result in lasting advantage to themselves. But, Sir, the defeat of the Act of 1870 has not merely been injurious to the occupiers—that defeat affects the whole community prejudicially by retarding the development of the agricultural resources of Ireland. Since the improvement of the soil of Ireland mainly depends upon the occupiers, it becomes the duty of the Government to afford them every encouragement to put forth their whole powers, and to remove every obstacle to their doing so. As a class, the owners of land are too poor to do more than now and then put up a gate or slate a house. Here and there one meets through the country what is called an improving landlord, but he is held in abhorrence by the people, who have learned from bitter experience that the improvements of the improving landlord are not intended to confer any permanent good on the occupiers. The improving landlord is regarded as a man who wishes to be in a position to say—"I have done these things myself; you have no claim upon me, no hold upon the soil, and no right to complain if at any moment I turn you out and get another tenant." The occupiers do not ask to have the land improved for them; on the contrary, their most earnest desire is to improve it themselves, on the understanding that the right to live on the land and enjoy the improvements shall be guaranteed to them and their children. It was thought the Act of 1870 would have done this, and no doubt this would have been its natural effect. The farmers never imagined that Parliament, after declaring the improvements made by them to be their property, would allow them to be evicted for resisting an increase of rent which is virtually a confiscation of that property. I submit that the Act of 1870 renders it impossible, morally impossible, for Parliament to sanction the eviction of tenants for the non-payment of such rent, and that Parliament is bound to confer upon the tenant the right of referring to arbitration all disputes with his landlord relating to rent. In this way alone can the improvements of the tenant be secured against confiscation. Sir, that Ireland is England's difficulty is a phrase so hackneyed that I am almost ashamed to repeat it. The staleness may be somewhat relieved by giving what I have not very often seen assigned—the cause of the difficulty. No one who has studied the history of Ireland can doubt that the oppression of the occupying tenantry by the landlords has made Ireland England's difficulty. So long has Parliament sanctioned this oppression that the belief is universal and deeply imbedded in the popular mind that England prefers gratifying the cupidity and upholding the sway of landlordism to securing the happiness of the great body of the people. You know that from time to time the conscience of the nation is startled by the revelation of deeds that have been done beneath a very smooth surface. The public gaze is fixed with horror upon the scene and the actors. There is an abundant outpouring of pity, of generous indignation—and all is quiet again. The spirit of the age, the searching properties of a free Press, suggest the necessity for caution, for temporary moderation, for temporary abstention from overt acts of sheer tyranny; but all the while the farmers feel that they are held as in a vice, which may at any moment be pressed upon them. I am anxious to release them from this miserable condition, in order to insure the happiness of Ireland, to satisfy the requirements of justice, and lay the foundation of a thorough union between the inhabitants of the Three Kingdoms. I beg to offer my Resolution to the House.

MR. ERRINGTON, in rising to second the Motion of his hon. Friend (the O'Donoghue), said, it was a matter of sincere congratulation that this form had been chosen for bringing the question forward, for though long acquaintance with the evils of the present land system in Ireland sometimes led him to fear that some solution might ultimately be needed more radical than anything contained in the terms of this Motion; still he felt that if they desired to do anything useful or practical in the House on this question it could only be by proceeding as tentatively and judiciously as possible. Now, he could conceive no course more judicious and none more thoroughly in accordance with the best spirit of their Parliamentary usage than for his hon. Friend to take his stand as he did on the Land Act of 1870; and when he (Mr. Errington) remembered that the principle of that Act was affirmed by the united action of both sides of that House, and when he remembered the long and anxious discussions which took place in order to make its provisions as effective as possible to carry out its principle, then he could not help believing that when they were obliged, as they now were, to come down to the House, and say—"We accepted that Act hopefully and thankfully; so far as they went, its provisions were excellent; we have tried them fairly for six years, we find them insufficient; we therefore ask you to extend and amend them in such and such ways," they would have that consideration which the House always gave to important matters when treated in a business-like way. These then appeared to be the three practical points into which the question divided itself, and the burden of proof of which might fairly be said to rest on them. They must first confirm and strengthen the admission made in 1870, but since often denied, that the agrarian condition of Ireland was so exceptional as to need some exceptional treatment; second, they must show that the Act of 1870 had failed to afford the necessary exceptional treatment; and, third, they must be prepared to propose such amendments as should effect their purpose, and at the same time they must satisfy the House that such amendments would not injuriously affect other interests, which he for one could never consent to sacrifice. His hon. Friend had, in his interesting and eloquent speech, so fully dealt with the two first of these points, that he (Mr. Errington) desired to say a few words on the last, the more so as it was of vital importance that once for all the House and country should realize how broad and sound were the foundations of the question, and how entirely genuine was this demand. It was often said this demand was the result of a spurious agitation. Nothing could be further from the fact. Of course there was agitation connected with it; but he wished to know what question could in these days be important or popular without becoming the centre for agitation? Why should this question be an exception? It was the same as with Petitions to the House. If an hon. Member was seen staggering up under a load of Petitions, he was told that his signatures had been obtained by a careful organization, and, therefore they did not mean anything; on the other hand, if no Petitions were presented, then he was told no one cared for his Bill; in the same way, if there were not agitation, they would be told the people of Ireland did not take much interest in this question. He was now going to state a fact, which he believed was patent to every one who knew Ireland, when he said that the people of Ireland were asking, not for something merely which they wished to have, not for something which they hoped the House of Commons would some day give them, but for something which they were convinced actually belonged to them. This was the perfectly honest and genuine expression of the national conscience. Now he did not contend that every expression of national feeling or conviction, no matter how genuine or universal, must always be accepted as conclusive of the justice of the demand; but he did say this, that when that feeling could be shown to rest on, and be confirmed by, a long course of historical and other circumstances, he did not know to what tribunal they could appeal against its justice. Fortunately

they were now in a position to account for, and justify this feeling most completely. New and curious evidence had recently become available, and it had been developed in the most convincing manner by some of the greatest living authorities, among whom he need only mention the name of Sir Henry Maine. Now, when he remembered how many persons there were in and out of the House who, anxious to take a fair and kind view of Irish affairs, yet owing to ignorance of facts, were apt to regard this demand of theirs as savouring somewhat of Communism, as founded rather on vague theories of the future than on solid facts of the past, he at once felt the great importance of this justification and asked attention to it for a moment. Up to the time when English law was finally introduced into Ireland, the land, by Irish laws, was divided between the numerous Chiefs and the members and families of the various tribes and clans. But owing to the circumstances of the time, the wealth of the Chief consisted far more in cattle and sheep than in land; hence arose a curious custom known as "giving" and "taking stock," and to this they could point with absolute certainty as the origin of the present relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland. Sometimes, owing to poverty or distress, sometimes to the direct power of the Chief, the independent tribesman was compelled to accept a certain quantity of cattle or sheep from the Chief and to pay him in return a tribute or rent in kind. This established a relation of dependence between them, which was regulated down the minutest of details; but what he wished to call attention to was, that, in this contract, it was the tenant who contributed the land—the Chief only contributed the stock; and that all through the details to which he alluded they found no allusion to any power of eviction, which, doubtless, did not exist. He would venture to quote a few words from Sir Henry Maine, who on this subject observed—

"The rent in kind, or food rent, which was thus proportioned to the stock received undoubtedly developed in time to a rent payable in respect of the tenant's land; but it certainly is a curious and unexpected fact that the rent of the class which is believed to have embraced a very large part of the ancient Irish tenantry, did not, in its earliest form correspond in any way to the value of the tenant's land, but solely to the value of the Chiefs property deposited with the tenant."

There was, however, another feature in the picture. In addition to his own share of land the Chief had certain rights over the waste lands of the tribe, and used to settle on them the waifs and strays and outcasts from other tribes, who became his dependents in a very absolute manner; they were called "Fuidhirs"; the power of the Chief over them was recognized and sanctioned to an extreme degree in these old laws; but even in this case we find no mention of eviction. Gradually as the power of the Chief increased, the position of the more independent class first alluded to called "Saer" and "Daer Ceiles" became degraded and assimilated in many respects to that of the "Fuidhirs"; but even still there was no mention of eviction. Now, when by the end of the sixteenth century all the Irish estates had been either confiscated or surrendered to the English Crown, and re-granted subject to English law, of course the landlords obtained the power of eviction; but he contended that at least over a considerable part of Ireland, and for a long period more than 150 years, this right was little exercised. And the reason was clear. The population was so exceedingly small, that though a tenant might be oppressed, he was too valuable to turn out. But this was not the only landlord's right which was to a certain extent in abeyance. It was known that almost indefinite sub-division of farms took place. This was due partly to political objects, but also, and still more, to the neglect and carelessness of Irish landlords in the management of their properties. Provided the tenant paid a certain amount of rent, he might sub-let, sub-divide, and do almost as he pleased with his land; in fact, exercise over it those rights which in England not only belonged to the landlord, but were always most jealously guarded and exercised by him. Now, he contended that this practical non-user for so long of many rights by the landlord, and their user by the tenant, went far to justify the traditional belief of the tenant in the permanent character of his occupation. But there was another point which tended in the same direction. In England the landlord always provided buildings, fences, gates, and other permanent works for cultivation of the farm, and kept them in repair; in Ireland, on the contrary, all this had to be found by the tenant. This was usually cited as an argument in favour of giving the Irish tenant compensation for his improvements; but to his (Mr. Errington's) mind it had a deeper significance, for it went far to set up the presumption that a tenure under such circumstances was more permanent than if the tenant had, as in England, stepped into a farm with everything ready to his hand. This might be illustrated by the difference they all felt in the present day between taking a furnished or an unfurnished house; and naturally the Irish tenant would have the same feeling when he saw all the wretched comforts and accommodation he had, had grown up under his hands, or by the work of his family, perhaps for generations. Now, as population increased, had there been, as in England, other outlets for it besides agriculture, such as trade and manufactures, none of these difficulties would have arisen. As in England some of these rights would have crystallized into a sort of copyhold, others would have disappeared, but by a process not harsh, because not stimulated by undue pressure. This was not so, however, and one of the reasons undoubtedly was the policy of England, which to protect its own trade, passed a series of laws intended to, and which had the effect of destroying all Irish trade. He did not say that Ireland would ever have been a very flourishing commercial country—certainly it could never have competed with England; but the laws to which he alluded undoubtedly did suppress several very promising branches of industry. He did not say this from any spirit of recrimination. He trusted the days of bitterness were past, and that Englishmen and Irishmen could now look back to the past, with regret, of course, but chiefly with a desire to join in remedying its results. And now he would ask—could there be a stronger chain of evidence than this he had adduced, to justify the traditional belief, which he asserted still existed in the mind of the Irish tenant, that he had a moral right at least to some security of occupation? And could they wonder that when increase of population caused the landlords to assert, often harshly, their sometimes long dormant and always questioned rights, they were met by this traditional belief, strengthened by what soon became a fearful struggle for existence, and that after years of a history too sad to look back to, the country now found itself in a state of chronic, and, as far as he could see, hopeless uncertainty and dissatisfaction? This was no mere Communistic theory; it was a hard and stern reality which lowered the value of all property, and affected the interests, not of tenants only, not only of Irishmen, but of all who were concerned in the welfare and advancement of every portion of the Empire. But, after all, to what practical conclusion did this lead? Why, simply to this—it placed them face to face with two sets of equal and conflicting rights. If this was not an exceptional state of things, requiring exceptional treatment, he did not know what was. It clearly was a case for compromise, if ever there was one. After all, the case might be worse. Instead of being merely conflicting, these rights might be contradictory and absolutely irreconcilable. In that case they would be obliged to stand by and see one or other of these rights sacrificed. They had already stood by too long. The policy of sacrificing one of these rights had failed in the past, and there was no reason to hope it would succeed in the future. That was why he urged most strongly that this compromise be accepted. But he would be told the Act of 1870 was a compromise. It was a well-meant attempt at a compromise, but his hon. Friend had shown clearly how that attempt had failed; he had also pointed out how it should be made effective. He would only observe—having already too long trespassed on the time of the House—that the compromise of 1870 was meant by a graduated scale of payments to discourage eviction on the part of the landlord, and to compensate the tenant for such eviction if it took place. In both these points the Act had failed. The money fine was totally inadequate to prevent the landlord who was determined to do so from evicting his tenant; and the more he considered the case the more he felt that no mere sum of money could compensate the Irish tenant for eviction, unless the sum was so large as to be virtually prohibitive of all eviction. In that case he far preferred to accept the straightforward proposal of his hon. Friend, and to say that no eviction should take place, in the case of small residential farmers, except for non-payment of rent. It followed that the rent must be adjusted by some system of arbitration. This did not, in practice, offer any real difficulty. He would be content to leave the matter to be settled by two arbitrators, one to be named by the landlord, one by the tenant; with reference, as umpire, to the Chairman of the County. He would add one word as to the fairness of this compromise; for, as he had observed, it was incumbent on them to show that their proposals would not injuriously affect the landlord. It was usually said that everyone who spoke on this side of the question must be either a tenant or entirely unconnected with land. Now, he (Mr. Errington) spoke as an Irish landlord who had more than 10 years' practical experience with all the details of managing property and receiving rents personally, and he had no hesitation in saying that this proposal would increase the value of property. It would do so in three ways: 1st. The security they proposed to give would encourage the tenant to improve his farm, and to expend, in doing so, the money which—if he had it—was now, for want of such security, left idle in the banks; thus, the landlord would obtain a better security for his rent. 2nd. It would render a fair increase of rent much easier to obtain. The power of raising rents had been so grossly abused, that even the fair use of that power was now difficult and odious. He had quite enough faith in the honesty of this demand to believe what the tenants always asserted in public and private—that they had no desire or expectation of having their land at unduly low rents, but only asked to be protected from the risk of having their rents exorbitantly raised. He had no doubt that, after a few years of this compromise, not only would his tenants be much better off, but his own income would be much increased. The third point was, as to the selling or capitalized value of land. Hon. Members from Scotland and England could have little idea of the absurdly low value at present of real property in Ireland. He ventured, though reluctantly, to cite an instance of his own, as affording a striking contrast. Within the last two years property of his had been sold in an out-of-the-way part of England, high up in the dales, six miles from a railway station, without special local advantages, for prices varying from 35 to 42 years' purchase, on a revised rental. Now, if he wished to sell property in Ireland, much better circumstanced, with a good solvent tenantry, he would be too happy to accept 20 or 21 years' purchase. This was a strange difference. He could only attribute it to the chronic state of uncertainty and dissatisfaction arising from the conflict of the two rights to which he had alluded. There was no prospect that this would improve by leaving things alone; and, therefore, he strongly urged the acceptance of this moderate proposal. He would now strike the balance of the compromise. The landlord would lose a right which, fortunately, few landlords thought it right to exercise, and which fewer still found it in the long run profitable to exercise. It was a right of which he might say with regard to landlord and tenants—"It not enriches him, and makes them poor indeed." On the other hand, the landlord would gain—1st. Increased security for his rent; 2nd. A fair and easy increase of rent; 3rd. An increased capitalized or selling value for his property. If this was confiscation of the landlord's property, all he could say was the sooner such confiscation took place the better.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, in order to ensure to the Irish tenantry the benefits intended to be conferred on them by the Land Act of 1870, it is essential that steps should be taken to prevent the exaction of rents which virtually confiscate the improvements declared by that Act to be the property of the tenant, and also that steps should be taken to prevent the eviction of tenants for refusing to submit to such rents,"—

—instead thereof.

MR. PLUNKET confessed he was disappointed in listening to the speech the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue). For several reasons he had expected the hon. Member to take a course different from that he had pursued. Having listened to his speech, and to the most fair and conciliatory address they had just heard from the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Errington), he was obliged to suppose that the Motion was merely a peg upon which to hang those speeches, which failed to come off on the occasion when the second reading of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick was debated. The speeches were now directed to a simpler proposal than the proposed Bill.

THE O'DONOGHUE: As the remarks of the hon. Gentleman appear to be directed to me, I may be allowed to say that if he means I wanted to deliver my speech on the occasion to which it referred, he is quite mistaken.

MR. PLUNKET could not, of course, state what had been the intentions of the hon. Gentleman in reference to the debate on the Bill of his hon. and learned Friend, but there was not anyone who heard his speech that evening but would admit that it would have been an effective and pertinent one if delivered on the occasion to which he referred, though he took leave to say it was more violent than any of the speeches made on that former occasion. He very much regretted that his hon. Friend the Member for Kerry (Mr. Herbert) was not present to reply to that speech, as he was one of those improving landlords who were, as they had been told by the hon. Gentleman, held in detestation by their tenants. He had never heard greater—he must use the word—rubbish uttered in Parliament. He knew not what might be the hon. Gentleman's motives in attacking the Irish landlords as he had done; but he supposed he would not be wrong if he regarded what he had now said as a reconciliation speech, because while he was listening to it there came back to his ears the echoes of another speech which the hon. Member for Tralee made in that House in 1874 on the Motion for Home Rule. The memory of that address had not faded from his mind. He would not refer to parts of it which might be regarded as attacks on hon. Gentlemen opposite, but would give a passage from it which was typical of its general tone and tenour. In resisting the Motion for Home Rule on the 2nd of July, 1874, the hon. Member for Tralee observed that—

"The whole fabric of Government was attacked, Parliament was pointed at as the very fountain of evil, and the voice of hate was poured unceasingly upon the popular ear, so that the most beneficent acts of legislation were like seed scattered upon barren or stony soil. The Imperial Parliament thought it had done a great thing when it passed the Church and Land Acts, and he was of the same opinion; but the orators of the Home Rule Association were at their posts, and shouted into the ear of the people that those Acts were concessions to fear, and thus called on the nation to gird itself for a final and crowning effort of intimidation.—[3 Hansard, ccxx. 929.]

That evening, however, they were told by the same hon. Member that under the Land Act of 1870, which did so much good three or four years ago, the Irish landlords had not ceased from their old evil ways, but had entirely defeated the good effects of that "most beneficent legislation." ["Hear, hear!" from below the Gangway.] He was glad that he had extorted from hon. Gentlemen opposite, by a single sentence, a more hearty cheer than they had accorded to the whole speech of the hon. Member for Tralee. But that hon. Member went a little further. He was not content with assailing the landlords. The hon. Gentleman said that every speech made and every word used in that House was watched, read, and remembered in Ireland, and he went on to tell the people of that country that they resisted and were hostile to the British Government because it was supposed to have done nothing to mitigate the oppression of the Irish landlords. It would be an utter waste of time to contrast the speech to which they had just listened with that which the hon. Gentleman delivered in 1874, and he would therefore pass away from the question of the hon. Gentleman's inconstancy. But what did the Motion now before the House come to? What was the drift of the speech of the hon. Member for Tralee? It was that the landlords of Ireland, without a single exception, had defeated the good intentions of the Act of 1870. That was a grave and serious charge to make. On what did the hon. Member found the assertion? He referred to three cases—only three—of which he had never heard before. Had no efforts been made to obtain cases on which to found such attacks? A circular had been issued by the Committee of the Central Association of Tenant Farmers calling on the people of Ireland to furnish any materials that could be collected to sustain charges of this nature. There was no want of machinery for that purpose. In fact, there was a club in every village of Ireland that could be brought into requisition. Yet, after all, only three cases had been cited. It was impossible for anyone to reply to such charges of which no Notice had been given. He was not prepared to say there could not have been such cases; but he was not prepared to admit them until he knew all the surrounding circumstances. Did the hon. Member never think that it would be but fair to give the landlords of Ireland the chance of clearing their character? Such a course was unjust in the highest degree, and could not advance the cause of those who resorted to it. The hon. Member for Tralee, founding his Motion on those three cases, maintained that—

"in order to ensure to the Irish tenantry the benefits intended to be conferred on them by the Land Act of 1870, it is essential that steps should be taken to prevent the exaction of rents which virtually confiscate the improvements declared by that Act to be the property of the tenant, and also that steps should be taken to prevent the eviction of tenants for refusing to submit to such rents."

The hon. Member for Tralee had pointed out no better plan for accomplishing the objects intended to be secured by the Land Act of 1870; he simply asserted before the House and the country that the improvement intended to be secured to the tenantry of Ireland by the Act of 1870 had not been effected. He gave no proof whatever of his assertion; without adducing a tittle of evidence he left the grievance alleged without the suggestion of any remedy. He believed there were very few cases indeed of what the hon. Member alleged to be the practice of a general raising of rents in Ireland; there was no proof of the existence of the grievance the hon. Member had endeavoured to make out. But, supposing there was, why bring it before the House, unless he was prepared to suggest some practical remedy? The hon. Member said the landlords of Ireland had always been rack-renting, and there was no hope for the tenantry except fixity of tenure at valued rents. He did not deny that at a former period, some 30 or 40 years ago, there were cases of rack-rent, though these were by no means general; but what were the circumstances, what was the state of the country at that time? The landlords as a class were almost as poverty-stricken as the wretched te-nantry themselves. The energies of Ireland were stifled by an overwhelming population, which, as an agricultural country, it had not power to support. There were at that time 8,000,000 of people, where there were now only 4,000,000; so that if there were two men doing the work and eating the bread of one, both would be half employed and half starved. Men resorted to reckless means to extricate themselves from this condition, and the results were crime and outrage, repression and punishment. Reference was often made to the times of famine, fever, and emigration, and, though they occurred in his youth, he had a fearful recollection of them—they were, indeed, so sad and terrible that they could not be depicted in language too gloomy and terrible. But out of famine and pestilence Providence had brought plenty and happiness, for those who went away had found an honest market for their labour, and had prospered all over the world, leaving room and the means of living to those who remained. No doubt they went with aching hearts from the land of their birth, and although they could not but refer to their departure with sorrow and regret, let them not hide from themselves the blessing which came after the curse, and when they found Ireland was more happy, more prosperous, and more contented than it was, let them recall those evil times and sad memories in order to contrast with them the brightness of the present. Not only had the tenantry improved, but the same progress was evident in the condition of the upper classes. There had been no more eloquent delineator of the improved condition of Ireland than the hon. Member for Tralee himself in 1874. Formerly there were rack-renting landlords, steeped all their lives in mortgages, or continually impoverished, and face to face with bankruptcy and disgrace, and no doubt they did exact exorbitant rents from a poor and distressed people. But what had been the operation of the Landed Estates Court? It had released those landlords who were able to stagger through these evil times from their encumbrances. Many a landlord who would have been a good landlord in prosperous times went down; but he was happy to think that many survived that dreadful period, and although the places of those deprived of their property by forced sales had been taken by others who had not always acted in a friendly spirit to their tenants, it was only amongst a very few of even the new class of proprietors that they could find instances of harshness and oppression. He contended that the hon. Member for Tralee had not made out his case, except by the mere assertion that a certain thing would happen. Of course, there might be rack-renting landlords; and, if so, it would be a very bad thing for the tenantry; but might not there be rack-renting landlords in England, and were there not such landlords? He said there were, but they were not going to revolutionize all their land laws, because they succeeded in proving a few cases, and propose a total change in the system of property holding in this country. Neither for a few cases in Ireland were they to tear up by the roots the legislation of 1870, as would be done by the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, to which the hon. Member for Tralee suggested no alternative. He had not made out his case; he had shown no justification or excuse for his attack on the landlords, and, therefore, the House ought, by a decisive vote, which would leave no doubt of its meaning, to express its dissent from the Resolution.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE hoped that, as an English Member, he would be excused for saying a few words on an Irish land question. The emphatic declaration of the House against Home Rule constituted a special reason why a Motion of this character should receive the fullest consideration. He had put on the Order Book a Notice of Motion on an analogous subject, but had not obtained a day for bringing it on, being less successful than the Irish Members, who were singularly fortunate in the ballot. He was glad the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) spoke with approval of the Act of 1870, which was one of the greatest Acts ever passed by the House, considering the difficulties with which the subject was surrounded, for it carried the principle of compensation to the tenant to the very verge of English ideas of the right of property without infringing them. That it had benefited the landlord class was shown by the fact that, whereas the average value of the land sold in the Incumbered Estates Court in 1870 was 16 years' purchase, it was now between 20 and 20½, and it was steadily rising from year to year. Therefore, the landlords had benefited to the extent of an increase of 25 per cent in the value of their land. That the tenants had benefited was shown by the amounts of compensation which they recovered from time to time, which proved that in all cases they now secured the value of the improvements they had made. The time had not arrived, nor was it near, when it would be possible to review the working of the Act, nor would the House, within any reasonable period, accede to either fixity of tenure or rents fixed by independent valuers. While obliged to vote against the Motion, he admitted that some of the remarks of the hon. Member for Tralee were worthy of careful attention. No doubt it was possible notwithstanding the Act of 1870, the object of which was to secure to the tenant the value of his improvements, for the landlord to confiscate those improvements by raising the rent; but it had just been denied that any such cases had occurred. When the Irish Land Bill went to the House of Lords an alteration was made in the case of £15 holdings. If the landlord raised the rent exorbitantly, and the tenant refused to give the amount, it was competent to the Court to give the compensation value for the improvements, but the compensation for disturbance was restricted by the House of Lords to evictions under £15 value. Now, in almost all the cases cited by the hon. Member for Tralee the rental of the farms was over £15, and in many of these cases the rents had been raised 50 and even 100 per cent. He would ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland to re-consider this point and see whether the restriction forced upon that House by the House of Lords should not be altered. Why should there be a different principle for farms above and under £15 value? Another point worthy of the attention of the Government was the failure of the Bright clauses in the Irish Land Act. They were intended to facilitate the purchase by the tenants of the land in their occupation. The total number of purchases under these clauses had been only 500, and the value of the farms did not exceed £500,000. During the last seven years between £8,000,000 and £9,000,000 worth of property had been sold under the operation of the Incumbered Estates Act Court, yet only about 6 per cent of the land held by the occupying tenants had been bought under the Bright clauses. He believed that 250 of these sales were one operation, being purchases by the tenants of a single estate in the North of Ireland. He thought it would be well if the hon. Member for Tralee and those who attacked the Act of 1870 would turn their attention in this direction, instead of attacking the law itself. Similar provisions were made under the Church Disestablishment Act to facilitate the purchase of the Church lands by the tenants occupying them. The clauses in both Acts were practically the same, but the one had been a great success. Not less than two-thirds of the occupying tenants—and they were between 5,000 and 6,000 in number—of the lands of the Irish Church had bought their holdings, which showed that they had money wherewith to buy land. Now, if the same process were adopted upon the Land Act, and if some public func-

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. Gentleman that he had given Notice of a Motion on this subject for a future day, and that it was not competent to him to address the House on the subject of his Motion on the present occasion.

MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE regretted to be out of Order, but he had alluded to the subject because it was almost impossible to bring it on in any other way. He thought the Chief Secretary for Ireland, as well as Irish Members, might advantageously turn his eyes in this direction. It was one which was recommended by simplicity of action and permanency of tenure, and it was in accord with the schemes devised by other countries improving land tenure by converting it wherever possible into proprietorship instead of tenancy. There were many points which had been raised by the hon. Member for Tralee with which he agreed; but, on the whole, the scope of his argument and the tendency of his Resolution were such that he must, however unwillingly, vote against the Motion if it were pressed to a division. The reason why he must do so was because it was directly in conflict with the ideas of English Members in regard to property, and because he had propounded doctrines which it was practically impossible should be adopted by an English House of Commons.

Mr. Shaw-Lefevre

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that the hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Plunket) appeared to be the standing counsel for those who thought that no Amendment was required in the land laws of Ireland. When the hon. and learned Member rose he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) could not help hoping that he was about to move the Amendment of which the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Herbert) had given Notice—namely,

“ That it is expedient that an inquiry should take place before a Royal Commission as to whether any improper exactions of rent have taken place, and generally as to the relations of landlord and tenant in Ireland, and the working of the Land Act of 1870.”

Had he moved that Amendment he would probably have found a majority of the Irish Members voting with him; and certainly, for his own part, he should have desired the withdrawal of the present Motion in its favour, so that the Amendment proposing an inquiry into the subject might be submitted to the House. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Plunket) had entered into a singularly unfortunate line of argument on this question calculated not to bind together the different classes of Irish society, but to separate them. No one could doubt that there was a prevailing sense of insecurity on the part of the Irish tenants. More than that, this sense of insecurity had increased since the Act of 1870, and for this reason—before that Act the law lent no sanction to evictions, but under that Act it was understood that a man might evict a tenant on paying a certain price or paying a certain compensation. The result was that evictions were no longer regarded in the same light as formerly, and were far more often resorted to. It was no longer considered a disgraceful thing to evict a tenant, for the landlord was now regarded as only availing himself of the rights which the law had conferred upon him. He maintained that it was impossible to maintain the same laws for England and for a nation so dissimilar in history, traditions, feelings, and circumstances as Ireland. We recognized in our Colonies the necessity of adopting our land laws to the circumstances of each Colony, and he could not understand why the same system should not be adopted in Ireland. In Ireland the tenure of land had never been a matter of contract. It originated in the tribal relations between Chief and followers. The latter rendered service to their Chief, and were, no doubt, subject to occasional oppression; but they were no more exposed to be turned out of their holdings and no more expected to be turned out than did the children of hon. Members from their ancestral estates. The Irish farmer did within his own family what he expected the Legislature to do for him. There was scarcely a poor cottier who did not save up every shilling he could in order to bestow a portion upon his daughter when she married, or to give a start to his son when he began life. Now, when he found the little store gone which he had accumulated for this purpose, he naturally resented this treatment. The House must enter into these matters and endeavour to understand the feelings of the people, or they would never understand, what he was thoroughly convinced of, that there was no crime which cried more to Heaven for retribution than that of heartless eviction. He might be accused of using inflammatory language; but he was speaking the truth. He himself was supposed to be a good and improving landlord, but he could not shut his eyes to the sight of what was going on, not only in the West, but in the South of Ireland. There was now no doubt many persons who, like himself, had bought land in Ireland of recent years, who looked upon it simply as a means of extorting the greatest amount of money from their fellow-creatures. The hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin had chided the hon. Member for Tralee for bringing forward cases of oppression without previous Notice to those concerned in them, and so that they could not be answered; but the cases which the hon. Member had cited were cases which had been brought before the Courts, and had been commented upon by the Judges. They were cases in which landlords exercised the power given to them by the Act of 1870 legally, but cruelly. He would, however, mention another case. It was that of a tenant who in 1862 paid £12 2s. 6d. rent. In 1863 his rent was raised to £24. In 1870 there was a change of landlord, and he was called upon to pay £40. After great intercession on the part of persons in the neighbourhood, he was told that he might remain at the rent of £24 if he would pay a fine of £170. That showed that the landlords had found out that the tenant had this money which he probably intended for his daughter's portion, or to start a son in life. Knowing this, he had thought it possible to get this £170 out of this poor man. These cases had occurred, and were occurring, daily; and he would ask the Attorney General for Ireland, on his conscience, if he was not aware that the Judges of Ireland had from their seats on the bench of justice made the strongest comments on landlord tyranny in certain parts of Ireland? He had heard with great regret a recent speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham defending a former Member of the House from the comments of the hon. and learned Member for Cork (Mr. Downing) for acts which had drawn upon him the adverse declarations of three of the ablest and oldest Judges of Ireland in connection with his dealings with his tenants, whose rents he had raised 90, 100, or even 200 per cent. He had heard the right hon. Gentleman indignantly defend his friend, not because he knew anything of the circumstances of the case, but because he thought that a gentleman whom he had long known could not be guilty of these things. The facts, however, had all come out at a public trial, and it was proved that the landlord in question had raised his rents to the amounts stated. They had, moreover, caused murders and widespread misery. They were specimens of what might be done, and what he had no doubt, if the House rejected that Motion, would be done on a more extensive scale. It might be said—"What is the remedy you propose?" He had, for his own part, always felt regret that two new phrases had been introduced into their debates—fixity of tenure and fixity of rent. He would bring about fixity of tenure and fixity of rents; but he would not introduce new names and phrases which were distasteful to the House of Commons. The true and fair thing was to enable the tenants to obtain leases carrying with them the right to renewal. He would fix every tenant on the land, giving him a lease for 20 or 30 years, at the end of which time he should have the right to remain in his home on a revised rent, and as sometimes it was difficult to settle the rent with unreasonable people, he would have in Ireland two or three Judges for the express purpose of taking the land cases, going circuit like other Judges, and having attached to them skilled assistants for every county, who would sit with them. At present, under the Act of 1870, cases between landlords and tenant relating to compensation for improvement and other matters went before the County Court Judges, whom the people sometimes regarded with distrust as being more favourable to the landlord than to the tenants. While some of them gave the tenants a fair sum by way of compensation for eviction, others gave little or nothing, and there were constant appeals from their conflicting decisions. The result was that the people had not got near so much benefit from the Land Act as they might have done had it been differently administered. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin had told them of the great benefits that had resulted in Ireland from the famine. That emigration and pestilence had led to the great diminution of her population. But he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) maintained that Ireland could support a population two or three times greater than now, if the land laws were placed in a better position. It was a shocking thing to talk of the disappearance in 30 years of the half of the population, as if it were merely the clearing out of an overcrowded rookery in St. Giles's. What, too, he might ask, was the case of the former over population? Why, the state of the law which induced landlords to split their property up into the greatest number of farms in order to obtain the greatest possible number of votes. The Legislature had given the temptation, and they were not, because they had since changed their minds and adopted wiser views as to the franchise, entitled to say that it was a happy thing that half the population of Ireland had been swept away. The hon. Member concluded by expressing a hope that the Government would agree to the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject.

Mr. STORER said, that there was a well-known proverb, to the effect that when one's neighbour's house was on fire, it became us to look well after our own, and it appeared to him that the Resolution of the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) was one that ought to put the landlords and tenants of England upon their guard. He looked upon this Resolution as partaking as much of the nature of political fireworks as the Motion in reference to Home Rule did, and thought that the speeches which had been made that evening were intended to produce an effect, not so much upon the House of Commons as upon the people of Ireland, in order to keep up political agitation in that country. The only operation that the Resolution could have, if carried, would be to give the tenants of Irish farms a perpetual lease of their land, and as long as they paid their rent to prevent their landlords from having any control over it. The proposal was a dangerous one, because it might be taken hold of by agitators who in times of distress might endeavour to excite English tenants of the lower class. They had been treated to the old argument as to the tenure of land in Ireland under chieftains ages back. The same might be said of England, and still later of Scotland, where the clan system survived till very lately. But they did not wish to revert to barbarism, and why should Ireland? He had heard a great deal about improving tenants, but not a word had been said about those who deteriorated their land. If the tenants of Irish farms were once impressed with the idea that they were entitled to hold their land in perpetuity, it would be exceedingly difficult to convince them of the necessity of paying rent at all. In his opinion, the tenants in Ireland should be placed exactly in the same position as those of England and Scotland. Hon. Members from Ireland were always crying out for equality, and he thought that equality should be complete in every respect. He saw no reason why the occupiers of land should be treated on a different principle from persons who were engaged in any other industry. When a tenant in England found that he could not continue to occupy his land to his own advantage he gave notice to quit, and did not come to Parliament for assistance; and the Irish tenant ought to follow the same course. He was rather surprised that the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) should have declared himself to be an improving landlord after the hon. Member who had moved this Resolution had stated that improving landlords in Ireland were looked upon with abhorrence and detestation. In his opinion, however, an improving landlord was entitled to great credit as benefiting both his tenants and his country. The hon. Member who seconded the Resolution (Mr. Errington) had asked why land in Ireland should be worth only 20 years' purchase, while that in England was worth 30 years' purchase. It was because there was security for neither life nor property in that country. What sane man would invest his money in land in Ireland when the tenants believed that they were to get it for nothing? He admitted that there might be some ground for complaint on the part of the Irish tenants, just as for English farmers, with regard to the unfair taxation of native produce; but, still, their relations with their landlords should be regulated by ordinary commercial principles, such as those which governed landlords and tenants in other countries, and the laws of political economy must not be set aside merely that hon. Gentlemen from Ireland might indulge in those ridiculous and insincere manifestations meant for political purposes only.

MR. O'SULLIVAN, in rising to support the Motion before the House, said, that he would commence by admitting that there were a large number of good landlords in Ireland; and in the county which he had the honour of representing he was glad to have to say that the large majority of the landlords in that county were just and fair to their tenants. He need only look at the other side of the House to one of those landlords in the person of the hon. Baronet the Member for Devizes. If every landlord in Ireland acted like the hon. Baronet and his brother there would be no occasion for the advocates of the tenant-farmers in this House asking for a Tenant-right Bill to protect the Irish tenants from rack-renting and evictions. During the last 30 years he never heard of an act of cruelty or oppression on the property of the hon. Baronet or his brother. Unfortunately for the country, and for the landlords themselves, all the landlords were not of that stamp, as they had many black sheep in their midst; and it was because they had those black sheep among them that they had to come before the House to ask it to compel the bad landlord to do that by law which the good landlord did voluntarily as a simple act of justice, on the principle of live and let live. He did not purpose following the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Herbert) in his wild statements about the Irish tenantry and all they required, but merely to remind the hon. Member that if he had not promised the rev. Father O'Donoghue previous to the last Election, that he would vote for a Bill to secure the tenants in their holdings at fair rents, the hon. Members would now be in that House to misrepresent the large majority of the electors of Kerry. He would relate some cases of landlord cruelty and oppression that occurred very recently within the county which the hon. Member represented, and he felt satisfied when the House heard the facts of these cases, they would admit there was sore need of some law to restrain landlords in their dealings with their tenants. About four years since the life interest in the estate of an old Nobleman in the county Limerick, amounting to about £1,400 a-year, subject to some large charges was sold in the Landed Estates Court. Well, the interest in the life of this old man, who was rising up to 70 years, was so very little that the tenants and others concerned did not suspect that anyone would interfere with the next heir to the estate, and that he, or his representatives, would get it as a matter of course, without opposition; but after the sale they found they were very much mistaken, as there was a party in the neighbourhood, a money lender, who saw he had a good opportunity of squeezing money out of the poor tenants. So he bid for the property, and he got the rental of over £1,300 a-year during the life of this old Nobleman for the important sum of £1,600. He should have mentioned that on the estate of this old Nobleman (Lord Lisle), and his father before him, tenants were never disturbed from their holdings except for non-payment of rent, for they had a good agent as well as a good landlord. But what a change had come over that estate, where tenants, up to that unfortunate sale, felt as sure of their holdings as they did of their existence. During the last two years this speculator had evicted the tenants off three of those farms, and had taken them into his own possession without giving the tenants one shilling compensation. The tenants owed no rent more than the running gale, and he assigned no reason whatever for evicting them. If it occurred in the North their tenant-right would be worth over £3,000. Ten or eleven other tenants he compelled to pay over £1,500, or about as much as he gave for the whole property, though he was not able to give them one month's security in their holding, as he had only the life interest of the old Nobleman. He gave that case to show the House how unfortunate poor tenants in his county were treated, and to show the necessity there was for some security for them. There was another case of landlord's cruelty on Mr. Buckley's property, to which he would allude more fully—most of the injustice having occurred in his county—were it not that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cork County (Mr. Downing) had done so on the second reading of the Land Bill; but there were one or two matters in the case which he thought the House should know, they not having been touched on by his hon. and learned Friend. One was the number of notices to quit served on this estate, the next was the valuation of the celebrated Mr. Bridge, and the third was the class of tenants on this estate. He would first read a short extract from Bridge's evidence when under cross-examination in Cork. He (Mr. Bridge) could not tell how many hundred notices to quit were served on this estate, but on close examination he admitted he had 130 notices to quit out at one time. Was it any wonder that trouble and alarm should have existed in this district under such circumstances? And those notices were served for the purpose of increasing the rents of those tenants for the very improvements they and their fathers made in this mountainous district. He (Mr. O'Sullivan) felt very great interest in the alarm and the outrages which took place on this property, as part of it was in his county, and he well knew that, previous to its unfortunate connection with the notorious Mr. Bridge, it was as peaceful a district as there was in all Munster. So he wrote to a friend of his, who knew that part of the country well, to know what he thought of the tenantry on this estate, and the cause of the outrages. He would read one short extract from the gentleman's letter to show what he thought of the tenantry on this property. He said—

“ I know the tenantry on the Buckley estate over 30 years, and a more peaceful or industrious people I never knew. I firmly believe if they were paid for the labour alone which they expended in drawing manure on their backs to this mountainous district for reclaiming the land, and their continual work in extirpating the furze and the heather, it would more than purchase the fee-simple of half the estate.”

Those notices to quit were served because the tenants would not submit to an exorbitant increase of rent which was placed on them by this man, Bridge. It was well known in the counties of Limerick and Cork that this Bridge never placed a fair or honest value on a tenant's holding, and he (Mr. O'Sullivan) did not make that assertion to the House without being in a position to offer some evidence in support of it. He would tell the House one fact in connection with Mr. Bridge's valuation, and he felt sure it would be found to be a true illustration of most of his valuations. He knew a respectable man, named Mahony, who held a small holding at Kildorrey, where this Bridge was agent. He believed the old rent was about £5 or £6 a-year. When the lease expired Bridge increased the rent to £14 per annum, on account of the improvements made by Mahony. Mahony protested against the increase, but to no purpose. He had to submit or quit his holding, on which he expended a large sum in buildings. Hon. Members might think the rent was not exorbitant, but he would prove to the House that it was by the fact that the very first time the landlord, who was James, Earl of Kingston, came on the ground, his attention was called to the largely increased rent put on the holding by Bridge. He admitted the rent was too high, and ordered it to be reduced to £10 per annum, thus taking about 30 per cent off Bridge's valuation. He (Mr. O'Sullivan) felt quite sure that if every one of the five or six hundred cases of notice to quit on Mr. Buckley's estate were examined by any hon. Member, they would be found to be more or less extravagant and unjust like the one he had just quoted. In conclusion, the hon. Member hoped he had shown sufficient reasons to warrant the House in passing the Motion or granting an inquiry which would secure the tenants in Ireland against the petty tyrant, the rack-renter and the exterminator.

LORD FRANCIS CONYNGHAM : Sir, at the request of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kerry (Mr. Herbert), I beg to apologize in his name for his not having been able to move the Amendment standing in his name on the Paper. While in the House he received a telegram which obliged him to leave at once, owing to the serious illness of a very near relative. He begged me to express his regret, as he knew how much interest was felt by Irish Members and in Ireland upon this question.

MR. STACPOOLE expressed a hope that the Government would give his hon. Friend (the O'Donoghue) such an assurance as would induce him to withdraw his Motion, and let the Amendment for a Royal Commission be adopted.

MR. BRUEN was constrained to say, after what had fallen from hon. Gentlemen opposite, that the Irish landlord was about the best abused individual in the Kingdom. It was painful for him, being a landlord, to be assailed in that way, and it was also painful for him to have to stand up and plead for landlords who had really done their duty to their tenants and had been kind to them. But being an Irish landlord—no better, and he hoped no worse—and in some measure representing the Irish landlords, he felt bound to say something on the subject, and to deny that they deserved the condemnation which had been passed upon them by some of the hon. Members who had addressed the House. He asked the House to believe that the cases mentioned by the hon. Member for Tralee were not typically true. As far as he had heard, only one of the cases mentioned by the hon. Member had been commented on by a Judge. He protested against the assumption of the hon. Member, that because land in Ireland had increased in value, therefore the valuations bore no fair proportion to the real value. Since Griffith's valuation, no doubt, land in Ireland had increased in value, just as the produce of land had increased in value. If higher rents were asked for improved values of land, the rents were paid, with, perhaps, a little grumbling, and it was only fair that landlords should demand an increased rent for their property, which had improved in value. In all cases where the tenant was obliged to give up the possession of land owing to an increase of rent, he could go into Court and obtain full value of his improvements. The produce of land, as he had said, had increased and was of higher value, and consequently the landlord demanded the increased rent, but he denied that in so doing they fixed their demands according to the tenants' improvements. The tenants' improvements were valued; in general, the tenant's own valuation was taken, and the amount was either paid to him in money, and then the full value was demanded in rent or, if not, a deduction was allowed corresponding to the improvements made. The hon. Member for Tralee said that since the passing of the Land Act there had been a great increase in the rents owing to tenants' improvements. Well, the increase in the value of land since the Land Act was the property of the landlord, if not created by the tenant, for the land had increased in value since the passing of the Act. Then it was said that the tenants only improved the land. But that was not the case, for the landlords made enormous improvements. As to the charge that evictions were constantly being carried on in Ireland, what were the facts? The Returns showed that the evictions on notices to quit amounted to one in 1,400 tenants. Did that prove that evictions were constantly being carried on in Ireland? What had Lord St. Leonards said in 1868? His Lordship said that—

“The facts which had come before the Committee were diametrically opposed to general opinion in regard to the relations between landlords and tenants in Ireland. It had been said that the landlords spent nothing in improvements, but in the evidence which had come before the Committee the landlords laid out more money in improvements than landlords did in this country.”

As to the rents of land in Ireland being high, that was a matter of opinion. The pamphlet of the hon. Member for Linlithgow who was in Ireland at the time of the passing of the Land Act said—

“There was one thing favourable to the settlement of the question, and that was the low rents at which the lands of Ireland are let. With such low rents as are paid for grazing lands in Limerick and Tipperary, and fixity of tenure, I should infinitely prefer being a tenant to being a landlord.

He believed the real fact was that 99 out of every 100 landlords in Ireland did not over-rent their land, and the charges which had been made against them were entirely unsupported by evidence. But it was said that these things had been done since the passing of the Land Act, but the landlords were the same as three years ago, and that short space of time could not have made them grasping and tyrannical. As to cases of injustice, the right hon. Member for London University said that he had sat on several Committees of the House of Commons to investigate the question of the land, but he had never found a charge of ill-treatment of the tenant verified with dates and circumstances. A Commission or inquiry had been suggested, and, as a landlord, he did not shrink from it. He was quite sure nothing could be proved against the landlords as a body. The appointment of a Commission would imply that the House believed charges which had not been substantiated. No case had been made out for inquiry, and the instances which had been adduced had not been gone into with sufficient detail to enable the House to say that they established even a prima facie case of grievance such as the House ought to be certain of before it passed so heavy a sentence on the landlords. If a Motion for inquiry were brought forward, he would not vote upon it, because he would not have it said that any landlord had voted against inquiry into his conduct, although, in his opinion, there was no ground whatever for such an inquiry. The Resolution practically embodied one of the propositions of the Bill already rejected—namely, that with regard to valued rents—and it was a waste of time, by a Motion of this character, to revive a question which had been discussed and determined. To show the kind of fair play and justice that were to be meted out to the landlords he would quote two sentences from a speech of the hon. Member for Kildare at a Conference held in the Rotunda in January, 1875. The hon. Member said that—

“No landlord should be allowed to treat land as he treated property in a horse,” but that the “tenants demanded that they should be entitled to deal with the land as they would deal with any other commodity. They must be allowed to bring the land into the market and realize the highest value they could for it and be allowed to sell it without restriction.”

Such were the ideas with which some approached the discussion of this question.

He hoped the friendly relations now existing between landlords and tenants would not be disturbed by the speech of the hon. Member for Tralee, and that those relations would be influenced rather by the moderate tone of other speeches, for he was afraid the repetition of such strong condemnations and the advocacy of such violent measures would produce some sort of retaliation by the landlords. That in itself would be most unfortunate. The clauses of the Land Act were carried against the feelings of the landlords, and their views of what was just and necessary; but, as they had been passed, the landlords had loyally endeavoured to carry them out. For the reasons he had given he hoped the House would not pass the Resolution.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN thought the question under consideration had been treated too much in the narrow spirit of the advocate. One side was all in favour of the landlords, and the other was in favour of the tenants; but what was wanted was a more judicial consideration of the question. It ought not to be approached in a spirit of antagonism, either to the landlords or the tenants of Ireland. When, in 1870, an appeal was made to the Irish Members by the then Prime Minister on the subject of his Land Bill, he thought it right to tell the right hon. Gentleman that he did not believe the people of Ireland would accept the Bill as a fixed settlement of this question. He imagined that no one would dispute the statement that advantages had resulted from the Act of 1870. On the other hand, however, some hon. Members seemed not to be aware of the fact that a great many landlords who, prior to the passing of the measure, were extremely good landlords in the world, considered themselves, after it became law, released to a great degree from the obligations their position imposed upon them. Those landlords, in effect, said—"You have obtained this law, and we are, as the result, relieved from those special duties which heretofore we conceived were incumbent upon us, and we are now no longer bound by anything but the letter of the law." As a landlord himself, he could say there was so much uncertainty in the three or four counties with which he was best acquainted that the Motion for an inquiry into the operation of the Land Act was one which any fair man would be disposed to support. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) seemed to be under the impression that if the House granted an inquiry into the subject, it would be an admission that the landlords of Ireland had been guilty of a gross dereliction of duty. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien), however, did not concur in that opinion. It could not be doubted that notwithstanding the improvement arising out of the legislation of 1870, the tenant farmers of Ireland were not in a condition to say that they occupied with certainty the position to which they were entitled, and they were of opinion that there ought to be something like certainty as to their tenure. His father had been accustomed to grant leases, the rent for which could easily be ascertained; and this system, if pursued generally, would in a great degree have lessened the existing land agitation. The days of exalted status derived from the possession of land, was a thing of the past. The practical solution was, that the tenant should derive a compensation for the expenditure of himself and his ancestors upon it. He believed that 99 out of every 100 landlords were well disposed towards their tenantry, and he referred especially to those who had not taken up the acquisition of land as a mercantile speculation. His opinion was that on the present occasion the simple duty of the House was to consider in fairness whether any prima facie case for inquiry had been made out; and he thought that even those who were of opinion that no grievance existed might concur in permitting an inquiry, from which, if their opinion was correct, no harm could ensue to them.

MR. GREENE opposed the Motion, remarking that he was puzzled to know which question was to be discussed. He had not voted, he was happy to say, for the second reading of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, as it was most objectionable, because it contained the principle of confiscation. It went very much further than he believed was proper, and he thought the people of Ireland ought to be contented with what had been granted to them. Parliament was willing to consider any grievance which the Irish Representatives might advance, but moderation would have to be observed, and evils which had no substantial foundation ought not to be advocated to the loss of the public time. He had great interest, although no property, in Ireland; and the House ought to take an interest in the question. He did not believe that hon. Members opposite could bring forward any bad cases of eviction. Hon. Members were ready to hear all that could be said of Irish affairs, and he hoped that the Irish Members would allow them to have an opportunity of dealing with English affairs, which they had not always had of late. If tenants were to be entitled of right to leases perpetually renewed, no landlord would have a right to do what he pleased with his own land, even though he wished to enter upon and cultivate it himself. What was necessary for the good of Ireland was not for gentlemen, either in Parliament or out of it, to get up agitations; but for people to be taught the importance of putting their shoulders to the wheel and making the best of a state of things under which they were, relatively, more prosperous than the English. Supposing England drew a cordon round her shores and prevented Ireland sending her produce to our markets, where would she be? Why, Irish people would be shut up in in their own Island, and would eat each other up. The cries of "Fixity of Tenure," "Leases," and "Home Rule" were all very well, but he feared they were used mainly for the purpose of catching votes. He was one of those who thought that an act of injustice in favour of the tenant had been committed by the Act of 1870; and the sooner, in his opinion, the House divided on the question before it the better, for what was proposed to be done was simply to make the landlord a mere rent-charger on his own property.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN said, he gladly acknowledged that there were many landowners in Ireland, such as the Marquess of Ormonde, Lord Mountgarrett, and Lord Portsmouth, by whom tenant-right on their estates was practically conceded; but it was not against them that the Motion of the hon. Member for Tralee was directed. He regretted to say there were others who forgot and neglected the duties which their position imposed upon them. It was in condemnation of the dealings of this latter class with their tenants he understood the terms of the Resolution. Words had, it was true, been used which might be considered to assail the entire body of Irish landlords; but the tenants, as a class, had much more reason to complain of the accusations so ignorantly made as to the object of their tenant-right agitation. From having been present at many of the tenant-right conferences and meetings, he could say that, excepting, perhaps, cases where a few expressed very extreme views, the tenants asked nothing but what was fair and reasonable—they demanded nothing beyond what every hon. Member who was a landlord, and who had spoken on the subject, declared the tenants enjoyed on his own estate. The mode in which the just landlord would benefit from security might well be exemplified by the estates of Lord Portsmouth in Wexford. The agents of his Lordship asserted that what had made the tenantry happy and prosperous was the practical observance of the rules of tenant-right. The rules there were that in the selection of tenants regard was paid only to character, skill, and capital, without reference to religion or politics. New leases were granted to representatives of old tenants at moderate rents, and at the expiration of leases rents were fairly adjusted, having regard to situation and capabilities of soil. Forty years of such a system had inspired the tenantry with confidence and energy, had changed barren land into fine farms, had enabled them to erect suitable substantial residences, and changed a collection of mud hovels into an important market town. What the tenants demanded was not to be freed from payment of rent, but to be relieved from apprehensions by which their industry was paralyzed, and from a system of rack-renting under which the improvements made by them on their farms were confiscated. He begged the House to bear in mind that the position of the Irish tenant was entirely different from that of the same class in this country, for the former, when deprived of his holding, had nothing but the workhouse or emigration before him. So considerably did the demand for land exceed the supply that contracts in respect to land amongst the poorer class of tenants could be said to be only nominally free. It was not true that this question had been brought forward merely as a display of political fireworks for election purposes. For his part, he believed it to be essential to the prosperity of Ireland that a tenant-right should be created. He could understand an opponent saying that, as he had opposed the Tenant Act of 1870, so he would oppose the present proposal. But it was too late to take exception to the principle involved, for the Act of 1870 had established the principle that Parliament might require bad landlords in Ireland to do what the good landlords did of their own accord. The hon. Member went on to give details, from his own personal knowledge, of evictions that had occurred on the estate of Captain Humphrey in the county of Kilkenny. Without special selection he might mention four cases of yearly tenants on that property: in one the value of the holding according to Griffith's valuation was £34, the rent paid by the tenant £49, and the rent demanded under the notice to quit £76. In another case the value was set down at £37, the rent paid £57 17s., and the rent demanded £77 4s. In the third the value was £7 18s., the rent paid £7 19s., and the rent demanded £28. In another instance the value was £32, the rent paid £53 5s., and the rent demanded £68 1s. 6d. But for timely and good advice there certainly would have been outrages in the district where the evictions in question occurred. The need of legislative interference was urgent. The changes of proprietors had made but too general the disproportionate raising of rents. It was quite true that produce had increased in value, but the price of labour and the burden of taxation had also increased in Ireland. It was wholly out of the question to let land in that country at competition value. The treatment of improving tenants had in many instances, which he could mention to the House, been outrageous. An English gentleman took the lease of a farm in Kildare within six years of its termination. The farm was in a very exhausted state, and he made it a model farm. He could only obtain a renewal of the lease on exorbitant terms, and his compensation under the Land Act amounted to merely a nominal sum having regard to his expenditure. On the Gormanstown estate tenants had been evicted, because they would not sign agreements which even the Chairman for County Meath condemned as unfair, and depriving them of the right to past improvements. There was but too much reason to apprehend that this unreasonable, capricious exercise of the legal powers which the law vested in the landlord had brought the law into contempt and disrepute. On the Darnley estate an improving tenant had taken a farm on a 21 years' lease. The land had been impoverished to a degree; but by skill, money, and manure, he praised it to the highest state of cultivation. Before the expiration of the lease he asked Lord Darnley to renew. After some delay a considerable increase of rent was proposed and acceded to. A printed agreement was then produced, stated to be the usual form of agreement on Lord Darnley's estates, according to which the tenancy was only from year to year, determinable at six months' notice, all the tenant's improvements being forfeited to the landlord, and on the death of the tenant no interest was transmissible to his personal representatives. These agreements were forced on the Darnley tenantry, some of whom were poor men who could not resist the pressure. Were hon. Members from Ireland to be assailed because they saw urgent need that the Land Act should be amended? Another great grievance was the uncertainty of the decision of the tribunal. There were 30 Chairmen altogether, and many of them adopted a totally different principle in deciding the amount of claims for compensation that should be awarded to evicted tenants; and, in addition, there were different constructions placed upon the Act of 1870 by the learned Judges of Assize to whom appeals against those varying decisions lay. All these diversities of opinion and judicial treatment diminished the protection intended by that Act to be given to the poorer class of tenants in possession of small holdings. He thought that a strong case had been made in favour of the Resolution. Security of tenure would exercise an influence for good on the moral and social condition of Irish tenants. He trusted some measure might soon be passed which would give to the tenants a just legal protection, and free them from the dread that the very capital, skill, and industry which they had expended on their farms, might not be the cause of their rents being increased.

MR. R. POWER, while admitting that the debate had not been a very lively one, thought that, at all events, it had been instructive. It was impossible to exaggerate evils that would arise if a Resolution like that now before the House were to be rejected. The contention that the farmers of Ireland should be placed upon the same footing as those of England was not sound, inasmuch as those laws which might be suitable to the constitution of an Englishman would not agree with the temperament of an Irishman. This question had been before the public, it had been discussed in the newspapers, it had been debated in that House, and it had been made one of the principal subjects upon every electioneering platform. There were few Irish Members of that Assembly who had not given some pledge that they would seek for a reform in the land laws of Ireland. He did not intend to make an attack upon the landlords of Ireland. He thought they were as a rule good and generous men, but the bad and unjust acts of a few brought disgrace upon many, and caused much turbulence and bitter feeling in the district, and sowed suspicion in the heart of every neighbouring tenant. The landlords in his own county were the best landlords and the worst politicians in Ireland, but who could tell what their successors might be—these men had been so good for so many generations that it was but natural to expect that some bad ones would shortly appear. What was the objection to this proposal, and to the Land Bills which had been brought forward in this House? The pill which the landlords refused to swallow was fixity of tenure. He could assure them that their dislike to it was solely imaginative, and that however nauseous it might seem at the first taste it would, when it had time to operate, do them a world of good. He knew cases where families had lived on land for centuries without any disturbance or increase of rent. That had been fixity of tenure, as it affected the rights of the landlord, but not as it affected the improvement of the land or the interests of the tenant, because the tenant was unwilling to invest his capital and labour in an uncertainty. It was said that unless there was personal valuation an injustice would be done to the landlord. If land was to be valued for what it was worth, the tenant's improvements must be valued, and in order to accomplish that it was necessary to know the exact condition of the farm at the time the tenant took it. The Irish landlords were short-sighted individuals, and they ignored the advance of chemical and other sciences; they appeared to imagine that their worn-out and perhaps rack-rented fields could compete with the boundless prairies of America and Mexico, or the well-kept fields of the sister country. But he did not understand in what the idea of the continued increase in the value of land was founded. But even if the tenant was benefited by the increase in the value of the land, the landlord would not the less be benefited. It would be recollected that good landlords did not rely upon the power of resumption, or look to it as a source of profit. He quite admitted that the Land Act was well meant, but it could only work for the advantage of a tenant on condition that he was willing to engage in a lawsuit with a man much wealthier than himself. He was not, of course, willing to accept this condition, and the consequence was, that he did not invest in the land those savings which the accounts of money deposited in the banks or the family stocking showed that he possessed. Why? Because the tenant feared that if he invested his money, it, together with his labour, would fall into the hands of his landlord at the expiration of a certain number of years. Their object ought to be to induce tenants to invest capital and labour, because thereby the food supply of the country would be largely increased. By this means the value of the landlord's property was increased, and if it was said that he would thus be reduced to the condition of the owner of a mere rent-charge, it must not be forgotten that the power of resumption would still be left to him, and that his security for the punctual payment of his rent would be increased by the improvement in the value of the land. They did not seek to diminish the value of the landlord's property, but, on the contrary, to place it on a firmer basis by rendering it consistent with the welfare of the country. That the farmers of Ireland had capital was proved by bank returns. That the present system did not offer sufficient inducement to them to invest their capital was proved by the fact that they did not do so. More than once in this debate the question had been asked—Why did not the Irish tenant as the English tenant improve? but he would ask, why did not the Irish landlord do as the English landlord? The Irish landlord never made improvements himself, nor would he allow his tenant, by giving him security of tenure to do so. Security of tenure would tend to give a higher rent, because it would induce tenants to sink their capital in farms, and in consequence of the improvement of the farms there would be increased competition for them. He would allow the tenant to take his farm as he took his wife, “for better or for worse.” Of course, there was some risk and some speculation in both cases, far less, he believed, in the case of the farm. However, he hoped the House would agree with him, that security of tenure was as desirable in the one case as in the other. That idea of security of tenure was no new or Utopian scheme. In France, the half-starved labourers of the old regime had been replaced by petty proprietors who formed the richest and most Conservative peasantry in the world. They wanted to make a similar revolution in Ireland, and if they could not all at once make the Irish peasantry proprietors as in France, they could at all events, by giving them security of tenure, make them part proprietors. They wished to close for ever that miserable war between landlord and tenant, which, so long as it existed, must be a stain upon the character of the country, and must tend to check her social and material prosperity.

THE O’CONOR DON could not allow the Motion to go to a division without explaining the course he intended to adopt. Because he had on a former occasion opposed a Bill founded on wrong and unjust principles, which he believed would be injurious to those whose interests it was intended to promote, he should be very sorry if it were supposed that he was indisposed to give due consideration to any just claims made on behalf of the tenant-farmers of Ireland. Notwithstanding all the abuse which had been heaped on him in Ireland, and the representations which had been made, picturing him as the opponent of the tenant-farmer’s interest, and as the advocate of the most extreme landlord views, he ventured to assert that few hon. Members were more anxious than he was to support any just claim possessed by the tenants, or to see them protected in the enjoyment of the fruits of their industry, and not deprived of those fruits, either by rack-renting, or by any other process. He had always held that no settlement of the land question in Ireland could be final or satisfactory until they had established in some way or other in that country a large class of men who united in their own persons the two positions both of occupiers and owners. He was far from concurring in many of the statements of the Mover of the Resolution. The hon. Member for Tralee (the O’Donoghue) had made grave charges against the landlord class as a whole. He would not himself then enter into the consideration of those charges; but he held that having been made, and gaining considerable belief in Ireland, it was important that they should be thoroughly investigated. He could not agree with the assertion made by his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen), that, in assenting to that investigation, they would thereby admit that the charges were made out. They knew that those charges were preferred, and also that the conduct of a few unscrupulous persons had brought discredit on the class to which they belonged, and therefore he desired an investigation. He understood that the Question the Speaker would put to the House would be, that he do now leave the Chair—in other words, that the House should pass away from the consideration of the subject. Now, he did not think they should pass away in that manner from its consideration. The hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Herbert) who had given Notice of an Amendment to the Resolution under discussion had been called away, and could not move his Amendment; but if the House came to the conclusion that the Speaker should remain in the Chair, and the Resolution of the hon. Member for Tralee became a substantive Motion, it would then be in the power of any hon. Gentleman to move the hon. Member for Kerry’s Amendment. If no one else moved that Amendment he (the O’Conor Don) would do so himself. Therefore, he would in the first instance vote that the Speaker remain in the Chair.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING, though he did not agree with much that had fallen from the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue), yet thought that that hon. Member did not deserve the severe animadversions which had been made upon him by the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Plunket). He regretted the very strong language which had been used by the hon. and learned Gentleman, who had no right to characterize the supporters of that Motion—who had as great a stake in the country as their opponents—as desperate and reckless in the course they were taking. He wished to invite the attention of the House to a few facts bearing on the Motion before them. They were not discussing a Bill. The real question that the House had to decide was not that the tenantry of Ireland should have fixity of tenure, but simply that there should be an inquiry, either by a Select Committee, or a Royal Commission, whether, after six or seven years' experience of the working of the Irish Land Act of 1870, that Act had not failed to secure the object of its promoters, and whether it did not require to be amended to a very large extent. It was stated by the Devon Commission that, while in England everything was done by the landlord in the way of building, putting up gates, and so forth, to enable the tenant to cultivate his land, the very reverse was the case in Ireland, where everything was done by the tenant. He need not read what was stated by the same Commission about the labouring classes in Ireland, for whom nothing had been done up to the present time. On the Motion for the second reading of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), he alluded with pain and regret to a particular individual, but representing the county which he did, he felt bound to refer to the circumstances connected with the Michelstown estate. If there were no other case which could be adduced, the circumstances connected with that case would justify him in asking for, and the House in granting, a Royal Commission to inquire into the facts. He would read a portion of the judgment delivered by three as able Judges, and men as pure and with as high a sense of justice as any that ever presided in a Court in Ireland, when application was made to them by Mr. Bridge for a criminal information against a third party. Mr. Justice Barry, after reviewing the facts of the case, used words to the effect that a more unjustifiable course of proceeding during his experience at the Bar or on the Bench had never come before him. Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, in a portion of a judgment also declared the proceedings to be "high-handed and oppressive." He must respectfully appeal to the right hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General for Ireland) for his opinion on the subject, for if every landlord in Ireland had acted as Mr. Buckley had done, there would have been a rebellion in the country. He was surprised that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was not one of the very first Members to rise to support, at all events, an inquiry into the action of landlords such as the one he described. He believed that nearly every landlord would be glad of this inquiry, even though some of them had taken advantage of the law to exercise their powers unfairly. The tenant was often treated very ill; and, in the words of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald—"What was he to do?" All he could do was to pay as much rent as possible, in order to keep a roof over the heads of his wife and children and save them from the roadside. He would like to know whether all landlords were to be allowed to raise rents in this manner? If so, there would be rebellion. One gentleman had showered notices to quit like flakes of snow upon his tenants. The rent, in one case, had been raised from £5 7s. 6d. to £17 10s. There were landlords who had never turned out a tenant; and they would be glad if this inquiry were granted. But there were others who were silently raising the rents. He had moved for a Return, which showed that the ejectments after the Land Act exceeded in number those before the Act by 50 per cent. Was not that a pregnant fact? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was bound to make inquiry, and the Commission, he believed, would report that the statements of the raising of rents made in the House were actually understated. There was a great quantity of waste land, and if they had capital, double the population of Ireland might be employed on it. He was therefore compelled to differ from the hon. and learned Member for Dublin on the subject of waste lands, considering the number of men at present supported by every square mile. In conclusion, he trusted the House would not be led away by hon. Members who were quite unacquainted with Ireland; but that it would be guided by those who had lived among the people and had sympathized with their sorrows. The House was not called upon to decide whether the tenant should hold the land in perpetuity, but to inquire whether the Act of 1870 had not failed, and, if it had failed, to consider how it should be amended.

MR. KIRK said, he was of opinion that the Land Act carried by the late Premier, though honestly intended, had proved to be a signal failure in consequence chiefly of the Amendments introduced during its passage through that House. That measure was satisfactory only because it was an admission by the Representatives of the United Kingdom that the Irish tenant-farmers had an interest in the land they occupied that ought to be protected just the same as the interests of the landlords. Statistics showed that capricious evictions instead of ceasing had, in fact, increased in numbers since the passing of the Land Act. He was informed that the amount given for compensation in the South of Ireland, was comparatively valueless to the tenants. In that part of the country the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, who were generally landlords themselves, acted, as an almost settled rule, that if a tenant had been in possession for 10 years before he was evicted they would not give him any compensation for permanent improvements. He considered this was a great injustice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Gibson) said, no one could affirm that the subject of Irish land had not been sufficiently before the House for the present Session. It was brought forward a few days ago by the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) in a form that could hardly be rivalled, and now, in a somewhat different form, it had occupied the attention of the House for seven hours. As some of the later speakers had diverged from the actual question, he would remind the House what it was, by reading the Resolution, that was proposed. He ventured to think that no Resolution ever introduced to the House was more misleading, or based upon more thoroughly groundless assumptions than that which was under discussion. It coolly assumed that the rule at present prevailing among Irish landlords was the exaction of confiscating rents, attended by merciless and heartless evictions, whereas the real state of things was wholly different, as every one who had the slightest acquaintance with Ireland, or who even studied the Irish correspondence in English newspapers, was well aware. In support of so startling and extraordinary a Resolution the hon. Member for Tralee, as the result of months of research as the Apostle of this question in the South of Ireland, had only been able to produce three cases, one of which was sufficiently typical to merit attention in passing. This was a case in Ulster, in which a tenant had been asked to pay a rent which was held to be unreasonable, and the Court made the landlord pay over £200 for improvements, and give a substantial sum for disturbance, at the same time allowing the tenant all his costs. Now, if the law was strong enough to punish a landlord so severely in a case like that, he was at a loss to see what necessity there was for making it more stringent. That was the only case mentioned by the hon. Member for Tralee which had come before the Courts, and with regard to the others, it would surely have been only reasonable to have, by proper notice, afforded the landlords concerned an opportunity of having their side of the case presented to the House, so that hon. Members might be put in possession of the whole of the facts. Moreover, the hon. Member for Tralee, although he stated that the cases were very hard, and mentioned the rents paid at a given time, gave no details as to the size of the farms, the conditions of the leases, or, indeed, a single circumstance which could enable the House to arrive at a fair and just conclusion. The hon. Member's speech was remarkable in other respects. He was rather hard upon the Irish landlords who did not improve their land; but he was still harder upon those who did. The non-improving landlord, according to him, was bad, but the improving landlord was still worse. Nor did the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) give any satisfactory details, of either of the cases to which he referred, and as for the case of Mr. Buckley and Mr. Bridge, however much of a godsend it might be to these debates, it was one of which the House was getting just a little tired. Then as to the case of hardship mentioned by the hon. Member for Kilkenny county (Mr. P. Martin), Mr. Battersby, for whose sake this great change in the law was to be made, so far from being a poor, ignorant tenant, was a man of means and position, and also, he believed, a magistrate of the county of Meath, who was perfectly able to hold his own in any matter of bargain and contract. In the case of Lord Gormans-town, the land had been let originally when rents were very low, they were raised very moderately, and out of 230 tenants 221, before this great wave of agitation got at them, acquiesced. Almost every one in this age of legislative quackery had a panacea for one thing or another, and the hon. Member for Reading had his little plan for redressing the wrongs of the Irish tenant. But how did the case stand? There was a provision in the Irish Land Act which enabled a tenant whose rent was under £15, if he were evicted even for non-payment of rent, to get damages for disturbance from the landlord on the ground that the rent was exorbitant. The hon. Member on the front bench opposite would take away the £15 limit, and the consequence would be that a tenant, no matter what his social position and education might be, might, on the plea that his rent was excessive, obtain the benefit of a provision, which was intended only for the benefit of very poor men. With regard to tenure, it should be remembered that all Ireland was not under tenancies from year to year. There were tenures which were leases for life, with perpetual renewal; there were 99 years' leases; there were leases for three lives and 31 years, and leases for 31 years, and other long terms, which were unknown in England and Scotland. These were important circumstances when one came to consider the occupation of land in Ireland. With regard to tenants from year to year, it would be found that their position compared favourably with that of English and Scotch tenants, especially in the matter of compensation for improvements. If tenants were dispossessed in England or Scotland, they must go. In Ireland, if evicted, they must also go; but they could make their landlord pay to the very last farthing for improvements as well as for disturbance. In Ireland, therefore, where the landlord was often a poor man, he had to think long and anxiously before deciding on evicting a tenant. Then it should be also borne in mind that rents in Ireland were very much below what might be called competition rates, and were lower than those which prevailed in England, Scotland, or on the Continent; and this should not be lost sight of when charges of a wide character were made wholesale against Irish landlords. The Returns that had been asked for stopped short of asking how many evictions had occurred, and merely asked how many decrees for possession had been applied for. Many of these cases were, however, compromised, and the Returns showed a substantial decrease in the number of absolute evictions. In 1876 the number of families evicted was 620, last year it was only 414, so that at the very time this Resolution was brought forward, the actual number of evictions was less than at any previous period. No doubt, the power to evict existed, but it had not been shown that it had been used widely or oppressively, and, therefore, he thought the principle of fixing and regulating rent by anybody except the tenant or the landlord was wholly inadmissible. In fact, this principle of a valued rent, to be valued by any one but the owner, would result in making him the owner not of a fixed, but of an unfixed rent charge. Why not sweep away all freedom of contract? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) drew a line for those who were thought to require protection, leaving the tenants above them in the social scale to fight their own battles and make their own bargains. But where was this interference with freedom of contract to stop? Why should it not apply to the other transactions of life, and if a man lent another £1,000, why should not the borrower be allowed to fix the interest he was willing to pay? The hon. Member for Tralee did not mention the word "tenure," and he would ask the House in voting for this Resolution to remember that it presupposed a system of fixity of tenure. The House should remember that this underlies it. The whole thing implied fixity of tenure, yet the hon. Member had not employed the phrase in his

The Attorney General for Ireland.

Motion, though he could not deny the construction put upon it. This suggestion was a panacea which, of course, had to be considered, and the House had expressed its opinion upon it. It proposed really to read contracts upside down. It proposed that if a man held land for a few years he should hold it for ever. It was the old project for regenerating Ireland proposed by an eminent financier—namely, to turn all the I O U's into U O I's. The hon. Member for the county of Cork (Mr. Downing) asked for a Commission, even assuming that he had no case, because then, if the Commission was granted it might be they would find a case. That was what lawyers would call a fishing case. But why should there be a Commission when no case was made out? Would it not excite false hopes and prolong the agitation; and would it not lead the tenants in Ireland to believe that something would come of it? The alternatives should be fairly considered; supposing that the Commission reported against change, who had power to undertake that these agitating associations would be dissolved? Did not every one know that the agitation would derive new force from the mere granting of the Commission, and that if it reported against change, it would be arraigned as unsatisfactory, and there would be a new outcry for a further Commission, differently composed, with wider powers, and which would only listen to the tenants, and never summon a landlord before them? It was kinder and wiser that this demand should be met by a decided "No;" and he did not believe that a case either was, or could be made out, and it was only in simple justice that he refused to set loose further topics of agitation. The Kerry Defence Association had taken sweet counsel together and had got one piece of advice from a man entitled to be heard with respect by every tenant-farmer. The Roman Catholic Bishop of the diocese in which Kerry is, wrote, in reply to the Secretary of the Association—

"It is a matter of serious consideration whether your Association is calculated to further the just status of tenants, and whether the statements usually made at your meetings are founded on fact. I am convinced that you have done mischief to those whom you undertook to serve, and that the tenant-farmers could not trust their interests to you."

He thought it desirable most clearly to negative the Motion. He was happy to say that emigration from Ireland was rapidly ceasing, and that that country was now in a state which required no exceptional or startling legislation. The prosperity and peace which Ireland now fortunately enjoyed would ultimately bring contentment and union among all classes, and it was most desirable in the interests of the whole nation to leave the people to work out their prosperity by their own intelligence, industry, and self-reliance.

MR. BUTT thought it was necessary for him to say a few words, as it was evident that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down had a little misunderstood that Resolution. It said nothing about fixed rents, nor about valued rents; it simply affirmed that for the protection of the property already given by the Irish Land Act to the tenant more legislation was necessary. For a long time all the improvements made on the soil of Ireland were made by the tenant, and not by the landlord. Of late years there had been some exceptions to that rule; but, in the main, all existing improvements had been effected by the tenant. Under that system instances which Lord Clarendon had not hesitated to call robbery had been common. A Conservative Government had brought in a measure to protect tenants' improvements; but unfortunately, Mr. Napier's Bill was not passed, and evictions went on, by which unscrupulous landlords put into their own pockets the value of immense improvements made on the land by the labour and capital of their tenants. To correct that injustice, the Land Act of 1870 was passed, and by that Act the Legislature had solemnly recognized the property of the tenant in his improvements, and declared that he should have compensation for them if he were in his holding. The tenant's property was just as sacred as that of any landlord in the country, and it rested quite as much on law, morality, and justice. The Resolution now before the House affirmed that it was necessary to give further protection to that property. A landlord went to his tenants and told them—"I will evict you, if you do not assent to what may, perhaps, be a small increase of rent." That had been done, in many instances where the increase of rent was entirely taken out of the tenant's improvements, which the Land Act declared to belong to the tenant. If that could be established, was it not a case which called for a remedy? He would give the testimony of a man of large estate, who was universally respected, and who was allied with many of the first families in Ireland. Mr. Edward O'Brien, in a public letter to him (Mr. Butt), said that the Land Act as a security for the tenant's improvements totally broke down; that it provided no guarantees, direct or indirect, that rents should not be screwed up until the tenant was brought wholly to ruin, and the value of his improvements was taken from him by the landlord. It was not worth while for a tenant to enter into litigation with his landlord with reference to increased rent. Eviction was a weapon in the hands of a landlord which, if he chose, he could use unscrupulously, and Lord Carlingford, one of the framers of the Land Act, had said that this power of raising the rent to an unlimited extent was its weak point, though the instances of raising the rent might not be so frequent as Mr. O'Brien had stated. No amount of compensation that they could put into an Act of Parliament would protect a tenant against the terror of that weapon. The money given for compensation to a man driven from home and cast out upon the world was soon expended in the support of his family. Of this threat of eviction Mr. O'Brien told us the instances were not uncommon, and every man who knew Ireland told us the same. They could not pass lightly over the case of Mr. Buckley. His estate, when it was held by Lord Kingston, was a barren mountain. Under the Encumbered Estates Act it was bought for eight years' purchase. It came into the hands of an English company, who valued the rents and raised them. It was purchased from the company by a gentleman, of whom he did not wish to say a word of disrespect; but immediately after the purchase by him, the rents, which in the hands of the company, who were bound to make the most of the estate, were £4,000, were raised to nearly double that amount. In some cases the rents were raised from 100 to 150 per cent. He held in his hand the printed affidavits of the tenants, which had been proved in a court of justice. He could give numerous instances of a similar description. Some of the tenants who were settled were settled because they could not bear to leave the house where their fathers lived, nor could they bear to see their wives and families enter the poor-house. This Resolution raised the question whether they would allow the tenants who had reclaimed land on mountain sides to be robbed of their rights. In eight months no less than between 4,000 and 5,000 notices to quit had been served in Ireland; but they had not all been obeyed, because very many of the tenants had yielded to the demand for increased rent. Hon. Gentlemen talked of tenants feeling confidence, but when such a thing as was done by Mr. Buckley was heard of, the confidence of the whole country was shaken. He could bring forward a number of cases in which circulars had been issued to the tenants, calling on them, exactly the same as in the instance he had cited to submit to an increased rent, but he did not think he would detain the House by going through them. In former years—from 1847 to 1860—any one who could not find a tale of desolation as ruthless as ever swept over a land in 20 years of war, must have wilfully shut his eyes to what was passing. With regard to the Motion, he was authorized by the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) to say that he wished to withdraw his Motion in favour of the hon. Member for Kerry, so that the division would be whether there should be a Royal Commission or not. He knew something of the relations between landlord and tenant, and with all the responsibility of his position he could vouch for the necessity of an inquiry. Not an Irish newspaper but continually gave instances, and in a Court of Justice they were shown the miserable result. The oppression produced crime, crime its punishment, and again retaliation, and the miserable circle of oppression would never cease. He hoped there was no fear of agrarian crime in Ireland; but the fact of there being such an inquiry would give strength to the man who resisted temptation to join secret societies. It would strike down the arm of the would-be assassin, and save from crime. Oh, but he knew to what lengths some men, driven under the feeling of injury and hopelessness of redress, would go! So also the knowledge that their conduct would be brought into the full blaze of a House of Commons inquiry would deter many an unscrupulous, griping landlord.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that whatever opinion might be entertained as to the propriety of the proposed inquiry, he could not give a vote which would have the effect of submitting the proposition of the Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue) as a substantive Motion to the consideration of the House. That Motion meant, in his opinion, valued rents, or it meant nothing at all; and a principle which involved valued rents, appeared to him to conflict altogether with the freedom of contract. He knew that it might be said that the Act itself conflicted—and no doubt it did, in certain particulars—with freedom of contract; but it only did so in the way of imposing certain restrictions upon that freedom in order to meet evils which had grown up out of an exceptional state of things. The Land Act was not intended to upset the ordinary relations between landlord and tenant; but no doubt hard cases occasionally arose in connection with its operation. He was not convinced, however, by anything he had heard that evening that the prosperity of Ireland would be advanced or improved by the adoption of an altogether new and untried system, instead of that which had been found to work, on the whole, in a satisfactory way. The proposal of an inquiry, however, contained in the Amendment of which Notice had been given by the hon. Member for Kerry (Mr. Herbert), appeared to find a considerable amount of favour among the Representatives of the landlord class. He, however, could be no party to the appointment of a Committee or Commission which would be of a "fishing" character, and which would go over Ireland to seek for charges against landlords which could not otherwise be found. Neither did he think it would be a sufficient ground for the appointment of a Commission, that certain landlords felt themselves aggrieved by allegations which had been made against them, and which they might feel to be without foundation. But, on the other hand, it might be remembered that the Act which was passed in 1870 was to a certain extent a new settlement of the land question in Ireland. It was founded in some measure upon experience; but it was also founded a good deal upon theory, and a good deal upon principles which had never before been tried. It would not be reasonable to suppose that such an Act would immediately work in a manner which would be perfectly smooth, and the time might shortly come—if it had not already come—when an inquiry into the operation of the Act might possibly be attended with advantage. He should be averse to an inquiry, if it were supposed by the people of Ireland that it was intended to be a prelude to legislation on new principles, for the purpose of establishing fixity of tenure and the valuation of rents; but an inquiry into the operation of the Act with a view of seeing how far its objects had been obtained, and whether in its details it was not capable of amendment, might be desirable. Without pledging himself to say that the present was the proper time for such an inquiry, he should be sorry to see the wishes of landlords and others who desired inquiry altogether neglected. As the two proposals came as an Amendment to the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair, and as it would be impossible to say who among those who voted against that Motion voted for the one or the other of the Amendments, it would be necessary for him to vote for the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH reminded the House that the question before it was the Motion of the hon. Member for Tralee. He was surprised at the observations of the noble Lord opposite with respect to the general working of the Land Act. He had always supposed that the Land Act was one of the great efforts in legislation of the late Government, that it was considered by them with the utmost possible care, and carried through both Houses of Parliament as a settlement of that great question. If that were the case, it was certainly somewhat strange to hear the noble Lord, six years after the passing of that Act, state that in his opinion the time, perhaps, had already arrived when a fresh inquiry into the whole subject might be necessary; and, in fact, that this great Land Act was no settlement at all. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had rested his argument in support of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tralee almost wholly on the case of Mr. Buckley; but he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) deprecated the introduction into the debate of such cases, unless the circumstances could be fully discussed upon both sides. He desired to point out to the House that Mr. Buckley's case was still sub judice. A series of statements appeared in the public Press in Ireland, written by Mr. Casey, which imputed to Mr. Bridge very much what had been imputed in the House that night. A criminal information was obtained, it was argued, and it now stood for trial before the Courts. No one knew better the circumstances of the case than did the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, who was professionally engaged in it, and he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) did not think it was right to bring a matter of this kind before the House in a one-sided way, without giving Notice of an intention to do so.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING gave Notice of his intention to call the attention of the House to the question alluded to by the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and said he was perfectly prepared to substantiate what he had stated.

MR. A. MOORE said, he had addressed public meetings on this subject, and stated openly that he was prepared to prove that the greatest tyranny had existed.

BURIAL ACTS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

NOTICE OF AMENDMENT.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I beg to give Notice that in Committee on the Burials Bill I will move an Amendment on the 74th clause, and also move to add two clauses embodying the Resolution which was matter of discussion on the second reading. The words of my Amendment to the 74th clause and of the two clauses I will lay before your Lordships on another evening. I may observe that the Committee is put down for Ascension Day, and as that is a day on which your Lordships do not sit, I do not know whether there is any significance in the circumstance.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that the putting down of the Committee for Ascension Day must have been an oversight. He would bring it under the notice of his noble Friend the Lord President, who had charge of the Bill, but was not then in his place.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—PROCLAMATION OF NEUTRALITY.

QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: I gave my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) private Notice of a Question which I should not put in his absence, only I have no doubt the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies will be able to answer it. The Question is, Whether Her Majesty's Government will issue a Proclamation of Neutrality now that hostilities have broken out between Russia and Turkey?

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: In the absence of my noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who is at Windsor, I have to inform your Lordships that the Government will issue a Proclamation of Neutrality, and that probably it will be issued within the next few hours.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE EASTERN QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE'S RESOLUTIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it may be for the convenience of the House that I should read aloud the Resolutions I intend to propose on going into Committee of Supply on Friday next. There are five of them in all, and I proceed by way of Resolution in order to give Her Majesty's Government and private Members the greatest opportunity and facilities for dealing with the various points of the case, either separately or conjointly, as they may please. The Resolutions are as follow:—

"1. That this House finds just cause of dissatisfaction and complaint in the conduct of the Ottoman Porte with regard to the Despatch written by the Earl of Derby on the 21st day of September, 1876, and relating to the massacres in Bulgaria.

"2. That, until such conduct shall have been essentially changed, and guarantees on behalf of the subject populations other than the promises or ostensible measures of the Porte shall have been provided, that Government will be deemed by this House to have lost all claim to receive either the material or the moral support of the British Crown."

"3. That, in the midst of the complications which exist and the war which has actually begun, this House earnestly desires the influence of the British Crown in the Counsels of Europe to be employed with a view to the early and effectual development of local liberty and practical self-government in the disturbed Provinces of Turkey, by putting an end to the oppression which they now suffer, without the imposition upon them of any other Foreign Dominion.

"4. That, bearing in mind the wise and honourable policy of this Country in the Protocol of April 1826, and the Treaty of July 1827, with respect to Greece, this House furthermore earnestly desires that the influence of the British Crown may be addressed to promoting the concert of the European Powers in exacting from the Ottoman Porte, by their united authority, such changes in the Government of Turkey as they may deem to be necessary for the purposes of humanity and justice, for effectual defence against intrigue, and for the peace of the world."

The fifth Resolution simply combines the others in the form of an Address, and is as follows:—

"5. That an humble Address, setting forth the prayer of this House according to the tenour of the foregoing Resolutions, be prepared and presented to Her Majesty."

I may, perhaps, be permitted by the indulgence of the House to say one word in regard to the time and manner of bringing forward the Motion, as it may conduce to greater convenience. As I make this Motion on my own responsibility, and not as the organ of any Party or section of a Party in this House, I have adopted the means open to me, which reduce themselves, in fact, to placing the Notice on the Paper as an Amendment on going into Committee of Supply. At the same time, if I may presume to say so, I feel that it is desirable that every possible facility should be afforded for discussion and for the proposal of Amendments on a Motion of this character; and if through the kindness of hon. Members or of this House or of Her Majesty's Government I am able to propose it on Friday as a substantive Resolution, and not as an Amendment on going into Committee of Supply, or on some later day than Friday—although I hope an early day—I shall gladly and thankfully accept such an arrangement.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Perhaps, Sir, I may be allowed to say, with reference to the concluding observations of the right hon. Gentleman, that Her Majesty's Government will be perfectly prepared to place Monday at his disposal.

MR. GLADSTONE: It would be with an ill grace if I hesitated for a moment to accept that arrangement, and I accept it, as I said before, with thankfulness.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: I beg to give Notice that I shall move the Previous Question when the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions are put from the Chair.

LONDONDERRY LUNATIC ASYLUM.

QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD SMYTH asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, in consequence of the action recently taken by the Board of Governors of the District Lunatic Asylum of Londonderry and by the Board of Guardians of that Union, the Lord Lieutenant will withhold his sanction for the erection of a new asylum for the city and county of Londonderry?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: The Board of Governors of the District Lunatic Asylum of Londonderry proposed some little time ago to erect a new asylum, their existing asylum being very much overcrowded. They have, however, lately rescinded that decision, and the Lord Lieutenant does not at present propose to recommend to the Privy Council to sanction the erection of a new asylum for Derry, but to inquire whether the present asylum might not be enlarged.

ARMY—MILITIA ADJUTANTS.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT EMLYN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether the adjutants of five Militia regiments have been refused the increase of pay granted to all other adjutants of Militia under the Royal Warrant of the 20th day of November 1875, upon the ground that they are in receipt of half pay from the Marine Artillery; and, whether such half pay is not retired pay, and practically pension for past services; and if under the circumstances, he will take steps to place these officers in the same position as other adjutants of Militia, or allow them to retire upon similar terms to those offered under Royal Warrant of the 25th day of March 1875?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, it was not his intention to make any change in regard to the increase of pay to Adjutants of Militia.

NAVY—CASE OF MR. JOHN CLARE.

QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the Petition of Mr. John Clare, the inventor, patentee, designer, promoter, and upholder of the metal shipbuilding of the State Navy (vide records of the Admiralty since 1853), and the plaintiff in Clare v. The Queen, forwarded by him 17th June 1863, addressed to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, with the affidavits of John Morrison, iron shipbuilder, and John Clare; also the letter “requesting the Home Department to advise what Department of the State would initiate criminal proceedings against the Admiralty witnesses for perjury in Clare v. The Queen; and the opinion given by the Law Officers of the Crown?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, the Petition alluded to was sent in 1861, and the case tried in 1863, before Chief Justice Cockburn, in the Queen's Bench. In that year a motion was made for a new trial, and refused. In April, 1864, an appeal followed, when the judgment of the Court below was confirmed. It was not the custom to produce the opinions of the Law Officers of the Crown, and he must, therefore, decline to do so.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—EGYPT.—QUESTIONS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can give the House any information as to the course which Egypt is following or is likely to follow in the present war, and as to the position in which that country will be placed if she engages in active hostilities with a great European Power?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, with every disposition to answer the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy as fully and as accurately as possible, I am afraid I am unable to give a decided and accurate Answer at once to some of the Questions he has put on the Paper. The first Question is “whether I can give the House any information as to the course which Egypt is following or is likely to follow in the present war?” I am afraid I can hardly give an Answer to that Question. With regard to the second Question, “as to the position in which that country will be placed if she engages in active hostilities with a great European Power,” I am afraid I cannot answer that Question either. The hon. Gentleman does not say to what Power he alludes, and, if he did, it would not be safe to say what might be the prospective circumstances and consequences of going into war. At the same time, I am quite aware that, as he says, a great deal of interest is felt in this question out-of-doors, and I shall be happy to tell the House what we know. We have heard that the Khedive has been asked by the Porte to send further assistance, and he has promised to send such assistance as he properly can. He has also, I believe, appointed his son, Prince Hassan, to command the contingent which may be despatched from Egypt. At the same time, the Khedive has promised that none of the revenues pledged to Egyptian creditors shall be touched, and that he has the means of fulfilling all his engagements in regard to those creditors. Therefore, the assistance which the Khedive may send to the Porte will depend upon the amount of voluntary contributions which he can obtain from his subjects.

MR. GLADSTONE: Growing out of that interesting Answer, may I put a Question to the hon. Gentleman? He spoke simply of the monies due to Egyptian creditors. There is a very interesting question relating to the Turkish Loan of 1854, the payment of which is dependent upon remittances from Egypt. Is the hon. Gentleman in a position to tell me whether the intention of the Khedive to continue to make these remittances is included in what he said with reference to the fulfilment of his money engagements?

MR. BOURKE: I hope the House will excuse me if I am a little cautious in answering Questions of this kind which are put without Notice. I can only say that we have received a general statement on the part of the Khedive which I have given to the House, and I have no reason for a moment to believe that there is any alteration in the intention of the Khedive on the subject to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred.

IRELAND—POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—TELEGRAPH OFFICE IN BRUREE.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Postmaster General, If it is true that telegraph wires pass through the town of Bruree, in the county Limerick; and, if so, why it is that a telegraphic station has not yet been opened there, notwithstanding that it contains a money order office and is a petty sessions district, containing a population of over four thousand four hundred?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: It is true, Sir, that a telegraph wire passes through the town of Bruree; but no telegraph office had been opened there, as the amount of business likely to accrue would not warrant the expense.

THE POLICE AND THE TRANSFER OF LICENCES.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is true, as reported at the last Quarter Sessions for the county of Middlesex on the 26th instant, that the Commissioners of the Metropolitan Police have issued instructions forbidding the police to give to the justices at Petty Sessions any information as to the character of persons applying for transfers of licences, and the conduct of the houses for which such application is made?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, that to avoid information being given by the police on their own authority, without being sufficiently authenticated, instructions had been issued by the Commissioners of Police directing that in all cases of the transfer of licences the police should give to the Justices at Petty Sessions any information in their power as to the character and past history of persons applying for transfers, and the conduct of the houses for which such application was made, and that that information should be ready and available for the magistrates' use on the day when the cases come on, the policeman being present to verify the statement, and therefore to make it evidence on oath, instead of, as at present, evidence not properly authenticated.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—PROCLAMATION OF NEUTRALITY. QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: With the permission of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I have slightly altered the form of my Question in order more strictly to explain my object in putting it. The Question I have to ask the right hon. Gentleman is, Whether, in view of the hostilities between Russia and Turkey, and the effect which a war between those Powers must exercise upon the maritime and commercial interests of England, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to issue the accustomed proclamation of neutrality warning the subjects of the Queen of the penalties they will incur under the statute for the preservation of neutrality by any participation in such hostilities, and of their liability under the law of nations towards the belligerent Powers?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, Sir, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to issue a Proclamation of the accustomed character. Indeed, I may say, that such a Proclamation was settled last week—the draft of it; and it has been submitted to Her Majesty in Council at Windsor to-day, and, if received from Windsor in time, it will probably be published in an extraordinary Gazette this evening.

NAVY—ADMIRAL HOBART PASHA.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, as Hobart Pasha is a retired officer of the Navy, and cannot again be employed, and as retired pay has been earned for past services in the Navy, and cannot be legally withheld from any naval or marine officer when once placed on the retired list, even if in the service of a foreign government, as laid down by the law officers of the late Government, Sir John Coleridge and Sir George Jessell, he will be good enough to inform the House by what right or power Hobart Pasha, or any other officer, being no longer subject to the Naval Discipline Act, can be interfered with by the Admiralty; and, whether he has any objection to lay on the Table of the House the copy of such opinion, as well as the letter sent by the to the Accountant General of dated 13th of February, 1873, citation of the Parliamentary the 17th of March, 1876—Officers holding civil appoint-

F. EGERTON: In the absence of my right hon. First Lord of the Admiralty, the hon. Member will allow me this Question. I have first to say, in my opinion, the Question is irregular, being of an argu-

farquess of Hartington

mentative nature; but without entering into any argument upon it, it is sufficient to state that the Admiralty can recall into active service in case of war or emergency any officer on the retired or half-pay list, and has also power to remove from the list of the Royal Navy any officer whatever, whether on full, half-pay, or the retired list, and this without reason assigned. The opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown to which the hon. Member refers is immaterial to the question, and it could not, without breaking an invariable Rule, be laid on the Table of the House.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—NEUTRAL INTERESTS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which he had given him private Notice, Whether he has any information with reference to the regulations issued by the belligerent Powers which may affect the interests and the maritime commerce of England; and, if so, if he can lay it on the Table of the House?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, on hearing that the Russian military authorities intended to stop the navigation of the Danube, Her Majesty's Government directed Her Majesty's Consul at Galatz to telegraph any regulations that might be issued. He has replied that no regulations have been issued, but that all ships were to leave on the 28th, and that Galatz is clear. The British Vice Consul at Sulina telegraphed yesterday that the Russians were at Isotatika and had stopped all navigation upwards without giving notice, and had begun laying torpedoes in the river. No blockade of the Black Sea has yet been proclaimed; but the Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs has informed Her Majesty's Ambassador that a declaration with reference to the blockade of the Black Sea and the rights of neutrals will be immediately published. He has advised also that vessels should not attempt to proceed to Galatz, which is now the seat of war, or to Nicolaieff, or other Russian ports. As to the Bosphorus, Mr. Layard has received notice from the Porte—first, that the Dardanelles and Bosphorus are closed, both for entrance and exit, to all steam and sailing vessels from sunset to sunrise; secondly, the lighthouses in these straits, with the exception of the two great lighthouses at the entrance to the Bosphorus in the Black Sea and the two lighthouses of Sedal Bahr and Kolm Kaleh at the Dardanelles, will be extinguished. These may be extinguished by the military authorities. Thirdly, firing of guns and cannons in foggy weather, or an alarm signal is absolutely forbidden. That is all the information we have upon the subject, either with regard to the Danube, the Bosphorus, the Dardanelles, or the Black Sea.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I wish to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is not the fact that there are a large number of Egyptian troops already on the Danube?

MR. BOURKE: I believe that is the case.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL DILAPIDATIONS ACT.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can now state when he proposes to bring in a Bill to amend the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, he was not able to state when the Bill would be brought in. It was under the consideration of the Government, and would be laid upon the Table as soon as the state of Public Business would allow.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.—QUESTION.

MR. MARK STEWART asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, considering the great dread with which the agricultural interest regard the present outbreak of cattle plague in this Country, the Government will be prepared to give an early day for the discussion of that subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that, as the Question related to the general Business of the House, he might be permitted to say he regretted that in the present aspect of the Business of the House he could not manage to find a day for the discussion of the subject referred to, of which they admitted the importance, and which they were desirous of dealing with as quickly as possible by the appointment of a Select Committee. Some difficulties had been raised by hon. Members in different parts of the House with respect to the composition of the Committee, which had delayed its appointment, but he earnestly hoped that the Committee might be nominated as soon as possible, but he was not able to name any early day for a discussion of the subject.

COAL MINES—TYLDESLEY COLLIERY. QUESTION.

LORD LINDSAY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to a report in the newspapers that, owing to an explosion of gas in a colliery near Tyldesley belonging to Mr. Fletcher, a man has lost his life; and, as it was but a short time since an explosion occurred in the same pit, if he will cause a searching inquiry to be instituted in order that the real cause may be ascertained?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON (for the Secretary of State for the Home Department) said, that the attention of his right hon. Friend had been called to the sad occurrence in question, and that a searching inquiry had been ordered into the whole facts of the case, and the Home Secretary had directed a legal gentleman to attend the inquest to ascertain the facts.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION.

QUESTION.

In reply to MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH, MR. A. MILLS said, that since he had placed his Notice on the Paper the hon. Member for Maidstone had placed a Notice on going into Supply on the Education Estimates, raising the same issue he did not think it desirable to trouble the House with two discussions upon it, and, therefore, should not proceed with his Motion to-morrow.

PARLIAMENT — THE SALFORD ELECTION.—EXPLANATION.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish, with the indulgence of the House, to give an explanation in prosecution of the matter which was opened by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland the other day. It does not involve any charge on any one, but merely exculpates some persons outside the House. The right hon. Gentleman was under the impression, which was not unnatural, that a fraudulent use had been made of a letter of mine. I am, however, assured from Salford that no such fraudulent use was made of the letter. The letter was written on the 30th of March, and the death of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Cawley) which brought about the election occurred on the 2nd of April. The letter, unfortunately, was delivered at a place from which the club or society to which it was addressed had been removed, and was never discovered until the 17th of April, when they were in the thick of the election. At a meeting on the 17th a large extract was quoted from it, and on the 18th the letter was published in a Manchester paper, I think The Manchester Examiner—together with the date—in extenso, so that there could be no misunderstanding about the date at which it was written; and how it came into the London newspapers without the date I have no means of knowing. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, will see that there was no fraudulent use made of the letter whatever, and no ground for a charge against any persons in the place.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

(Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Assheton Cross, Mr. Walpole.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 26th April.]

(In the Committee.)

Clause 6 (Vacancies among Commissioners).

“ Provided, That the name of every person so appointed shall be laid before the Houses of Parliament within ten days after the appointment, if Parliament is then sitting, or, if not, then ten days after the next meeting of Parliament, and if within forty days after any such name has been laid before them either House by Resolution disallows the appointment, it shall be of no effect, but without prejudice to the validity of anything done thereunder.”

MR. GATHORNE HARDY could not accept the Amendment, because the appointment would be an executive act of the Crown, and the proper mode was to move an Address to the Crown. He could not consent to establish a precedent to appeal to the House of Commons against an executive act of the Crown.

MR. GOSCHEN pointed out that if a Commissioner should die or resign, the balance of the Commission might be disturbed by the fresh appointment, and Parliament would lose the small amount of control they had got at the present moment. He would recommend that no new appointments should be made until the number of Commissioners was reduced to six or five.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he had no objection to lay the names of the Commissioners before Parliament whenever new appointments were made.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT suggested that the object of the noble Lord would be met if he omitted the latter part of his Amendment.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he would accept that modification.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (Duration of Commission) agreed to.

Clause 8 (Chairman and meetings of Commissioners).

MR. HAYTER moved, in page 3, line 32, to leave out from beginning of clause to “meeting,” in line 36, with the object of giving the Commissioners the power of electing their own Chairman.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he could not accept the Amendment. He preferred that there should be a permanent Chairman, otherwise there would be a fresh election to the office every week. It was desirable that there should be one Chairman as head of the Commissioners with whom communication could be held; but, of course, at any meeting when the Chairman was absent the Commissioners would elect the Chairman for the day.

MR. MONK suggested that the Commissioners should have the power to elect at their first meeting a Chairman who should preside at all subsequent meetings.

Amendment negatived.

Clauses 9 and 10 agreed to.

Clause 11 (Powers of University and Colleges to make statutes).

MR. GOSCHEN moved, in page 4, after line 20, to add the following proviso :—

“That the Commissioners shall not approve the statute so made by a College until they have published, in such form as to them may seem fit, a statement with respect to the main purposes relative to the University for which, in their opinion, provision should be made under this Act, the sources from which funds for those purposes should be obtained, and the principles on which contributions from the Colleges for those purposes should be assessed.”

Under the clause it was reserved to every College to send in a scheme of reform, and the University itself was also to be allowed to send in a scheme of reform to the Commissioners. One of the main objects of the Bill was that the Colleges should contribute from their surplus revenues to the requirements of the University. What appeared to him the first step which the Commissioners, acting on behalf of the University, would have to take would be to arrive at some kind of plan as to what the total requirements of the University would be, and then, when they had arrived at such plan, to assess the Colleges in proportion to their revenues. The clause, as it stood, was almost nugatory, as practically the Commission would not be able to give its assent until it had the claims of all the Colleges before it, and it was merely in appearance that this invitation was issued to the Colleges. The Universities ought to know the total requirements for which provision would have to be made, and then the College revenues ought to be examined to ascertain the contribution required from each. There ought to be a financial scheme in the first instance. He wished that the principles of the reform should be stated. He struck at no principle of the Bill; it was a mere matter of convenience. There ought to be some uniformity in dealing with the Colleges.

MR. BALFOUR said, that the Amendment of which he had given Notice was in the form of an additional clause; the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite should have enabled the Commissioners to have settled some form of action at the commencement of their labours. One thing was in his (Mr. Balfour's) Amendment, but not in that of the right hon. Gentleman. If the clause that he had proposed was carried the Commissioners of each University would have to consult those of the other; if not, there might arise a general difference in the result of their action, especially with reference to the prize Fellowships.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that one great fault of the Bill was, that it contained no guiding principle for the Commissioners at all, and the Amendment supplied one. How could the Commissioners know what was to be paid by one without knowing the revenues of the rest?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that, as he had explained last year, his object was to deal with the Universities and Colleges as a whole, and not individually; and he thought the concluding words of the clause carried out that condition, so that virtually the clause embodied the principle of the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. There were many Amendments, and they could hardly tell how they would come out, and he would be obliged, therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman would postpone this discussion. In the meantime, he would consider the question with the draftsman, and endeavour to put the matter in such a shape as would be acceptable to the Committee. If, when the Bill passed through Committee, there should appear any doubt upon the point, he would on the Report, be ready to propose another clause in the spirit of the Amendment, which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would now withdraw, as the agreeing to it at the present moment might create some embarrassment when they came to deal with the 17th clause.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, that the principle upon which he proceeded was confidence in the Commissioners appointed. If the Amendment were carried, it would tie the hands of the Commissioners; he desired to leave them as far as possible unfettered.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that this clause gave permission to the Colleges to propose their schemes up to the end of 1878, which would be less than a year and a-half, according to the probabilities of the Royal Assent; and if the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman were carried, it would cause great delay. The Commissioners might dawdle over the improvements as the Judges did over the Judicature Act alterations.

MR. GOSCHEN disclaimed any wish to tie the hands of the Commissioners. He was sorry that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University had so little confidence in the Commissioners. He was willing to accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw his Amendment if its principle were embodied in the Bill.

MR. MOWBRAY observed that some Colleges had schemes waiting for sanction, and it would be undesirable that through any provision in that Bill those schemes should be indefinitely adjourned.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 12 (Power of Commissioners to make Statutes for University and Colleges) agreed to.

Clause 13 (Limitation of fifty years).

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE (in the absence of Mr. COURTNEY) moved in page 4, line 40, to leave out "unless" and insert "when." He said: I prefer my own proposal, to leave this clause out altogether, but for the moment I will confine myself to supporting the proposal that is before the House to modify it. It is generally believed among those who have not looked very deeply into the question, that this 50 years' limitation clause is intended only to exempt Keble College and Hertford College from the operation of the Bill. The real facts are very different. Keble College does not come under the Bill in any way, and this clause applies to a great number of emoluments which have nothing to do with those two Colleges, and most of which were not founded by private founders, but by the Colleges or Universities themselves. In other words, as the clause stands, the limitation affects not only the pious founder who is dead, but also the University and the College which are alive, and which in many cases have discovered the need for those changes which the clause forbids the Commissioners to make. The excuse of respect for the founder's intentions does not apply. The clause, for instance, exempts from the operations of the Commission most of the Regius Professorships in the University of Cambridge, for the conditions of the tenure of these ancient offices have been completely changed by modern instruments. I need hardly point out to the House that the clause also applies, directly and without any kind of doubt, to Professorships that are altogether modern—such, for instance, as that held by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt.) There are a great many new Professorships, founded since 1854, which, as I read this clause, are most improperly exempted from the operation of the Commission. In the University of Oxford I am told that the clause would withdraw from the ken of the Commissioners those All Souls' Professorships which many think a great abuse. Why should these Professorships be exempted, not only from the operation of any reforms which may be introduced, but from the very supervision of the Bodies which by the Bill we create? One of the All Souls' Professors, the Chichele Professor, Mr. Montague Burrows, who was elected to this reformed Chair of History over the heads of Mr. Froude and Mr. Freeman for no reason that anyone could discover, except that he was the leading Conservative agent in the management of the University, gets, I understand, £1,500 a-year under a deed sufficiently modern to be exempted by this clause from the provisions of the Bill. It would seem wise that the Commissioners should at least possess the power to examine into the conditions of tenure of such modern emoluments as these. I cannot conceive that the clause can be left as it now stands. It is a most mischievous clause. It makes impossible consistent and comprehensive action by the Commissioners, and will probably lead the Commissioners to leave a large side of the University system altogether untouched, rather than deal with it so lightly as this clause compels. The clause exempts from the powers of the Commission in the University of Cambridge many Scholarships, all the minor Scholarships and Exhibitions, and 11 Professorships. If the Commissioners wished to alter the mode of election to Professorships, the old method of election would have to be retained for the 11 Professorships which have been founded within 50 years. This matter is one of practical and of pressing importance. It is now being discussed at Cambridge by a Syndicate, which has reported in favour of Electoral Boards; and the reform which has been proposed cannot be carried out by the Commission because of the obstacle which this clause imposes. The effect of it will be, that the Commissioners, finding themselves unable to deal with all the Professorships, will decline to deal with any. If we leave Professorships for a moment and consider minor Scholarships or Exhibitions, we must remember that most people, both at Cambridge and at the larger schools, are dissatisfied with the Minor Scholarship system, which drives schoolmasters to adopt a hot-bed process of training. It is, perhaps, impossible to altogether rid the Universities and the schools of the present system of buying scholars with Exhibitions; but it would at least appear to be a pity to tie the hands of the Commissioners; and it must be borne in mind that the clause will tie the hands of the College authorities, as well as of the Commissioners, since, by Clause 11, the Colleges have only "the like powers as are conferred on the Commissioners." To leave modern emoluments created by the Universities and the Colleges, and to come for a moment to those comparatively rare cases in which there is a private founder, it is a poor compliment to the pious founder to say that he would not wish the University and the Commissioners to make the best possible use of his gift. To maintain this clause as it stands, is not only to contend that the founder knew better what was best for posterity than posterity itself, but also to contend that the University 40 years ago knew better what would be best for the University now than does the University of the present day, and than do the Commissioners whom by this Bill we appoint. Why should you limit and tie up the Commissioners by this restriction? It has been said that it was introduced in deference to the wishes of a deputation of Cambridge Liberals, but that is a monstrous mis-statement. They suggested 50 years as preferable to 100 years—that is all. The 100 years' limitation, which had been proposed by Lord Salisbury, would have withdrawn Downing College from the ken of the Commission: the clause as it stands would withdraw Hertford College, Oxford from its ken, and I have authority to say that the Cambridge Liberals who objected to Downing College being thus withdrawn from the inquiry, object equally to Hertford College being withdrawn from it as is still proposed. The clause, moreover, is full of legal difficulties, upon which I hope that we may have the opinion of the ablest lawyers in the House. Almost all College property at Oxford, including both corporate property and trust property, was dealt with by ordinances made under the Act of 1854. Old Fellowships, Scholarships, and Exhibitions were suppressed, and new ones were founded and endowed out of the proceeds of that suppression. In many of these cases it would be difficult to contend that the ordinance itself was not "the instrument of foundation or endowment." But, if so, the "emolument" would be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the Commissioners. The Bill contains no definition of "instrument of endowment," though it does contain a definition of "instrument of foundation." As I read the clause, the Commissioners not only cannot touch the object or purpose of the emolument, but cannot even reform the conditions of tenure, or the mode of appointment or election. The distinct prohibition of this clause must override all the enabling provisions of the Bill. If the clause is retained, the Commissioners will run the risk at every minute that they sit of acting ultra vires, and will be hampered by every kind of legal difficulty. The Act of 1854 contained no such limitation with respect to College endowments; although it did with respect to University endowments. I would ask the Conservative Members of this House, whether they may not with safety negative this clause, and trust to the Conservative instincts of Lord Selborne, Lord Redesdale, and Dr. Bellamy; of the Bishop of Worcester, Dr. Lightfoot, and Professor Stokes?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he did not accept the hon. Baronet's interpretation of the clause. In order to prevent ambiguity, however, he would, if it appeared legally necessary, so word the clause as to make it refer only to University or College emoluments under 50 years' standing; not to new emoluments derived from old foundations, though they had been diverted to other than their original uses.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN thought it was undesirable to fetter the discretion of the Commissioners with respect to the date of the endowments with which they might deal. He pointed out that as the clause stood, an endowment which had been given long before the limit of 50 years, but which had been recently increased, would be put out of the power of the Commissioners.

MR. BRISTOWE considered that the Commissioners, if restricted from dealing with the funds of Colleges as far as recent endowments were concerned, would not be able to touch their real financial condition.

MR. STAVELEY HILL hoped it would be made very clear that endowments established within the last 50 years should not be touched by the Commissioners.

MR. SPENCER STANHOPE hoped that the hon. Member for Chelsea would withdraw the Amendment.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE thought they might trust the Conservative instincts of the Commissioners without tying up their hands.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, what he wished was that the clause should be left in the Bill, but on the Report, if needful, he would make it quite clear what was meant by it.

MR. GOSCHEN pointed out that the words used were "instrument of endowment," and that this might apply to arrangements made under the Act of 1854. He urged that the clause should be postponed until the Government Amendments should be put on the Paper.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was glad that the term "endowment" was used instead of "foundation" in the Bill.

MR. COURTNEY was disposed to respect the limit of 50 years where money had been actually brought into the University. He was ready to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. LOWE put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be better to postpone the clause.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he must take a vote upon the principle of the clause; he would settle the details, if it should be deemed necessary, on the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen

On Question, "That the clause stand part of the Bill?"

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, on moving the omission of the clause, said, it was somewhat hard to discover the exact meaning of the clause, and what would be its exact effect, if passed; but if his view of it was correct, the clause proposed to effect an act of flagrant injustice, by permitting newly-made corporations, which had obtained full University privileges, and which had been allowed to stand upon an equal footing with older foundations, to escape the burdens imposed by this Bill on the older foundations, whilst retaining all the advantages which accrued to them as States of the University Federation. The clause also appeared to him to allow action on the part of the Commissioners in direct contravention of the principles laid down in the Preamble of the Bill, which stated that the object of the Bill was to enrich the Universities from the overplus of College revenues; for this clause, taken in connection with the rest of the Bill, allowed the Commissioners to apply the revenues of the older foundations to the increase of the emoluments attached to those more recently created. This intention was clearly indicated by the three last lines of the clause. It should be distinctly understood that under them there was power, and power which he had reason to fear would be exercised, to take money from the older foundations and to give it to Ecclesiastical Seminaries.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY said, he did not see on what ground of justice or expediency the clause could be legitimately resisted. He hoped the hon. Baronet would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 234; Noes 134: Majority 100.—(Div. List, No. 97.)

Clause 14 (Regard to main design of founder).

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN moved to omit the clause altogether, taking exception to some of the phrases contained in it, which he thought would make the fortune of lawyers. What, for instance, was meant by "the main intention of the Founder," and how could that intention be carried out in the case of a pre-Reformation Founder? Then, again, what meaning would a lawyer attach to such a phrase as "alteration in substance?" He remembered a Vice Chancellor saying that the word "substantial" was the most costly word in the language; and he took it for granted that the object of the Bill was to give the Commissioners power to remove restrictions. That was a power which, with regard to the intentions of the Founders, he could not agree to. The clause would either be a dead letter or would very much tie the hands of the Commissioners, and he thought he had made out a good ground for omitting it.

MR. WALPOLE supported the clause, and urged that it ought to be retained, as it could not have the effect which the hon. Member stated, but would have a very useful operation in practice, as a guide for the Commissioners. The clause embodied no new principle, as there was one containing similar words in the Endowed Schools Act.

MR. CLIFFORD regarded the words of the clause as too vague, and said he should support his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Denbighshire if he went to a division.

MR. MOWBRAY was astonished that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Denbigh was not acquainted with the Act of 1854, which was passed under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and which contained clauses similar to that now proposed.

MR. GOSCHEN thought the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mowbray) had not entirely appreciated the effect of the clauses he had referred to in the Act of 1854. The point of the present clause was prohibitive, because it actually forbade the Commissioners to do anything contrary to the main designs of the founders. He disapproved of the insertion of this clause.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL supported the clause.

MR. DODSON said, he thought the Committee would not do very wrong if it rejected the clause, as it contained some lax and doubtful morality. He thought they might fairly trust the Commissioners to deal properly with the endowments in question. The directions laid down in the clause would not, in his opinion, in any way strengthen their hands.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the difficulty raised in this discussion was one which was always encountered in endeavours to reform ancient institutions. They wanted to prevent the reformers from going too far, and yet they were apprehensive for themselves lest they should pull up too soon. Although the Commissioners might appreciate the fact that certain endowments had, for a great length of time, been diverted from the main design of the founder, they were not bound to constitute themselves an antiquarian committee, and simply to rummage out old title-deeds and documents going back 600 years; the clause was simply a direction to them as to the lines on which they should travel. If, however, the practical working of any foundation was found to be consistent with the main design of the founder, there ought, he contended, to be a prejudice in its favour, so that a Professorship of law, for instance, should not be turned into a Professorship of medicine, or a Professorship of music into one of comparative anatomy.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN would be sorry to show any disrespect for endowments, or to see the Commissioners altogether set aside what might be the excellent intentions of founders; but he thought his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge had furnished a strong argument against the clause. He could very well understand that there might be a Professorship of anatomy or other Professorship, the lectures on which experience might have shown that nobody would attend, which might be very advantageously supplanted by another Professorship of which numbers would avail themselves. It would be unwise, therefore, he maintained, to tie the hands of the Commissioners, and so prevent them from acting in the manner that they might deem to be most beneficial for the interests of the University. In fact, the question was entirely one of placing confidence in the Commissioners, who, he thought, might be depended on not to go against the design of a founder unless it was impossible to give it effect. The Government had carried their own Commissioners, and could surely have confidence in them. The best thing to do would be to strike out the clause altogether.

MR. J. G. TALBOT was of opinion that certain great principles ought to be laid down by Parliament for the guidance of the Commissioners.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, the clause was, in point of fact, obligatory, and therefore prohibitive against doing that which was the subject of the obligation, as the Commissioners were not to do anything without having regard to the main design of the founder. 'If the Committee intended to accept the words in that sense well and good, but they ought clearly to understand what they were voting for.

MR. STAVELEY HILL said, that in this clause the words were "shall have regard," while in the Act of 1854 the words were "it shall be lawful" for every College for the purpose of effecting the main design of the founder to do certain things, and he contended that the words in that Act were far more obligatory than in the clause now under consideration.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT considered that the hon. and learned Member had just proved that there was really no obligation under the Act of 1854, and he must have convinced the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) that the words "it shall be lawful" were more elastic than the words "shall have regard."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was quite satisfied with the form of the words in the clause. The clause only meant that full consideration should be given to the main design of the founder, and did not impose an imperative obligation as to any particular form of action.

MR. GOSCHEN did not clearly understand whether or not the Government concurred in the view of the clause expressed by the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), which was, that if a chair of anatomy, for example, had been founded, the subject of study could not 50 years afterwards be changed.

MR. DALRYMPLE said, he did not think that a foundation even within the past 50 years was covered by this clause. If the clause were read in the light of the clause preceding it, the objection to it would be removed.

MR. BRISTOWE said, the words "shall have regard to" were imperative, unless certain things had occurred.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, if the word "main" did not precede "design," the clause would be open to the criticisms made, but the word "main" showed that the Commissioners were not to be over minute.

MR. GRANT DUFF asked whether the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill accepted the interpretation of the last speaker?

MR. HERSCHELL asked whether the clause carried out the intention of the right hon. Gentleman? He should like to know, if the Commissioners were merely to take into consideration the main design of the founder when making a statute, or whether they were not to make a statute in furtherance of that main design? He submitted that the latter was what they would have to do, especially when the use of the same words of the next clause was considered.

MR. MARTEN said, it would not be imperative to carry the main designs of the founder into effect.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, hon. Members seemed to overlook the difference between an enabling and an obligatory clause. Three different interpretations of this clause had been given, and it was likely as many different interpretations would be given by Courts of Law. If the main design of the founder was to have regard to education, religion, learning, and research, the matter might be left to the 15th clause.

Clause 15 (Provision for education, religion, &c.).

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY moved, in page 5, line 13, to insert the word "and," in order afterwards to omit the word "research." He wished to know why, if research was a good thing, it should not be covered by the word "learning" or "religion." The fact was that it was originally inserted to conciliate a small and enthusiastic clique whose opinions were now at a discount. Some one said that the endowment of research really meant the research of endowment; but, for his part, he wished to get the word "research" out of the clause, and thus retain the English character of our Universities.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 13, after the word "religion," to insert the word "and."—(Lord Francis Hervey.)

MR. BRISTOWE supported the Amendment. He should like to have an explanation from the Government of what was really meant by the term "research." He considered that no University funds should be devoted to the founding or endowing of Professorships where the duties of the Professors did not directly tend to supply the educational requirements of the Universities, however desirable or useful the scientific investigations to be pursued might be.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the noble Lord and the hon. Gentleman seemed to be under the apprehension that if research were brought into the University, education would be driven out. On the contrary, he held that no teaching could be successful that was not founded on the most minute research. He was convinced that it was of advantage to introduce the word into the Bill; but it was not intended to enable persons to prosecute research on an extensive scale without teaching. There were, no doubt, many subjects of research which by their nature were not lucrative to those who prosecuted them, but the prosecution of which was of great importance to education throughout the country, and especially to the University in which they were carried on. There was, however, no intention to carry research to the extravagant lengths which some speakers and writers feared would be the case, and which would utterly pervert the purposes of the University. So far from diminishing the educational power of the University, that which was proposed would give to education a more solid basis than it now possessed.

MR. TREVELYAN, in opposing the Amendment, observed that the explanation which the right hon. Gentleman had just given was in all respects satisfactory. They could not have a University where education was proceeding without research proceeding at the same time. It was most important that men who had a taste and strong desire for prosecuting inquiries on abstruse subjects should receive due encouragement.

MR. BARING said, he was in favour of the Amendment. If the Universities were to make specific grants for specific work, there should be University supervision with a view to secure that no part of the money was thrown away.

MR. GRANT DUFF agreed with his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs in considering the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War satisfactory. As he understood the right hon. Gentleman, those who were responsible for the measure simply meant that Oxford and Cambridge should not be placed in a worse position with regard to scientific investigation than were the other great Universities of the world—nothing more and nothing less.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN had hoped the Committee would have been unanimous after the speech of the Secretary at War. No doubt a great deal of nonsense had been written and spoken about "research;" but because a word had been abused, that was no reason for excluding its use. The present clause merely allowed provision to be made for research generally; and, if necessary, a closer definition of what was intended might be inserted in a subsequent clause.

Question put, "That the word 'and' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 12; Noes 172: Majority 160.—(Div. List, No. 99.)

MR. GREGORY moved, in page 5, line 15, the omission of the words, "that those interests of the college," and the insertion in their place of the words "to the maintenance of such college as a place of education, and of the emoluments of the same," the interests referred to being education, religion, and learning. The effect of the Amendment, therefore, was that the Commissioners in making a statute for a College should have regard, in the first instance, to the maintenance and purposes of that College.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he would accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 16 (Objects of statutes for University).

MR. BERESFORD HOPE moved, in page 5, line 23, that after the word "purposes" the following words be inserted:—

"With power to the Colleges, with the consent of the Commissioners, to commute any annual payments for a capital sum."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY thought the Amendment was not an unreasonable one.

MR. GOSCHEN hoped it was clearly understood that the commutation would be for the present annual payments. Care should be taken that the Colleges should not be exempted by that Amendment from any future annual payment which might be put upon them.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it would refer only to the annual payments made at the time of the commutation.

MR. COURTNEY was rather surprised that the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge had made that proposal. For himself, as a Member of one of the Colleges, he should be slow to assent to that commutation.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. GOSCHEN moved the insertion in the first sub-section, after "regard being first had," of the words "in the case of all Colleges serving any educational purpose." The insertion of those words would secure the educational wants of a College being satisfied in the first instance before it should be called upon to contribute to the University, and where the educational wants of a College were none, or very small, then the prior claims of the University should be satisfied in preference to those of the College. If his Amendment were adopted it would leave the Commissioners free to deal with All Souls', and if found advantageous to apply its surplus to the benefit of the University. Why, for instance, should not its law library be added to the Bodleian, and then instead of belonging to one College only, it would be available for the whole University.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY was unwilling to accept that Amendment, which he did not think would effect its object, and which would tend to cast a slur on All Souls' that was not altogether deserved. The words proposed would not exclude All Souls', because All Souls' did serve educational purposes. It was the means of endowing Professorships, and it also much encouraged the study of law and history. When the educational purposes of All Souls', such as keeping up its magnificent library, which was the finest in Europe, had been supplied, the surplus could be got at by the means provided in the 17th section. He was not inclined to declare in the Bill that any College did not serve educational purposes.

MR. DODSON thought the arguments of the Secretary of State for War told in favour rather than against the Amendment. The Amendment was directed against a hypothetical College not named which did not serve educational purposes. If All Souls' did not come under that description, the clauses would not affect it.

MR. MOWBRAY opposed the Amendment, as being directed ad invidiam against a particular College. Their legislation should be directed against actual and not mere hypothetical cases.

MR. JAMES remarked that All Souls', which enjoyed £15,000 a-year, could only be said to fulfil educational purposes in a very qualified sense. The Fellowships of All Souls' were really idle Fellowships in the strictest sense. They always appeared to him as a kind of Oxford aldermen—excellent fellows who gave sumptuous dinners.

MR. MARTEN objected to the Amendment, because it cast a grave imputation on the College. He thought that if All Souls' were to be attacked, it should be by a separate clause in the Bill.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND thought the words of the clause sufficient as they stood. All Souls' might be made much more educational than it was; but it was an important College, and had done good service. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would not press his Amendment.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the broad principle was that in such a case as that of All Souls' the University ought to take precedence of the College. The Amendment was not to cast any blame on all Souls'; but as the clause was drawn the "Collegiate purposes" of All Souls' were to take precedence of University requirements. What were these Collegiate purposes? He had thought that it was a pleasanter way of raising the question than to point at All Souls' in an Act of Parliament. If these words were not inserted he should consider whether, either in a separate clause or on Report, the case of All Souls' ought not to be dealt with. He would withdraw the Amendment.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that years ago All Souls' was a College in which gentlemanly manners were best taught, but good manners seemed to be considered a superfluity in the present day. He, however, rose to ask two questions—If there were to be in this Bill any assignment of the funds of the Colleges to the Universities; and if there were to be any means by which Colleges could commute by capital sums the payments required from them by the Commissioners?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the last question was already answered by an Amendment carried in Committee, and with regard to the other there was a Motion not yet come on of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) which he was not yet prepared to accept, because it would not be fair to some Colleges.

MR. GOSCHEN explained that he had not said that he was in favour of any particular scheme; he only wished that power should be given to the Commissioners.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DODSON asked what was the meaning of "other collegiate purposes?" To put himself in Order he would move to omit the words "and other collegiate."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, they were the management of the estate, the maintenance of the buildings, the keeping up of the library, and the support of a society for effecting these purposes.

MR. GREGORY moved, in page 5, line 25, after "purposes," to insert

"and provided that such contribution shall not exceed five pounds per centum of the net revenues of any college, unless with the consent of two-thirds of the governing body of such college present and voting at a meeting of such body specially called for the purpose."

He calculated that the £5 per cent on the net income of the Colleges would amount to £15,000 per annum, or £20 per cent of the present revenue of the University of Oxford, and in the case of Cambridge University to £12,000, or 50 per cent on the revenue of the University. He thought it quite unnecessary for University purposes to go beyond the limits prescribed, and without the necessity it would be injustice to the Colleges to alienate their revenues to any greater amount.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN thought it would be impossible for the Commissioners to act under such a proviso as that. If the principle of the Bill, which was to compel Colleges to make contributions out of their funds to the University, was not a good one let them say so; if it was good, why should they stop at 5 per cent?

MR. BALFOUR opposed the Amendment.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that the speech of the hon. Member for East Sussex was not so much a speech in favour of the Amendment as one which ought to have been made on the second reading of the Bill. The Amendment was really an attempt to drag a herring across the scent and to take its vitality from the Bill.

MR. FORSYTH said, that having appointed Commissioners under the Bill, it would not be right now to tie down their hands, as would be done by the Amendment.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH opposed the Amendment on the ground that a uniform rate of 5 per cent would not be suitable.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the whole scope of the Bill was to give the Commissioners power to inquire into the wants of the Universities and Colleges, and a discretion to act accordingly. He hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

Amendment negatived.

MR. GOSCHEN moved, in page 5, line 25, after subsection 1, to insert—

"2. For the creation, by means of contribution from the colleges or otherwise, of a common University Fund, to be administered under the supervision of the University in accordance with statutes made under this Act. 3. For making payments, under the supervision of the University, out of said common fund for the giving of instruction, the doing of work, or the conducting of investigations in any branch of learning or inquiry connected with the studies of the University."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was rather reluctant to adopt the principle laid down in the Amendment, that there should be a Common University fund. He would rather leave it to the Commissioners to say how the contributions should be made, and what should be done with them when made, than lay down exactly the plan which the Commissioners should follow. He was willing to accept the third of the right hon. Gentleman's proposals omitting the words "out of the said common fund."

MR. GOSCHEN said, he proposed that a common fund should exist for all purposes, and not simply for certain purposes that might be specified. He did not wish that the contributions of the Colleges should be ear-marked for particular purposes. If funds were asked for from the Colleges to found certain Professorships, it might be that, after a certain time, those Professorships would be unnecessary. What he meant by a common University fund already existed to a certain extent at Oxford in the "University chest," but there was nothing of the kind at Cambridge. The arrangement he proposed would be purely financial, and would enable the Commissioners to deal in a more satisfactory way with the Colleges.

MR. BRISTOWE supported the Amendment.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY expressed his regret that at present he could not accept the proposal to create a common University fund. The Oxford University chest had a limited and not a general application.

MR. GOSCHEN having consulted with high authorities at Oxford, was enabled to say that they approved of his proposal.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that in the meantime he would accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman; but, at the same time, he should think himself at liberty to re-consider the matter upon Report.

Amendment agreed to.

On the Motion of MR. STAVELEY HILL, a subsection was agreed to, enabling the Commissioners to draw up statutes for the abolishing and disendowing Professorships or Lectureships.

MR. BRISTOWE moved, in page 5, line 34, the omission of sub-section (6), which related to providing retiring pensions for Professors and Public Readers.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the sub-section merely gave power to the Commissioners to grant pensions in certain special cases. Retiring pensions would be very rarely given. As the operation of this sub-section of the clause would be more prospective than retrospective, he hoped the Committee would agree to pass it. Without some such provision Professors might retain their appointments long after they became useless for teaching purposes.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT was in favour of the clause as it stood, and was sorry it did not also apply to Heads of Colleges. The retiring allowance was fixed on such a low scale as to preclude the possibility of jobbery.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN considered the clause in question the best part of the Bill.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND would like to see the clause go further, and provide for the retirement of Heads of Houses.

MR. GOSCHEN thought it was necessary that pensions should be occasionally granted. He hoped, however, the Commissioners would not think that the Committee were in favour of a large scheme of retiring pensions, as that would lead to notorious jobs and abuses.

MR. JAMES moved, in page 5, after line 40, that power should be given to the Commissioners—

"For providing instruction for any members of the University during any University vacation."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the Amendment was an attempt to place upon the Universities a task which they never undertook. It was not the University which arranged for the teaching of Undergraduates, but the Colleges and the censors of unattached students. The Universities could not arrange that the Colleges should be kept open. But these were, after all, things which could be best settled by the Universities and Colleges among themselves. So far as he was aware, anyone who now wished to study during the Long Vacation was not prevented from doing so.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE protested against the assumption that there was no systematic study in the Long Vacation at the University of Cambridge, at least.

At Cambridge the old practice of reading parties at a distance, had been practically found to be not unfrequently a system of organized pleasuring, and so the habit had grown up of allowing reading men to stop up during the Long Vacation. This brought back the private tutors, and enough men remained to encourage each other in their studies, and fill up the time of those tutors. The Long Vacation was generally regarded as a fourth term for reading men.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that this Bill was to provide for the future University teaching, and not teaching by the Colleges alone. He thought it a scandal to the great endowments both of the Colleges and the Universities that they should strike work for so many months in the year; for he differed from his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge as to there being teaching at the University which he represented during the Long Vacation. He had remained at Cambridge during the Long Vacation, but neither University nor College did anything in the way of teaching. The private tutors no doubt were there, but they were the luxury of the rich. The question was whether the Universities were to be places of teaching for the masses of the nation or not. Nominally they gave instruction during three years, but practically it extended only over two years; one-third of the time was lost in vacations. There ought, he contended, to be instruction supplied throughout the year, so that young men who could not afford to spend three years at a University might be enabled after the lapse of two years, and at the age of 20 instead of 23, to enter on the active pursuits of life.

MR. MOWBRAY pointed out that the question raised by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford was a much wider question than that raised by the Amendment. The hon. and learned Gentleman had endeavoured to force his views as to the abolition of the Long Vacation on the Profession of which he was such a distinguished ornament, and the only result of the Judicature Act was that the Judges commenced the Long Vacation earlier than before. He hoped they would not be led away by the discussion of the limited subject raised by the Amendment to that of the much-wider issue raised by the speech of the hon and learned Gentleman.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN thought it would be impossible in a Bill such as that under discussion to draw an exact line as to the course which the Commissioners should pursue in the matter. These were matters which should be left to the Universities and Colleges themselves.

MR. FORSYTH confirmed what had been stated by the hon. and learned Member (Sir William Harcourt) as to no instruction being given at Cambridge during the Long Vacation.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN argued in favour of trusting to the Commissioners as to the expediency of devising means for providing instructions at the Universities out of Term. For his own part, he thought the Amendment was founded on common-sense, and that it was most desirable that University instruction should not be entirely closed to students during the long periods of vacation.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER was of opinion that a good deal of time was wasted in the vacations. He did not, however, think the difficulty would be met by the Amendment, and would prefer that an Undergraduate should be enabled to take the ordinary degree in two instead of three years.

MR. LOWE said, that the intention of the clause was a good one, but the means proposed for carrying it were not good. He did not see how the Universities could with any propriety make rules for teaching out of Term time. It was a monstrous abuse that the Universities should teach only half the year, as the other half was wasted in vacations. That which could be done in two years was spread over a longer period. Many men were taught at the Universities in the vacations. He had had some experience in that matter, for he had taught many, and he did not require an Act of Parliament to tell him what to do. The Universities should do a fair quantity of work, but they did not do that at present.

MR. GOSCHEN suggested that the Amendment should be withdrawn for the present, in order to see whether something might not be done in a later part of the clause towards lengthening the studies and shortening the vacations.

MR. JAMES accepted the suggestion, and offered to withdraw the Amendment.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND remarked that the University had already sanctioned unattached students, and something ought to be done to enable the University out of its funds to provide the means for enabling poor men to continue their studies during the Long Vacation at Oxford.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HANBURY moved the omission of the words of sub-section 8 which enable the Commissioners to "found" scholarships or otherwise to assist "poor and meritorious students." It would be sufficient he said to treat this class as unattached students, not members of any College or Hall.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 40, to leave out the words "diminishing the expense of University education by."—(Mr. Hanbury.)

MR. MOWBRAY said, the clause had been introduced at the instance of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and was supported by a memorial of the working classes, in whose interest especially it was put forward, and he did not see that there was anything invidious in it. They might, he thought, use those words in order to harmonize with the intention of the clause. The Universities were strongly in favour of it as it now stood.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in supporting the Amendment, said, that that sub-section would have the effect of giving special scholarships to a body of men to whom the ordinary exhibitions of the Colleges were already open, and by the best of whom they were obtained. The result would be, of course, an artificially low standard. The sub-section was not in the Bills as originally introduced last year, and the words were put in without sufficient consideration in the House of Lords. They should by all means allow men to come and reside at the Universities, however little they might know; but they got into every kind of difficulty so soon as they began paying them to come. Plenty of scholarships were open to the unattached students, and those who were not only "poor," but also "meritorious," could obtain them. At Cambridge, for instance, all the scholarships at Trinity, all the scholarships at King's, all the University scholarships, and many more were open to the unattached students.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that poor and meritorious students ought to be assisted in their University career; but it should be by their friends in the country or by exhibitions from the grammar schools, rather than by the University—the one body which ought not to know them in their social relations. He trusted that the House would adopt the Amendment.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN entirely concurred in the views expressed by his hon Friend the Member for Chelsea. The principle upon which these rewards should be distributed should be the plain one detur digniori. The clause would have the effect of turning Oxford and Cambridge into eleemosynary institutions. He hoped the hon. Member would press his Motion to a division.

MR. NEWDEGATE saw the gravest objections to the clause as it stood. It would place the College funds in a position to be drawn upon in a most unfair manner. Poverty and merit combined were already met by the scholarships existing in connection with the public schools. He had known instances of the association of poor men with rich men at the University proving almost ruinous to the poor men, from the style of living to which it accustomed them, and which they were not thereafter able to keep pace with. The proposed change ought not to be made, more particularly at a time when the expenses of University education were so much complained of.

MR. BRISTOWE observed that the result of the working of the sub-section would be that funds would be taken from Colleges which had done excellent educational work to found unattached scholarships. He had no objection to unattached students; but the former was a policy which, in his view, was utterly to be deprecated.

MR. FAWCETT could not agree with those who held that a discretionary power on the subject should not be placed in the hands of the Commissioners. It was, in his view, most unlikely that the scholarship funds should be diminished; in fact, the Commissioners would very probably find a strong current of opinion that they might be advantageously augmented. The question before the Committee was, what was to be done with the superfluous funds of the Colleges, and of all the purposes which had been suggested to which the College funds might be applied, none seemed to be more worthy of careful consideration by the Commissioners than that they should devote some portion of any funds to be given by the Colleges to the establishment of unattached scholarships. He objected to the scholarships of his own College being diminished; but if there were £500, or £600, or £700, surplus funds of his College, he should not object to a portion of it being handed over to the University and a portion devoted to reward unattached students by giving them scholarships. This class of students was one that ought to be particularly encouraged, and it was a special one, composed largely of men who had their own reasons for not entering Colleges. Some of them were men who wished to take a degree comparatively late in life. The Commissioners would, of course, deal permissively with only surplus funds, and he did not think they could be better employed than for the benefit of the unattached students.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, it appeared to him there were two questions of importance before them. The one was whether they should have any Colleges at all specially for poor students. All that he heard on the subject tended to show that it was neither advantageous to the students nor to the Universities to have such Colleges. The other was whether the power should be given to Colleges to award scholarships to unattached students. It appeared to him that it would be of great advantage to the Universities to give them the power of applying a portion of their funds to teach such unattached students and fit them for scholarships. Both the objects he had named could be attained by leaving out the words objected to by the hon. Member for Tamworth.

MR. LOWE said, the objection entertained with regard to poverty applied to a great extent to these unattached students by making them a privileged class, and giving them the means of obtaining money easier. The unattached students were not on a par with others, because the condition of obtaining a scholarship in a College was, that a student must go into residence, and an unattached student, although he might be able to live frugally in his lodgings, might be equally able to do so in College with the assistance of scholarships and then be able to compete. The way to meet the difficulty would be by founding a number of scholarships capable of being held by persons belonging to Colleges and unattached students, in which case they would be placed on a level with others, and they would not be deprived by poverty of obtaining that which was open to other persons.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it was quite true that this clause was not in the Bill when it was originally introduced into the other House by his noble Friend. In adopting the clause it would be necessary that the Commission should have power to pay salaries from the University funds to the teachers of unattached students. There were men who lived in some of the Halls at Oxford who did it as cheaply and as penuriously as unattached students, and he would instance the case of Keble College. On the whole, he would rather that the words "poor and meritorious" should be struck out, and then the Committee might adopt the clause, which would then leave it open to all—both to resident and unattached students—provision being made for the payment of teachers for the unattached students. He hoped, therefore, that the Amendment would be withdrawn and the clause agreed to, with the omission of the words "poor and meritorious."

MR. GOSCHEN said, that it would be necessary to leave out the words "in need of assistance," and "diminishing the expense."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the words "diminishing the expense" were important. Very often the scholarships answered the purpose of diminishing the expense of a University career.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he could hardly accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman. They were really asked to agree to the establishment of a large number of new Colleges like Keble College, and he did not think that the effect of this clause would be to diminish the cost of University education. He had no objection to the last part of the clause, but would take a division against the former part.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE pointed out that as his right hon. Friend had gone so far in the way of concession it was not worth while to divide on the point now in dispute, because it was only a forecast of what appeared in a more lengthened form in Clause 9.

MR. J. G. TALBOT thought that as the object was really to found Scholarships for "poor and meritorious" students there would be no harm in using these words; he could never see the objection to calling things by their right names, but he believed that even in the amended form the clause would give great satisfaction.

MR. COURTNEY was understood to suggest that the clause, as the Secretary of State for War now proposed to amend it, would not do what the right hon. Gentleman intended—namely, benefit unattached students; but might result in the creation of a certain number of new University Scholarships like the Craven and the Bell Scholarships.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would adhere to the words "diminishing the expense of University education." It would be better to cut down the cost of University education than to create a number of Scholarships and Fellowships to be scrambled for.

MR. FAWCETT observed that the object of the clause was to give some assistance to unattached students; but if the present proposal of the Secretary of State for War was carried out, not the smallest assistance would practically be given to unattached students. It only added to the Scholarships which were open to everybody, and those who obtained the Craven and other Scholarships would also carry off the new ones. The object of the Act of Parliament passed some years ago was to put the unattached scholars on the same footing as the others, but this clause would have a contrary effect.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY maintained that the clause was not open to the objections which had been taken by the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Dilke) and the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney).

MR. HANBURY expressed his willingness to withdraw his Amendment.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE moved, in page 5, line 41, after the word "by" to insert "reducing the fees payable to the University, and."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it would be better to leave the Universities to settle the fees upon which students should be admitted.

MR. BALFOUR supported the Amendment. He did not see why there should be any University fees at all.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

BURIAL ACTS CONSOLIDATION BILL. EXPLANATION.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that in his absence yesterday his noble Friend (Earl Granville) drew attention to the circumstance that the Committee on this Bill was set down for Ascension Day. No doubt when the Committee was fixed for the 10th that circumstance had escaped notice. He proposed to postpone the Committee till Thursday, the 17th inst., which he hoped would be a convenient day for their Lordships. On a former occasion his noble Friend had suggested that the Bill should be printed in such form so that what was old might be readily distinguished from what was new in it. He had consulted the draftsman on that point, and it appeared that there might be a difficulty in carrying out the noble Earl's suggestion, as the Bill was a very long one—consisting of between 80 and 90 clauses—and the old and the new parts of it were much mixed up. He was in communication with the draftsman, who was considering the matter; and if the Bill could not be printed in the manner suggested, he would lay on the Table a memorandum describing the proposed alterations in the existing law.

EARL GRANVILLE remarked that as the noble Duke proposed to postpone the Committee for so long a time, it would appear as if the Government were not very anxious about the passing of the Bill. He hoped there would be no further postponement, and that on the day named he would be ready to go into Committee.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON replied that, as usual, his noble Friend had something to say, but the inference drawn by him on this occasion was not correct. He could assure his noble Friend that there was no desire on the part of the Government to delay proceeding with the Bill. As the Business in the other House was somewhat in arrear, nothing would be gained by sending down the Burials Bill within the next week or fortnight—for the other House would scarcely be able to take it up till after that.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE PAPERS—THE RUSSIAN CIRCULAR. QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE: I wish to ask the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, When the further Papers promised by him, having reference to the Eastern Question, are likely to be delivered? I beg further to ask him, whether an answer has been sent by Her Majesty's Government to the Circular from the Russian Government; and, if so, whether that answer will be laid on the Table?

THE EARL OF DERBY: The Papers which I promised in addition to those already laid before Parliament will, I hope, be presented on Thursday next. With regard to the latter part of the noble Earl's Question, I have to state that the Government have prepared an answer to the Circular of the Russian Government. That answer has been submitted for approval to Her Majesty, and when approved will be forwarded to St. Petersburg. I shall be prepared as soon as usage will permit—namely, as soon as it is in the hands of the Russian Government—to lay it on the Table of the House.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD WINMARLEIGH, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the object of the measure—which had come up from the Commons—was to consolidate and amend the law relating to leases and sales of settled estates. The powers now possessed on this behalf had been created by several Acts of Parliament, all passed in the reign of Her Majesty; and, in consequence, great difficulty and confusion had arisen, and the powers of the Courts by which their provisions had been administered were defective. This Bill repealed the whole of these Acts, and contained a series of clauses which extended and defined the powers in regard to settled estates contained in the previous Acts.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

THE MEDITERRANEAN—SECURITY OF COMMERCE.—QUESTION.

LORD WAVENEY said, that in putting the Question of which he had given, Notice, it was not his intention to detain their Lordships at any great length. The object of his inquiry was that the public might be informed at the earliest possible moment as to how matters stood in the Mediterranean. Remembering the serious injury inflicted on commerce by pirates in that sea during the Greek War of Independence, he was much afraid that the recurrence of a similar state of things was not far distant. He had given his Notice in consequence of the following statement, which appeared among the foreign correspondence of The Times on the 25th ult:—

“A band of pirates, headed by the notorious Ghiorgoula, and formed at Athens by his Lieutenant, Latzks, for the purpose of attacking different points in the Archipelago, has been captured in a creek at Rhodes. After a raid on Lindos, bad weather had forced them to take refuge there. The Turkish Gendarmerie Colonel surprised them in a cave, from which, being threatened with starvation, they made a sortie, killing the Orderly Officer, a Gendarme, and three civilians. On the death of the chief and his lieutenant, the remaining 13 surrendered.”

Seeing how well provided we were with Consuls and Vice Consuls, he presumed that the Foreign Office was kept well informed on such subjects, and he therefore begged to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any reports had yet been received from Her Majesty's Consuls abroad of the existence and progress of piracy in the Mediterranean?

THE EARL OF DERBY: The only case of piracy in the Mediterranean which has come to the knowledge of the Foreign Office is the one to which the noble Lord has referred in putting his Question. The circumstances were precisely as they are stated in the correspondence quoted by the noble Lord—namely, that a piratical crew made a descent on Lindos, which they plundered, and carried off a considerable amount of property. The next day the Governor sent troops by land and also sent a ship, or ships, to cut the pirates off by sea. The pursuit was successful. The greater number of the band were captured, and their leader is said to have been shot. The despoiled property, or the greater portion of it was recovered and restored to the owners, and some of the band were sent to Rhodes to be tried. It would appear that the majority of the pirates were from Greece, and some few of them were from the Islands of the Archipelago. That is the only case of piracy that has come to our knowledge. No doubt the Consuls and Vice Consuls will feel it their duty to report such occurrences to the Foreign Office should any others arise.

House adjourned at half-past Five o'clock, till Thursday next, half-past Ten o'clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

DERBY CORPORATION (EXTENSION OF BOROUGH, &c.) BILL. (by Order.) CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now considered.”

SIR HENRY WILMOT moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill should be re-committed to the former Committee, in respect of Clauses 42 to 46, inclusive, and Clause 52. The borough had been extended so as to include, among other districts, one called Litchurch, which had sufficient voluntary school accommodation, and the object of the proposed re-committal of the Bill was to keep Litchurch separate from Derby for educational purposes, so as to avoid placing the district under the Derby School Board.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out the words “now considered,” in order to add the words “re-committed to the former Committee, in respect of Clauses 42 to 46, inclusive, and Clause 52,”—(Sir Henry Wilmot.)

—instead thereof.

MR. BALFOUR, as one of the Committee, said, that in incorporating Litchurch with Derby for educational purposes, the Committee acted on the recommendation of the Education Department, believing that it was hardly within their province to discuss it. He hoped Parliament would lay down a rule to guide Committees, and would say either that a State Department should not make such a recommendation, or that a Committee ought to accept such a recommendation when made; or that it should have an opportunity of examining the officers of the Department on the subject, so that it might know the grounds on which the recommendation was made. In this case he hoped the Bill would be sent back to the Committee, because the recommendations of a Department ought not to be of such a character that a Committee should accept them without consideration.

MR. HIBBERT said, that at the time the Bill was before the Committee there was a deficiency in the school accommodation of Litchurch. He opposed the further reference to the Committee, on the ground that the object of it was to create one of those anomalies in local administration which Parliament was so anxious to get rid of, and the creating of which in Stafford and Cardiff was working so disadvantageously in those places that the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had introduced a Bill to get rid of the difficulties in those and similar cases. He contended that the definition of "borough" in the Education Act of 1870 would include the places to be incorporated with Derby by this Bill.

MR. RAIKES admitted the undesirability of perpetuating anomalies, but urged that uniform principles should be adopted in all similar cases, and that a district affected should have the opportunity of being heard on a proposal to which it was opposed, particularly as, in spite of the definition of "borough" in the Act of 1870, the 11th clause of the Act of 1873 secured for such district the privilege now claimed for Litchurch. In an unopposed Bill which came before him from Newport, Isle of Wight, and where he had extended the school district, he took care that the Preamble should recite the consent of the parties. The Walsall Act was also based on the consent of the parties. The Nottingham Bill had extended the school district of the borough; but he had been assured that in that case also the consent of all the adjoining districts had been obtained. He had hoped that the question had, indeed, been laid at rest as far as the Committees of that House were concerned, and that the line of action of Parliament where school districts had been enlarged had been in the direction he had indicated. The question was whether, by a private Act, they should deprive these districts of an immunity which they possessed by the law of the land. It was also a question of the administration of the Business of the House by its Committees. It would be unwise to regard this matter exclusively from the school-board point of view, because it involved the principle whether people should be taxed for purposes not their own, and against which Parliament by a general Act had insured their immunity.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, the question before the House was of a technical character, and it was for the House to decide whether the Committee had acted within the proper bounds in the matter. He was always sorry to find himself acting in opposition to the opinion of the hon. Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) in a matter of this kind; but it was the deliberate intention of Parliament that the Education Department should make known its views. The Standing Orders of this year had been altered, as he believed, for this very purpose; and if hon. Members would refer to them, they would find that any private Bill affecting educational matters was obliged to be deposited at the Education Department, and that if the Committee which sat upon it did not adopt the views of the Department, they were bound to report their reasons for dissenting. Without going into the merits of the case for making boroughs in all instances conterminous with a school district, in favour of which he considered the arguments overwhelming, he might state that the Education Department had given the subject, as a mere question of law, their most serious consideration, and they felt it to be their duty to protest against any addition being made to the boundaries of the borough, unless a corresponding addition were also made to the school-board area of the borough. By the Act of 1870 Parliament acknowledged only three school districts—the metropolis, the municipal boroughs, and the civil parish—provided it was not included in the boundaries of the municipal borough. Parliament had ruled that the municipal borough was to be the borough for the school district under all circumstances. The Department was therefore bound to assert the municipal borough, when it was formed, to be the school district of the place. It had no official knowledge whatever of the Resolutions, by these Standing Orders of the Chairmen of Private Bill Committees, and was bound to carry out the provisions of the Education Act. He would abstain from voting, as the question might be held to reflect somewhat upon his action in the matter; and it was therefore obviously more suitable that he should leave the House perfectly free to pass its own judgment upon it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER quite agreed with the noble Lord, and hoped the House would not decide the question from any feeling connected with the position of Private Bill Committees. The question at stake was whether, if they enlarged a borough, they should put the new district in an awkward and difficult position by making such a distinction? He could perfectly well understand that the dislike of a new district which was intended to be annexed to a borough to a school board ought to be heard by the Committee as a reason why it should not be annexed; but he hoped that the House would not acknowledge the principle that when once annexed there were to be two different administrations for education.

MR. BEACH assured the House that the decision arrived at by the Chairmen of the Private Bill Committees at the conference to which reference was made had been come to after much consideration.

SIR CHARLES FORSTER defended the course taken by the Select Committee to which the Bill had been referred.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the House had to consider a question of some difficulty relating to the action of Committees on Private Bills. His hon. Friend the Chairman of Ways and Means said that in these cases a certain law existed; Bills were brought forward which might or might not alter the application of that law in the particular cases, and it was not desirable that the decision of a question which was one of considerable general importance should be left to the varying decisions of Private Bill Committees. The Education Act of 1870 had provided that a borough should be a school district, and there could be no doubt that the boroughs then existing were made school districts. But it was contended that the operation of the Act was prospective. A great many districts had been added since the Act was passed without being made portions of school districts. He did not wish them to enter on that point, but it was one that ought to be discussed and settled. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had in charge a Bill which would settle the question or, at any rate, raise a discussion upon it; and, under the circumstances, he should give his vote in favour of the suggestion which his hon. Friend the Member for Chester (Mr. Raikes) had made.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill re-committed to the former Committee, in respect of Clauses 42 to 46, inclusive, and Clause 52.

QUESTIONS.

INLAND REVENUE—EVASION OF THE CUSTOMS DUTIES.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If it is a fact that in one warehouse alone (where the Inland Revenue Commissioners admitted the revenue was defrauded of not less than £13,000) from four hundred to five hundred casks of whiskey were racked daily, from each of which casks nearly two gallons of proof spirits have been obtained without payment of duty; and if this evasion of duty has not amounted to over £80,000 per annum in one warehouse alone?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Member is not correct in his calculation as to the amount of loss that has been sustained by the Inland Revenue from the cause to which he refers. The fact is, that in the warehouse in question the number of casks racked did not exceed 420 a-week—not 400 or 500 a-day, as he represents in the Question, but 400 a-week—and the average quantity of proof spirit that could be extracted from each would be $1\frac{1}{4}$ gallons, instead of 2 gallons. Consequently, the loss of duty would amount to the sum mentioned in the Report of the Commissioners—namely, £13,000, and not, as the hon. Member says, to £80,000. I may add that the moment the attention of the Inland Revenue Department was called to the subject they issued instructions with a view to preventing anything of the kind, and the same course has been taken since then with regard to the Customs.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY — RUSSIAN NAVAL FORCES IN THE UNITED STATES.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he is in possession of full information as to the numbers, strength, and movements of the Russian Naval Forces in the neighbourhood of San Francisco and New York; and, whether he will state to the House any intelligence he may have on the subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: In the absence of my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, I am bound to say to the hon. and gallant Gentleman that this is a question which Her Majesty's Government think ought not to be answered.

SASINE OFFICE, EDINBURGH — REDUCTION OF FEES.—QUESTION.

MR. MACKINTOSH asked the Financial Secretary of the Treasury, Why the conditions of the Act 31 and 32 Vic. c. 64, s. 25, regarding the reduction of fees in the Sasine Office, Edinburgh, providing—

“That it shall be in view that the fees to be drawn from the said department shall not be greater than may reasonably be held sufficient for defraying the expenses of the said department, or the improvement of the system of registration,” have not been carried out, it appearing from the Estimates that for many years the surplus fees amounted to upwards of £10,000 per annum?

MR. W. H. SMITH: In accordance with the Act 31 & 32 Vic. c. 64, the fees taken in the Sasines and Searching departments of the General Register House were revised in 1873 and a reduced scale was sanctioned, to take effect from the 1st of April of that year, the loss to the Exchequer amounting to £16,850. The new scale was calculated to produce only such a sum in each year as would be sufficient to cover the expenses of the Department, including in those expenses not merely salaries, as shown in Vote 20 of Class III. of the Civil Service Estimates, but also pensions of retired officers, office rent, rates and taxes, and cost of books and stationery. The extra receipts mentioned on page 227 of the Estimates include the fees of all the departments of the Register House, many of which are not within the operation of Section 25 of the Act of 1868. It should be added that there are now proposals before the Treasury for an increase of the staff of the Searching department, which if sanctioned would materially increase the existing cost.

THE NAVY—TORPEDO INSTRUCTION. QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked, If Her Majesty's Government will favourably consider the propriety of granting an allowance to Naval officers on half pay whilst voluntarily attending the torpedo lectures and practice at Portsmouth?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, that the officers in question had at present certain allowances made to them, and it was not the intention of the Admiralty to extend them.

MOTIONS.

ECCLESIASTICAL ENDOWMENTS (CEYLON).—RESOLUTION.

MR. ALDERMAN W. M'ARTHUR rose to call the attention of the House to the unsatisfactory state of affairs in the Island of Ceylon in relation to Ecclesiastical Endowments; and to move—

“That, as the members of the Anglican and Presbyterian Churches in Ceylon constitute a small part of the population and the great majority of the inhabitants are Buddhists, Hindoos, or Mahomedans, this House is of opinion that the payment out of the Revenues of the Colony of annual subsidies to the ministers of those Churches inflicts great injustice and occasions serious discontent, and ought, therefore, to be discontinued."

In bringing the question forward the hon. Member pointed out that it was not a movement for the disestablishment or disendowment of the Church properly so called, for the Church of England could not be said to be "established" in the Colonies according to the sense in which we understood the term in this country. In Australia and the Cape of Good Hope, Jamaica, and a number of other Colonies the grant made to the Church and to other religious Bodies had been revoked, and all denominations placed on the same level as regarded endowments for ecclesiastical purposes. In the present case the issue was a very narrow one. In Ceylon they were simply dealing with an ecclesiastical department of the Civil Service; and the question was, whether it was just to the people of that Colony, or necessary to their good government, that this department should be maintained out of the public revenue, and what was the general feeling of the population with regard to it? The facts of the case were these:—The total population of the Island, at the last Census, was 2,405,287. Of these, 1,520,574 were Budhists, 465,944 Hindoos, 171,542 Mahomedans, and 534 Veddahs—making together 2,158,594. Of the remaining 250,000 about 190,000 were Roman Catholics, while the Protestants of all denominations numbered between 55,000 and 66,000. The Census of 1871 gave 10,379 of these as belonging to the Church of England, 6,071 as Wesleyans, and 3,101 as Presbyterians. The members of the Church of England, however, were divided into three Bodies—namely, those attending services held by clergymen of the Church of England paid by Government, those belonging to the Church Missionary Society, and those connected with the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. According to Mr. Ferguson's epitome of the Blue Book, the average attendance at the services of clergymen paid by Government was 2,197; at the Church Missionary Society, 4,284; and at the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, 2,464. The average attendance at the Presbyterian churches was given at 803. Now, it was for those 2,197 Protestants, the most respectable and well-to-do of the community, that a sum of about £14,000 was raised from 2,500,000 Budhists, Hindoos, and Roman Catholics. It was true that the money was not all spent upon Anglicans and Presbyterians, for £100 was given to the 190,000 Roman Catholics, the remainder being divided as follows:—Three Bishops (two on pension and one on sick leave), an arch-deacon, 11 chaplains of the Church of England, four of the Church of Scotland, six other chaplains in the central province to whom grants in aid were made, 14 catechists, a registrar, and 12 retired chaplains on pension. Allowances were also made for extras, such as repairs of buildings. Since the Report containing those facts was published two Bishops had been taken off the list, so that there remained one Bishop in charge—namely, Bishop Copleston, and one on pension. In 1849 a Commission on the fixed establishments of the Island, presided over by Sir Emerson Tennent, reported in favour of a return of the old system of placing the See of Colombo under the Bishop of Madras, and so saving Ceylon the unnecessary cost of a separate Bishop. The Duke of Newcastle, as Secretary of State for the Colonies in 1854, wrote a despatch to the Governor of Ceylon, in which he reminded him that the proper object of the ecclesiastical establishments was to provide for the religious wants of the European members of the civil and military services, not to furnish ministers to congregations of ordinary inhabitants. Sir Charles M'Carthy, Colonel Secretary, and afterwards Governor of Ceylon, supported the same view. Lord Northbrook, who must be acknowledged as a high authority, said, in a speech delivered since his return from India, he believed the day would come when we should give to India the inestimable blessing of a true religion; but he did not think it would be right for Government to use the taxation of a country for the teaching of a certain form of religion. In order to show the feeling which existed in the Colony, the hon. Member next referred to a Paper, laid on the Table of the House last year, containing two documents bearing upon the question. The first was a resolution adopted at a meeting of the Executive Council after Bishop Claughton had resigned his office, his Excellency Sir Hercules

Mr. Alderman W. M'Arthur

Robinson being present. The resolution was to the effect that the Secretary of State be requested not to fill up the vacancy; that the ecclesiastical establishment was too small to require the services of a resident Bishop; that the Island was formerly under the diocese of Madras, and the Bishop of that See paid periodical visits, receiving State allowance, and exercising episcopal jurisdiction over it; and that with the present increased facilities of communication that arrangement could again be advantageously resorted to. The second document was a communication addressed to Lord Carnarvon by Sir William Gregory, the present Governor, in which he expressed his opinion that the salaries of colonial chaplaincies, as vacancies occurred, should be struck off the annual estimates, and he had not a doubt that local subscriptions, aided by the great religious Societies at home, would provide for an adequate Church of England ministration hereafter. It was to be regretted, observed the hon. Member, that Lord Carnarvon did not act on the recommendation of Sir William Gregory. His Lordship, with great ability and success had hitherto administered the affairs of the Colonies; but in this case it was to be feared that his ecclesiastical proclivities had interfered with his usual good judgment. The noble Lord had, besides, introduced a new element directly opposed to the expressed sentiments of his Predecessors and to the policy which had always guided the Government in relation to the Colonies, in the appointment of Bishop Copleston. Lord Carnarvon said—

"I have submitted to Her Majesty the name of a clergyman who is, I trust, very highly qualified—alike by his opinions, his age, and physical constitution, as by his special disposition for missionary work among Indian races—for the continuance of that great work in which his predecessor has been cut short."

Now, he was not aware that the Colonial Office had formed itself into a missionary society, for "missionary work among Indian races," and had sent out a Bishop for that purpose. In the Duke of Newcastle's despatch it was stated distinctly that the sole—

"object of an ecclesiastical establishment in Ceylon was to provide for the wants of the European members of the civil and military services."

Sir Hercules Robinson had well observed, in a despatch to the Earl of Kimberley—

"It is felt that the post (of Bishop) is not absolutely necessary, and that if the selection for it were by any chance to fall upon a person less tolerant than Bishop Claughton, such an appointment might possibly be productive of sectarian strife and jealousy, and lead to much local unpleasantness."

The apprehension thus felt by Sir Hercules Robinson had, unfortunately, been fully realized. The appointment was a most unfortunate one. Of the "Boy Bishop," as he had been called, it might be well said—

"Man, proud man,
Dressed in a little brief authority,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high Heaven
As make the angels weep."

If anyone could have reconciled the several parties in Ceylon to the present state of things it was Bishop Claughton. He was deservedly popular with all classes. But Bishop Copleston had pursued a different course. Within a few months he insulted and stopped the mouths of the missionaries of the Church Missionary Society, some of whom had been toiling in the Island before the Bishop was born. Thus a blameless, exemplary body of Christian ministers found themselves suddenly overridden by arrogant pretensions, which no previous Bishop had dared to enforce. Other denominations with whom Bishop Claughton had been on the most favourable terms were treated with discourtesy and disrespect; the scandalous spectacle was presented to the heathen of the Christian Church divided into two hostile camps, and during the short time the Bishop had been in the Island, as had been well observed, "he had done more to degrade the English creed in the eyes of the Natives than the life-long labours of the inoffensive pastors he persecuted had done to render it honourable." In the Papers which had been submitted to the House there was a Petition from the Wesleyan missionaries to Sir William Gregory, which stated that the payment by the Government of certain sums under the head of "Ecclesiastical Establishments" was impolitic and unjust; that the effects of the Government providing pastors for the wealthy congregations of the towns, and the appointment of these pastors, from the revenue of the Island instead of the parishioners, were highly objectionable on the grounds—(1) that by such appointments Government did by its agents directly enter upon missionary work; (2) that it was unfair to the efforts of that society, which had for more than 50 years laboured in those places, to be subject to the rivalry of Government competition; (3) that in some of those places their efforts to induce the Wesleyans to support their own ministers had been hindered by the fact that the Episcopalians had their ministers supported by the Government, although the Episcopal congregations were not at all in need of pecuniary aid. They also stated that it was contrary to public policy for the Government to engage in missionary operations; that many of the Government officials did not belong to any of the Churches subsidized by Government, and a most offensive slight was placed on all the religious Bodies not receiving Government favour. That memorial was signed by seven English and 28 Native ministers in Ceylon. Sir William Gregory forwarded it to Lord Carnarvon, who sent a reply to the effect that he was not prepared to authorize any change which should deprive the Church of England or the Presbyterian Church of that support from Government which they had hitherto enjoyed. A large and influential meeting had since been held in Colombo protesting against these subsidies, and a Petition to Her Majesty had been forwarded, bearing the signatures of 8,000 Natives, praying for their discontinuance. The Petition stated that in Ceylon the existence of an Ecclesiastical Department of Government was a direct violation of the principle laid down in Her Majesty's Proclamation, namely—

"That none be in any way favoured, none be molested and disturbed, by reason of their religious faith or observance."

The Resolution which he now submitted to the House stated that this subsidy inflicted great injustice and occasioned serious discontent. The injustice he thought he had proved; and as to the discontent, it was manifest not only from the Papers laid on the Table, but from other information received from the Island, a very strong feeling prevailed among all classes, except a few recipients of Government bounty. So far from accomplishing the object proposed by Lord Carnarvon, as a missionary establishment, it had had a directly opposite effect. The Natives designated Christianity thus taught as the "Queen's religion," regarding it simply as a Department of the Government. A very distinguished Native and a Member of the Legislative Council, Sir Coomara Swamy, in a very able speech delivered by him in the Council, remarked—

"I have been repeatedly asked, 'How is it Christianity makes such a little progress among your people?' 'That it should be so is natural enough,' I answer. 'Think of the manner in which it is presented to us. You come with the drawn sword in one hand and the Bible in the other. Who can believe it? Your conduct belies your professions. The chances of Christianity would have been greater if it had been preached in the country by men entirely unconnected with the Government, sympathizing more with the people than with the rulers.'"

Similar views were expressed by Sir Charles M'Carthy, who said—

"Deeply convinced as I am that from the diffusion of Christianity alone any real progress or improvement could be looked for among the Native population, I yet must contend that Government, by acting as suggested, would only raise a barrier to the advancement of the Christian religion."

Now, he asked, what did the Government propose to do in relation to that question? The principle of religious equality almost universally prevailed in our Colonies, with the most satisfactory results. Why was Ceylon to be an exception? Would the Government disregard the strongly-expressed feelings of the whole community, from the Governor downwards? Did they wish to excite more dissatisfaction, and rouse the Natives as well as the Europeans to further agitation? What was the language of Sir Coomara Swamy in reference to the Petition from the Natives, to which some exception had been taken? He said—

"If the Council is not to be satisfied with such expressions of opinion as those embodied in it, how then shall we bring conviction to unwilling minds? Shall we hold monster meetings? Shall there be inflammatory speeches? Must there be commotion, and discontent, bloodshed, and other rebellion before official minds can be roused?"

If it was desired to diffuse a knowledge of Christianity among the Native population of Ceylon, that object would be best secured by voluntary effort. Had they really a right to levy a compulsory tribute upon the people to support a religion in which they did not believe? Would the Government, for the sake of so paltry a sum, act in direct antagonism to the almost universal feeling of the Island, or would they, by placing Ceylon on the same footing as their other Colonies as far as lay in their power, promote its peace, its happiness, and its prosperity? The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, as the members of the Anglican and Presbyterian Churches in Ceylon constitute a small part of the population and the great majority of the inhabitants are Buddhists, Hindoos, and Mahomedans, this House is of opinion that the payment out of the Revenues of the Colony of annual subsidies to the ministers of those Churches inflicts great injustice and occasions serious discontent, and ought, therefore, to be discontinued.”—(Mr. Alderman M'Arthur.)

MR. BAXTER declared that in all his Parliamentary experience he had never known a better case for an alteration of the ecclesiastical arrangements of a Colony than that which his hon. Friend had just submitted to the House. In the population there were 2,000,000 not Christians, while the Christians numbered only about 250,000, the greater portion being Roman Catholics. The object to which the grants of money in question were originally applied was a very laudable one—namely, to provide religious instruction for the military in the Island. But now the money was not devoted to that purpose at all. It went in salaries to clergymen, the great majority of whose hearers were not soldiers, but persons perfectly able to pay for their own religious instruction. What was done in point of fact was this—clergymen were being provided for two or three thousand rich members of the Church of England, while the great bulk of the Protestant poor population, to say nothing of the Roman Catholics, were left to provide for themselves. It was notorious all over the Colony that the bulk of the members of the Church of England preferred the services of the missionaries of the Church Missionary Society to those paid by the State. The Natives of Ceylon were actually taxed to support missions for their own conversion, and however much he might sympathize with missionary effort when properly directed, he felt bound to say that he knew of nothing more likely than that to prejudice Christianity in the eyes of the Cingalese people. There was a widespread hostility to these grants in the Island—a hostility which was not by any means unshared by members of the Anglican Church. That hostility had been expressed on various occasions in the Legislative Council, and he was sorry to see as one phase of it a disposition on the part of certain of the Natives, in consequence of these grants, to doubt the sincerity of Her Majesty's Proclamation in favour of neutrality and religious equality. The advice of Sir William Gregory to cease filling up vacancies as they occurred was wise advice, which he hoped the Government would consider. As showing the gravity of the situation, he was told that a Petition was coming home from India on the subject of the annual payments to Anglican clergymen in Hindostan. He hoped the Government would take time by the forelock and remove gradually causes of discontent which might lead to serious difficulties hereafter.

MR. J. G. TALBOT admitted that, so far as figures were concerned, the case presented to the House was a good one. He was not prepared, however, to accept the hon. Member's conclusion that the existence of an endowed Church ought to be dependent upon numbers. He had always protested against that argument in the case of the Irish Church, and he must now protest against it in the case of Ceylon. Something had been said about pensions to Bishops. It was, no doubt, true that at one time three Bishops were receiving pensions for work they had done. But the health of those Bishops having broken down in the Colony, he did not see any reason why, because of the particular functions they had filled, they should be deprived of their pensions. The failure of their health was no doubt an unfortunate occurrence; but the calamity might have happened to ex-Judges or ex-Governors as well as Bishops. The particular position filled by the Bishops did not, he thought, add much to the argument of the hon. Gentleman. The opinion of Sir Hercules Robinson had been quoted. Now Sir Hercules was no doubt a very good Governor, but he did not know that he was a very good authority on ecclesiastical matters. He had suggested that if the Bishop of Colombo were withdrawn the Bishop of Madras should receive Episcopal charge of the Island of Ceylon.

Now, there could be no doubt that the Indian Bishops had a great deal too much to do already. And as some proof of this two additional Bishops had recently been given to Madras. As, however, Sir Hercules Robinson had been quoted, it was well that his mature conclusion should be known: and it would be found that it was by no means in favour of the views of the hon. Gentleman opposite. Sir Hercules Robinson had, no doubt, protested strongly against the continuation of the Colombo Bishopric; but, like other great men, he was open to conviction, and he found that in writing to the Earl of Kimberley, on the 14th of November, 1871, he said—

“My own opinion is—that a Bishop of the Church of England is not indispensable here; but that, so long as the Colony maintains from the general Revenue, as it does at present, a number of Episcopalian Chaplaincies, it is desirable that there should be a head of the Department, and that in the present flourishing condition of the finances the difference between the salary of an Archdeacon and of a Bishop is a matter of but little importance. So long, therefore, as the present State allowances to the Anglican clergy are continued, and so long as the right man can be found for the place, I think the additional expenditure entailed by maintaining the Bishopric is well invested in a social as well as in an official point of view. I have known Archdeacon Jermyn intimately for a number of years, and I am satisfied that it would have been difficult for your Lordship to have selected any person more suited than he is in every respect for the post which has been vacated here by Bishop Claughton's resignation; and now that the nomination is announced, I think the general feeling is one of satisfaction that the appointment has been filled up.”

It would therefore be seen that Sir Hercules Robinson admitted that when the appointment of Archdeacon Jermyn was made it gave general satisfaction. The hon. Member had used an expression which he hoped on reflection he would be inclined to modify—he spoke of the English Government “taking the sword in one hand and the Bible in the other.” That was an exaggeration of language which he trusted hardly any hon. Member would endorse. [MR. ALDERMAN W. M'ARTHUR explained. He had quoted the expression used by Sir Coomara Swamy, a Member of the Legislative Council of Ceylon.] He would only say he thought that anyone who used such an expression was not an authority that House would follow. He could not admit the validity of the argument which had been used against the continuance of the Colombo Bishopric, because an agitation was said to have commenced in Calcutta for the disestablishment of the Church in India. The same argument was used in the case of the Irish Church—if it were not disendowed, it was said, people would call out for the disestablishment of the English Church. He would not give way to such an argument. He was rather disposed to act on the old Latin maxim—principiis obsta. He regretted that the hon. Member had dragged into the discussion a personal matter relating to the present Bishop of Colombo. He stated that the first act of Bishop Copleston was to suspend the missionaries of the Church Missionary Society. Now, that statement was incorrect. The Bishop had, unfortunately, differences with the missionaries of the Church Missionary Society, who were endeavouring to establish an improper Episcopal authority. The step he took was simply with a view to maintain Episcopal authority, and when so much was said by certain parties of the duty of the clergy in this country to be subject to their Bishops he did not think that this act of Bishop Copleston ought to have been misrepresented as it had been. The statement was most exaggerated. The Bishop did everything he could to prevent the unhappy conclusion which had been brought about, and it was his greatest desire that all the missionaries of the Church Missionary Society should work in harmony with himself. He hoped the House would not agree with the Motion. It would give a blow to Christianity in the East. The Natives of Ceylon would think that a nation which valued its Christianity would set it forth in public places; and if this Resolution were carried into effect they would soon come to the conclusion that England had ceased to be a Christian nation, or at least a nation which cared about its Christianity.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he wished to explain the principles which were always followed by the Government of India in regard to ecclesiastical establishments. There was a very large number of European servants performing duties in India, who were in a position in which they had no private means of obtaining the consolations of religion or the care of medical men. The Government, therefore, found it necessary to provide both clergymen and doctors in sufficient numbers to attend to the wants of their European servants. That was the principle followed in India, and it was only in pursuance of it that a certain amount of the clerical and medical element was retained by Government there. It was said that the cry in India was that there were not too many Bishops, but too few, and that there was a necessity for an increase. In particular, it was said in the diocese of Madras that people were not satisfied with the Bishop they had already, but they had lately established other two. Those were not Government Bishops, but Missionary Bishops, established for missionary purposes which the Government did not undertake. So far as the Bishop of Madras was concerned, he undertook to say that that right rev. Prelate was not, for the special purpose for which he was appointed, an overworked man, and he might superintend Ceylon without any very large addition to his labours. In respect to the remaining questions raised by the Motion, he was not well acquainted with the affairs of Ceylon itself. He hoped when the Government came to deal with the matter they would be prepared to tell the House that they were desirous of dealing with it in connection with Ceylon exactly as it was dealt with in India—namely, that the Government themselves would provide a superintending Bishop and a sufficient number of chaplains to provide for the necessities of the Government servants, and the Government servants only. He thought it was not right to contribute out of public revenues for the maintenance of an ecclesiastical establishment beyond that which was required for administering to the necessities of the public servants. If the Establishment in Ceylon did partake of that character, he thought the earliest opportunity should be taken to reduce it within a standard that would correspond with that which was retained in India.

MR. J. LOWTHER held that the hon. Member who had brought this subject before the House had failed to show the existence of any practical grievance. The population of Ceylon was somewhat less than 2,500,000, and the total sum expended in the services to which reference had been made was only £14,000, or about 1*d.* per head. That, certainly, was not a very crushing taxation, and was borne by all classes of the population varying in religious belief. The hon. Gentleman had quoted in support of his views many eminent authorities. But if he were to make known the opinion of many persons as eminent on the other side and as well qualified to form a judgment, he might, at the risk of wearying the House, go somewhat into the controversy. But the House, while paying every respect to the opinions of those eminent persons, would hardly be disposed to look to them for guidance on a question like this. The hon. Gentleman said that Sir William Gregory especially and Sir Charles M'Carthy were in favour of disestablishment. The right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) said that Sir William Gregory had quoted as a precedent the disestablishment of the Irish Church. He would like, however, to point out the exact position in which Her Majesty's Government stood with regard to that question. There was no doubt that the disestablishment of the Irish Church had commended itself to a large majority of the last Parliament. The present Government certainly could not be charged with having embarked on any re-actionary policy. Those who constituted that Government had not attempted on any occasion to go back upon the great subjects which had been determined by their predecessors. But he must demur to the doctrine which had apparently been laid down, that they were bound to continue that course and to carry out all over the world a policy which it was notorious every Member of the present Government—and he ventured to think a large majority of this House of Commons—emphatically condemned. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. M'Arthur) had alluded to the policy of the late Government with regard to Colonial endowments. What was that policy? During the administration of Lord Kimberley at the Colonial Office various Colonies were subjected to schemes bearing on this question. But how were they dealt with? In some a policy was adopted which the hon. Gentleman would hardly endorse—namely, what was popularly known as “levelling up;” in others a policy of complete disendowment was effected. But he would remind the House that in all the cases to which he now referred the circumstances were widely different from those which existed in Ceylon. Notably, in Jamaica, Trinidad, the Leeward Islands, and others with which Lord Kimberley had to deal, there was not a large mixed population professing various forms of non-Christian religion; but the difficulty he had to meet was that of Christian communities, divided, for the most part, into Roman Catholics and Nonconformist Protestants; and the manner in which they were dealt with offered very little to guide us in approaching a subject like this. There was another point on which he thought the hon. Gentlemen had entirely failed. The hon. Member had spoken of assimilating the policy to be adopted in Ceylon with that which prevailed in all the different Colonies under Her Majesty's sway; but he (Mr. Lowther) hoped the House would not be led to believe that the policy of disestablishment had been already extended to the great bulk of the Colonies. Nothing of the kind had occurred. In certain exceptional instances this policy had been initiated. It was initiated previous to the accession of the Members of the present Government to office. In those instances where it had been deliberately adopted by their predecessors the present Government had not attempted to interfere; but they certainly had no intention of proceeding further in a direction which had not commended itself to their judgment. The hon. Gentleman had stated that the part of the population which derived an advantage from these endowments was well to do, that they drove to their places of worship in carriages; in fact, that they formed a portion of that class referred to by Mr. Carlyle under the designation of "gigmanity." But the hon. Gentleman, he hoped, did not mean that the House ought to embark on a course of policy on account of the social position of those to whom it might apply. He thought, however, if the hon. Gentleman would carry his researches a little further he would find that a considerable portion of those who derived benefit from these endowments were not in a position to contribute towards religious rites for themselves. The right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) said that the rest of the inhabitants of the Island, with the exceptions mentioned by him and the hon. Member for Lambeth, had to provide for their own religious services. Was that the fact? The right hon. Gentleman very likely was not aware that the Buddhist community were possessed of no fewer than 376,000 acres of land for that purpose. [Mr. BAXTER said he had referred only to the Christian population.] It was right, at all events, that the House should be aware of the fact that this large extent of land was vested in the Buddhist community; it was called the "Temple land," was held under grants, and had been guaranteed to them by the British Government on taking possession of the Island. When it was found that three-fourths of the population were Buddhist and were largely endowed, it could hardly be said that the wealthy portion of the community were placed in an invidious position with regard to their poorer brethren in consequence of the endowments to which the hon. Gentleman had called attention. The hon. Gentleman quoted the language used by a member of Council. The language of that gentleman certainly compared very unfavourably with the studied moderation with which the hon. Gentleman himself brought forward this subject. The advice of that gentleman to his fellow-subjects reminded him of the somewhat similar advice—"Don't nail his ears to the pump." There was no reason to believe, however, that in that loyal portion of Her Majesty's dominions there was the slightest danger of hints of that kind being followed up. He should like to call the attention of the House to the precedent which would be established by adopting the Motion of the hon. Gentleman. It would be impossible to confine that policy to Ceylon; and the question of disestablishment would arise with reference to Colonies like Natal, Hong Kong, the Mauritius, British Honduras, and even India. Towards the end of the hon. Member's speech he referred to some differences which had occurred between the Bishop of Colombo and the missionaries of the Island. Now, the Bishop was in no sense a servant of the Government. He did not stand there as in any way responsible for the proceedings of the Bishop; and if he (Mr. Lowther) avoided expressing any opinion on his proceedings, the House must attribute it to his desire not to bark when he was unable to bite. He was happy, however, to think that the present condition of affairs, which was that with which the House had solely to do, was far more satisfactory than some speeches which had been made would lead hon. Members to suppose. He had heard from a private source that the Bishop was at present in every way conforming himself to the situation in which he was placed, and that the unfortunate differences of the past would not recur. Exception had been taken to the character and method of the missionary work. He would not stand up for proselytizing; but the House would agree with him that placed as the British power was in the midst of a large Native population, the existence of a Christian ministry could not but conduce to the welfare of the Island.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN had heard the speech of the Under Secretary for the Colonies with mingled surprise and regret. These discussions were never very pleasant to the House; but he thought his hon. Friend might have taken advantage of the opportunity before him. He thought that a decidedly strong case had been made out; that it would have been satisfactory if the advice of Sir William Gregory had been followed, and these endowments suffered gradually to disappear. The hon. Member for West Kent (Mr. Talbot) had expressed his approval of a Bishop "in active operation;" but this phrase, as far as the Bishop of Colombo was concerned, appeared to imply the suspending of his clergy and causing a general unpleasant state of feeling in the Island. It had been said that the policy of the late Government had been a policy either of levelling up or of disestablishment: when the exigencies of a Colony seemed to demand the latter policy, it had been followed, but all that had been done in the shape of "levelling up" had been this—that where it had seemed best to maintain endowments there had been some attempt to make them equal as between different religious bodies. The Under Secretary had contradicted himself, for he had first said that there were exceptional circumstances to justify the endowments in Ceylon, and immediately afterwards declared that if we abolished these endowments it would be necessary to apply to other Colonies the same treatment as that received by Ceylon. Then it was said, why did you not do this when you were in office? He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) thought that hon.

Gentlemen opposite had given the late Government credit for having done enough in the way of disestablishment; but the fact was that a blot was not a blot until it was hit, and everything could not be done at once. This was a question of right or wrong, and no greater mistake could be made than to refuse to do that which was right in one case for fear of having to do so in other cases with respect to which one was less confident. Give a remedy for an acknowledged evil, and let the future take care of itself. It was quite fair to defend the principle of establishment; but to his mind establishment was justified only when the Established Church was either the Church of the great majority of the people or was supported by the public opinion of the country in which it existed. Neither of these conditions existed in Ceylon where the Church was rendered inefficacious and Christianity hindered by the inequality and injustice of the endowments. The Under Secretary had spoken of the Buddhists being endowed. Was that a fair argument? The only foundation for it was that we had not plundered the Buddhists of the property which they possessed when we took the Island. Ceylon had a population of more than 2,000,000, of whom only about 250,000 were Christians. Of these, nearly 200,000 were Roman Catholics who received the magnificent sum of £100 per annum out of the £14,000 or £15,000 of endowment. The remainder went to about 15,000 of the rest of the Christians, some receiving no money at all, so that the system was unjust and unequal, first as between the Christians and the Native population, and, secondly, as between the different sects of Christians. He could not do otherwise than cordially support the Motion, and he believed that the existence of these petty establishments in defiance of the public opinion of the localities in which they existed, did more harm than good to the principle of establishment at home.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought that many of the remarks that had been made were rather wide of the subject. The Resolution said—

"That, as the members of the Anglican and Presbyterian Churches in Ceylon constitute a small part of the population and the great majority of the inhabitants are Buddhists, Hindoos, or Mahomedans, this House is of opinion that the payment out of the Revenues of the Colony of annual subsidies to the ministers of those Churches inflicts great injustice and occasions serious discontent, and ought, therefore, to be discontinued."

That was laying down the principle that, however necessary it might be to maintain any religious establishments in countries where the majority of the population were not Christians, one had no right to take any part of the revenue of the country for that purpose. That proposition would clearly cover the case of India, where it was always thought right that an Establishment should be maintained for the benefit of the Europeans in that country. But it could not be maintained that it was wrong to take any part of the Indian revenues for that purpose. The House would consider that this was a very broad assertion and that it really covered the case of every Colony; and he hoped that, under these circumstances, the House would be very slow to adopt a Motion of the character of that which was now before it.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, that before they went to a division, he just wished to say that he did not think the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies quite did justice to the speech of a Native Member of the Ceylon Legislative Council to which allusion was made. He thought that speech was a very remarkable one on the whole, and as he laid it down he said to himself—"When Natives of Ceylon take to making speeches in the English tongue which show so full an acquaintance with the best thought of the day on the subjects about which they speak, as well as with what has been passing in this House, it is high time to give up supporting any institution in that Island which cannot be defended by argument;" and he put it to hon. Members on both sides of the House who had listened to this debate—Could the existing ecclesiastical endowments in Ceylon be defended by argument?

MR. ALDERMAN W. M'ARTHUR had hoped that the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies would have given the House some assurance that the present state of things would not long continue, as the existence of the subsidy of the State Church produced at present a great deal of dissatisfaction in the Island. In consequence of the Under Secretary's reply he felt bound to divide the House upon his Resolution.

MR. GREENE said, he should vote against the Motion, but thanked his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth for bringing the conduct of the Bishop under the notice of the House.

Question put.

IRISH LAND ACT, 1870.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in rising to call attention to the forty-fourth, forty-fifth, and forty-seventh Clauses of "The Irish Land Act, 1870," for promoting the purchase of land by occupying tenants; and to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the working and results of the forty-fourth, forty-fifth, and forty-seventh Clauses of "The Irish Land Act, 1870," and to report whether any further facilities should be given for promoting the purchase of land by occupying tenants, said, he had thought it desirable to introduce this subject in order to elicit the views of the Government upon it. He had the other night ventured to propose this as an alternative Motion to that of the hon. Member for Tralee (the O'Donoghue); but as the House rejected that Motion by a very large majority, his proposal now became a substantive proposal, to which he trusted hon. Members from Ireland would give their support. His attention had been directed to the subject mainly by the Returns of the landowners in the two countries of England and Ireland, and, in his opinion, those Returns were well worthy of the attention of the House. In the case of Ireland they had before the House Returns prepared by the late Government at the time that the Irish Land Act was under consideration, and they showed that the total number of landowners in Ireland was not more than 19,000, and the comparison of this number with the landowners in England was worthy of consideration. The English Return showed that, on the whole, there were about 170,000 landowners holding over one acre of agricultural land. In England there was a landowner to every 130 of the population, while in Ireland the proportion was one to every 315 of the population. The comparison became the more remarkable if they included only the rural parts of England. Ireland was essentially a rural country; and if they made the comparison with the rural parts of England the number of landowners was very much smaller. There were in Ireland also, he found, no less than 600,000 small farmers, occupying an average of 34 acres, and 138,000 holding an average of 12 acres. Now, all the experience of the Continent went to prove that it was only when the occupation of small farms was combined with ownership that the best results were secured. It was the magic of property which, in the opinion of the great agricultural writer, Arthur Young, gave sufficient inducement to the small owner so to cultivate his farm as to produce the best result. Ireland was, therefore, a country in which they could have expected to find a large number of small owners established. In fact, there was no country in the world where there were so few small proprietors. Two efforts had been made by Parliament in that direction—the first under the Irish Church Act, the second under the Irish Land Act. Under the former Act it was provided that the tenants of Church property amounting to about 200,000 acres should have the right of pre-emption of their farms at a fair price, and considerable facilities were given under the Act for such purchases. The intention of the Legislature in that respect had been, it seemed to him, from their Reports, very judiciously carried out by the Irish Church Temporalities Commissioners. They had brought the subject home to every tenant of Church property in Ireland, and the result had been that a very large proportion of them had purchased their farms. Out of a total of 8,000 no less than two-thirds had become purchasers, and of these two-thirds 1,800 had, he found, paid the purchase money in full. The Commissioners further stated that a great many of the tenants had received from friends in America money in order to complete their purchases, which had, it was added, realized a full and fair price at $23\frac{1}{2}$ years purchase, while land sold under the Incumbered Estates Court had brought only $20\frac{1}{2}$ years purchase. In that way no less than 5,000 new landowners had, it appeared, been added to the total numbers in Ireland. Now, turning to the other experiment made in this direction, he came to those clauses of the Irish Land Act which went by the name of his right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), and which had been conceived in the same spirit as those of the Church Act. In the case of the Land Act the terms offered to the tenants were not quite so favourable. Only two-thirds of the purchase-money, and not three-fourths, as in the other case, was permitted to remain on mortgage, but the rate of interest was $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, instead of 4. During the six years since the passing of the Act the number of purchases under those clauses had been only 456, of which no less than 151 had arisen out of one transaction—that of the sale of the Marquess of Waterford's estate to his tenants. Yet during the same period no less than £6,000,000 worth of property—the rental amounting to £450,000—had been sold by the Incumbered Estates Court. That was more than double the amount of the Church property. The result was that while no less than 75 per cent of the Church property had been sold to the occupying tenants, in the case of the Land Act there had been only about 6 per cent. This being the state of the case, he thought he was justified in saying that the clauses of the Land Act had, to a great extent, been a failure. He did not attribute this result to the difference in terms he had already mentioned, but rather to the plan which had been adopted by the officials of the Incumbered Estates Court. The Church Commissioners had done everything they could to facilitate the operation, and had gone direct to the tenants. In the other case, so far as he could make out, no facilities whatever had been given. The tenants had been left to find out as best they could what they ought to do. They had been obliged in consequence to employ lawyers, or other agents, and to incur expense in other ways. Moreover, instead of the farms having been put up for sale in a manner convenient to the tenants individually, they had been offered in lots of, perhaps, eight or ten together, and the tenants had been obliged to combine and make a common purse in order to get the property. This was a process which, on the face of it, appeared impracticable. He had no doubt it was from this want of facilities for buying single farms that the whole operation had broken down. It appeared to him there was no necessity for selling the land by auction, and that the proper course would be to offer it to the tenants individually at upset prices slightly above what would be obtained in the open market. He believed the officials of the Court would have no difficulty in arranging with the landlord as to the price, and that the tenants were willing to pay something over the market price. By such means, he thought, effect would be given to the clauses of the Act. Almost all the cases of hardship which were sometimes quoted by Irish Members had arisen, he found, in connection with lands recently sold through the Incumbered Estates Court. The reason was obvious. So long as the lands remained in the possession of the old families, they were managed according to the traditional method, the landlords feeling themselves bound to observe the customs of the country. When estates were sold through the Incumbered Estates Court at enhanced values, landlords felt justified in raising the rents, thus practically confiscating the improvements made by the tenants. He knew the occurrence of these hard cases was denied; but the clauses of the Land Act were passed on the assumption that there were such cases, and he hoped that since the passing of the Act they were reduced in number, while it was clear that if the clauses had been passed 25 years ago hard cases that had occurred might have been prevented, because so much more land would have passed into the hands of tenants. If similar principles had been adopted in the sales by the Landed Estates Court as had been followed by the Church Commissioners, the number of landowners in the country would have been greatly increased, because farmers would have been turned into landowners. The more extended adoption of the principle might be advocated as a Conservative measure introducing a fixity of tenure to which no objection could be made. He trusted the Government would consent to his Motion.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Mr. PLUNKET said, that he did not rise to oppose the Motion, but to say that he had always thought that the clauses which were so honourably connected with the name of the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) were founded on a very wise policy, and that he had seen with regret that they had not been so effective as was expected when they became law. He would offer no suggestion as to whether the failure of those clauses was due to any one cause more than to another; but he would express a hope that the Government would grant the Committee, and that, as regarded the clauses which had been referred to, means would be found to give effect to that wise and safe policy which was to be found in the Land Act.

THE O'CONOR DON also expressed a hope that the Government would be able to accede to the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Reading. He believed that nothing would tend more to the tranquillity of Ireland than the establishment of a considerable number of persons who would be interested in the land, as owners as well as occupiers, and anything that would tend to increase the present number was a subject well worthy the consideration of that House. He was surprised that more advantage had not been taken of the clauses of the Act; but he believed that a good deal of it was owing to a want of knowledge amongst the people as to how they were to proceed to purchase.

Mr. FAY said, he thought the clauses had failed through want of appreciation on the part of the tenants, although they favoured the creation of a so-called peasant proprietary consisting of farmers, who found one-fourth of the purchase-money and borrowed three-fourths from the gentry of the neighbourhood. When a proprietor got an indefeasible title with his land he obtained advantages from the State for which he ought to give something in return. He had himself made an offer on behalf of 80 tenants for land on the Wicklow Mountain estate. It was bad land, yet they offered 28 years' purchase for it in order that there might be no doubt about its acquisition. At that price it would not have paid more than $3\frac{1}{4}$ per cent, but a nobleman who wanted it for shooting purposes offered 30 years' purchase, and his offer was accepted. Those men desired to become peasant proprietors, and they incurred great sacrifices to raise one-third of the purchase money. This showed a deficiency in the working of the Act. It seemed to him that in such a case if one or two years' purchase were lost to the owner, it would not be too great a price to pay for the Parliamentary title given under the Act.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA believed that the farming classes, notwithstanding that Amendments were very desirable for the extensive application of the Act, would have availed themselves more extensively of the Bright clauses if they had been more thoroughly understood. It might be true that the clauses in the Church Act had been occasionally worked for the benefit of speculators rather than of tenants; but the Committee might suggest the means of putting a stop to such practices if they were carried to a vicious extent. He trusted the Chief Secretary for Ireland, who had been so anxious to promote the well-being of that country, would agree to the Motion.

CAPTAIN NOLAN wished to explain, in justice to the Irish Members, that it was only by an accident that a proposal of this kind had not been earlier brought before the House. The late Sir John Gray attached great importance to this question, and in the year 1874 brought in a Bill to extend the power of tenants to purchase land under these clauses. Unfortunately, the hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter Barttelot) put a Notice on the Paper which brought the Bill under the half-past 12 o'clock Rule and it could not be brought on. Sir John Gray shortly afterwards died. He was glad to see the matter now taken up by an English Member, as he saw no ultimate solution of this question, except on the one hand a conflict between landlords and tenants, or else the creation of a considerable number of small proprietors. The number of proprietors in Ireland was smaller in proportion to the pecuniary value of the soil than in England. His own idea would be that the Government should advance money at a somewhat lower rate, and so as to enable the tenant to pay during a period of years what he could not pay down at once. The Motion if carried would not injure the proprietors of land, and he hoped the Government would accede to it.

MR. W. JOHNSTON said, he was very happy to find that the Government did not intend to oppose the Motion, and he was glad that this particular portion of the Act was to be referred to a Select Committee. There were many Members on the Conservative as well as the Liberal side of the House who wished to do justice to the Irish tenants; while, at the same time, there were Gentlemen sitting on the Conservative benches who would resist the extravagant demands which were sometimes made on behalf of tenants, but probably without their consent.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, he thought few things could be more important, as far as the well-being of Ireland was concerned, than to take steps consistent with the safety of the public funds for the purpose of enabling tenants under the Church Act and the Land Act to become the owners of the land which they occupied. He hoped, therefore, no obstacles would be opposed by the Government to the granting of the inquiry which was asked.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought no one who had carefully considered the question could doubt that it would be advantageous to Ireland that the number of persons possessing a proprietary interest in land should be considerably increased. It was intended to bring about this result by the Land Act of 1870 and the amending Act of 1872; but it must be admitted that the clauses framed for this particular purpose had failed to a certain extent, though not quite so much as might be supposed from the figures already quoted showing the number of purchases. Confining himself to those cases in which purchases had been made by tenants with the aid of advances from the Board of Works, he found a very considerable increase in the year ending 31st March last, as compared with the previous year. The total number of cases given in the last Report of the Board of Works, as having occurred from the time the Act came into operation up to March 31st, 1876, was 456, the amount of purchase-money was £476,000, and the amount which the Board advanced was £281,000. But, adding the transactions up to 31st March last, the total number of cases was 574, the total amount of purchase-money was £598,773, and the total amount advanced by the Board of Works was £357,548. This showed, at least, that there was increased progress during the last year. A point of considerable interest was the great difference between the number of applications and the number of loans actually made, a difference which ought to be inquired into. It might be that there was something in the conditions exacted which was too hard for the tenants to accept; but he thought the fact was mainly due to the circumstance that tenants, after applying, failed to provide the proportion of the purchase-money which it was necessary they should provide in order to entitle them to loans from the Board of Works. He could not think that the charges made against the Incumbered Estates Court were entirely fair, because, as far as he had been able to ascertain, he believed that whenever a property was ordered by the Court to be sold, due notice was given to the tenants both as to the fact and as to the conditions under which they might purchase the property. The 46th section of the Irish Land Act provided that the tenant was to have notice when his farm was to be sold, and he did not think that it could be alleged that those who were required to give such notice had failed to discharge the duty imposed upon them by that section. He would now proceed to the other reasons which, so far as he could judge, had really hindered the operation of the sections of the Act to which he had referred. The main reason appeared to him to be that the persons who were now the occupying tenants in Ireland did not as a rule desire to buy their farms. The fact was that those persons were so contented with the position of tenants that, though willing to give extraordinary sums for the right of occupation, they did not care to, as it appeared to them, unnecessarily waste their funds by purchasing the freehold. This, at all events, was the conclusion that must be drawn from the fact that the Irish tenants had not to any large extent availed themselves of the facilities offered to them of borrowing money to enable them to purchase their farms. In these circumstances, therefore, he was afraid that any reasonable proposals for the amendment of these sections which might result from this inquiry would not have much effect in extending their operation. He did not gather from the speech of the hon. Member for Reading that any very sweeping alterations in the provisions of the Land Act were contemplated by him. He felt that the hon. Member would agree with him that under any possible legislation on the subject they should secure, in the first place, that there should be no interference with the freedom of landlords who might be desirous, in the ordinary way, of disposing of their property. With regard to estates sold in the Incumbered Estates Court, care should be taken that their full value was realized, and that the tenant should pay the fair market price for his holding, while ample security should be given to the Government for the money advanced to the tenant to enable him to purchase his farm. Bearing these principles in mind, he had no objection to the removal of any obstacles that might exist to the wider operation of the sections of the Land Act which had been brought under their notice. The hon. Member desired that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into the subject. He was bound to say, as he had before stated, that he was not very favourably disposed to any large inquiry into the operation of the Irish Land Act at a period not very remote from its having been deliberately settled by Parliament. But he did not see that the proposal before the House was open to objection on that ground, inasmuch as the hon. Member had carefully limited the scope of the inquiry. The hon. Member had certainly shown that the sections in question of the Land Act had failed in producing the results which their authors might have expected from them, and had shown such a practical knowledge of the subject that very valuable suggestions might well be anticipated from the inquiry which he desired. He did not think, therefore, that he was in any way opening up a question as to the finality which must be held to apply to the great principles upon which the Land Act was based by assenting to this inquiry, which he trusted would result in showing that the Act had been fairly worked by those bodies to whom its carrying out had been entrusted, and in conducing still further to the contentment and prosperity of the country.

MR. BUTT said, he was happy to hear that the right hon. Baronet had acceded to this Motion. Without intending to enter at length into a discussion upon this subject, he wished to fairly warn the House against attaching an exaggerated importance to the effect likely to be produced by an amendment of these clauses. There was this marked distinction between the powers entrusted to the Church Commissioners and those entrusted to the Landed Estates Court—that the latter were unable to offer the tenant his holding at a certain price, but were bound by law to set the estate out in lots to be sold by auction. It might, therefore, well be made a matter for inquiry whether the Landed Estates Court should not have conferred upon it the power to offer the tenant his holding at a certain fair but fixed price. He believed that every difficulty that red tape could devise had been thrown in the way of the Irish tenant borrowing the money for the purchase of his land, and that was also a point that ought to be inquired into. When they had done all this and had given every facility they must not imagine that they touched more than the hem of the garment. The question raised to-night would not touch the case of the great bulk of the Irish tenantry, because not one in a hundred of the Irish tenants would be able to purchase his holding even if the opportunity of doing so were afforded him. He entirely agreed with the statement of the right hon. Baronet that there was no great anxiety on the part of the Irish tenant occupiers to become the purchasers of their holdings; they did not appear to possess any of the pride of ownership. It might be that in the North of Ireland there was a desire on the part of the tenants to become the freeholders of their farms, but that was not the case in the rest of the country. The great bulk of the Irish tenants wished undoubtedly for fixity of tenure; but for some unexplained reason they would almost rather pay a rent—a small rent—provided they were perfectly secure in their possession, than become the absolute owners of their holdings. It might be from want of education, or perhaps it might be owing to the traditions of an older system, or to the want of independence resulting from years of oppression; but the fact remained, which he admitted with regret, that the people of Ireland took no manly pride in becoming their own landlords. He regretted this the more because nothing could be of more value to the country than the existence of a large body of independent landed yeomanry. He would impress the House that, in taking the present course, they were but touching the fringe of the land question.

Mr. BIGGAR said, that the doctrine which had been laid down that tenants in Ireland had no wish to become owners of their holdings was one to which he could not subscribe, nor could he allow it to be made without a challenge. That tenants did not become buyers of their holdings was due to other causes. If the Landed Estates Court would put a fixed price upon the lots, and the tenants knew they could have their farms at that price, he believed a great majority of tenants would avail themselves of the opportunity. If the land was sold in smaller lots he believed that there would be plenty of purchasers among the tenant-farmers, and more money obtained.

Mr. PARNELL also dissented from the views expressed, that the tenant-farmers did not desire to become owners; on the contrary, he thought that if a fair opportunity of purchasing their farms was presented to them they would embrace it with the utmost eagerness, and one of the results of the inquiry would be to show the truth of that. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) said an inquiry into the operation of the "Bright" clauses would but touch the hem of the land question, and that was so. He did not know what the proceedings of the inquiry might be; but he firmly and strongly believed that whatever the endeavours of the right hon. Gentleman might be, the question would never be settled on any other basis than that of giving to the Irish people the right and liberty of living on their own farms as owners.

Mr. D. TAYLOR thanked the Government for acceding to this inquiry, because he believed that the position of the tenants in Ireland could be much improved without interfering with the owners of the soil, and if greater facilities were given for the purchasing of land in Ireland it would occasion its increased value in the market. Bright's clauses had not been taken advantage of to the extent it was perhaps thought they would have been, but that had arisen very much from the difficulties the tenants had in arranging for loans, which frequently were very small indeed. From what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he believed he was willing to make the inquiry a thorough one, and he hoped it would be carried as far as possible. One thing which should induce the Government to go as far as they could was the fact—he believed he was correct in saying so—that in all the advances made to Irish tenants there had never been a defaulter in paying those advances. That would show that whilst there was a desire to acquire land, there was also every effort made to carry out their engagements in connection therewith. He held strongly to the opinion that it was for the interest of Ireland and a matter of importance that land should be held by two classes of proprietors—a class of proprietors owning their own farms and a class of large owners. On the large estates the tenants were, as he knew, contented and comfortable, and between them and their landlords the best feelings existed; but it was on smaller and incumbered estates that the position of the tenant was unsatisfactory. No doubt as greater facilities were given to tenant-farmers they would hasten to seize the opportunity of becoming owners. Thanking the Government for granting the inquiry, he expected from it good results.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE thanked the Government for assenting to the Motion. He was glad the Government had recognized the present position of the tenants as not satisfactory. With regard to the declaration that had been made that the tenants did not desire to become owners, he believed that was true in the case of large and old established properties, where the tenants were certain of the traditional customs of the country being carried out. But in the case of estates where there had been a change of proprietors in consequence of a sale under the Incumbered Estates Act, he believed the tenants would be anxious to purchase the land they farmed if they were able to avail themselves of the facilities which, under the Land Act, it was intended to offer them.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. GREGORY moved that a Select Committee be appointed "to inquire into and report on the operation of the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867."

MR. E. STANHOPE, on behalf of the Government, said, he had great pleasure in assenting to the Motion. The Government were, nevertheless, desirous of reserving their freedom of action as regarded some minor points if they should feel it necessary to introduce a Bill to deal with them during the present Session.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into and report on the operation of the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867."—(Mr. Gregory.)

BISHOPRICS BILL.—LEAVE.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in redemption of a pledge which he gave last Session, rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to provide for the foundation of four new Bishoprics in England. He did not think it would be wise to have a very large number of new Sees created all at once. It would take some time to raise the requisite funds, and it would not be well to have a large number of Bishops with a small amount of income. He had, therefore, thought it right to raise the minimum amount of income to £3,500—a limit somewhat above the one fixed for the new Sees of St. Alban's and Truro. He proposed to provide at present for four new Bishoprics, making, with the two previously created, six altogether, a number which would probably be sufficient for the wants of the Church for a considerable period of years. It was necessary that the four new Sees should be formed in the most populous parts of England. He proposed that the first of them should be the See of Liverpool, taking in the West Derby Hundred of Lancashire. It would be separated from the diocese of Chester, and attached to the Province of York. The second would be formed out of the southern part of the diocese of Ripon, where there was a growing population, leaving York untouched, leaving the division of the diocese of York for future sub-division. Various plans had been proposed as to whether the cathedral city should be Wakefield or Halifax, and no doubt there was a great deal to be said in favour of both towns. It was therefore intended to leave it to Her Majesty in Council to decide whether it should be at Wakefield or Halifax whenever the sum of money required was forthcoming. The third new See would be formed from the counties of Derby and Nottingham. There had, he believed, been a great wish to have new Sees formed out of the dioceses of both Lichfield and Lincoln; but the Government did not see their way to create two additional Sees for that part of England, and therefore they thought it better that the counties of Derby and Nottingham should be joined, so as to constitute one See, at present. Although that might cause some disappointment, especially to persons in the diocese of Lichfield, where there was a great desire to have another See for themselves alone; yet, looking at their great zeal and their willingness to sacrifice their own personal feeling for a great object, he believed they would be willing to accept that arrangement. That See would, of course, be in the Province of Canterbury. The fourth new See would be constituted out of the county of Northumberland, and for its formation the Bishop of Durham had made a handsome offer. On that occasion he need not further explain the measure, but trusted he had said enough to induce the House to consent to the introduction of the Bill.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE expressed his thanks to the Home Secretary for having so quickly complied with what was the general wish of all who desired the prosperity of the Church—namely, an increase of her episcopal system. That wish had manifested itself with singular rapidity and unanimity throughout the country; and it had been met by the right hon. Gentleman in a way which would make his name grateful to all who had the well-being of the Church at heart. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to raise the minimum sum for each new See from the £3,000 of St. Albans and Truro to £3,500 with a house. He felt bound to say that in accepting that Bill under the regulations which the Government proposed, rather than lose it altogether, he and those for whom he spoke, gravely doubted if that alteration of the amount was desirable or not. Looking at all the circumstances, he thought it would have been better to have left the lower figure as it stood in the cases of Rochester and Truro. If £3,000 was sufficient for a Bishop charged with the care of the southern part of the metropolis, and bearing the historical title of Rochester, it could hardly be too little for the Bishops of such new Sees included in that Bill as Newcastle or Southwell. He should be glad to know where the cathedral city of the See to be formed out of the counties of Derby and Nottingham would be. [MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Southwell.] He approved the choice of Southwell. The ancient Collegiate Church there would form a suitable cathedral, and the choice would compromise the rivalry of the two county towns, Nottingham and Derby. Personally he must say that he did not think this diocese was most judiciously formed. He would have preferred only giving East Derbyshire to Southwell, retaining the rest of Derbyshire in Lichfield, so as to retain the north of that county and all Staffordshire under one Bishop, and consolidate Salop under Hereford. However, he acquiesced another point on which he desired to receive some comfort and assurance was that the Bill should contain some provision, however rudimentary, for the chapters in the new dioceses. Without the addition of a chapter on the constitutional complaint of each diocese, the measure would be a great gain, but with that addition it would be a much greater gain. If a provision of that sort were introduced, those who did not like the Bill would not dislike it more on that account, while those who liked it would probably give it a still heartier support.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he knew it was a matter of great interest, and he ought to mention that the Government had decided that as the new diocese of Rochester would contain so large a portion of the South of the Metropolis they had determined that the designation of the future Bishop should be Bishop of Rochester and Southwark.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to provide for the foundation of four new Bishoprics in England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary Cross and Sir HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON.

CATTLE PLAGUE AND IMPORTATION OF LIVE STOCK.

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

VISCOUNT SANDON moved that the Select Committee on Cattle Plague and Importation of Live Stock do consist of Twenty-three Members.

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved that the number of Members be increased to 27. He did so for this reason. The original constitution of the Committee had met with reprobation from many quarters of the House. There were altogether 10,000,000 of horned beasts in the United Kingdom. Ireland and Scotland had 4,000,000, that was two-fifths of the whole, and yet of the 23 Members proposed only two were Irish Members. Again, the selection of these two Members was a most extraordinary one, having been made without any consultation with what was called the Irish Party in the House, although on this question he was willing to acknowledge there ought to be no difference of Party. They were all equally interested, whether Home Rulers, Liberals sitting under the Gangway, or Conservatives; and of the two Members selected neither was a county Member, although it was well known that the wealth of Ireland chiefly consisted in its cattle. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) wished to put in three additional Members, leaving one for the Government to choose. He had risen in the absence of his hon. and learned Friend—whom he now observed in his seat—and he would propose the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. King-Harman), who was a very large proprietor in Ireland, and also farmed 2,500 acres; of the hon. Member for Cavan County (Mr. Biggar), who had a large experience in trade, and was practically acquainted with many cognate questions. He did not think any Cattle Committee would be complete, from an Irish point of view, which did not include a representative from Ballinasloe, where a most important fair was held, and although situated in his own county of Galway it was closely adjoining Roscommon. He was therefore glad to see that the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. French) was moved as one of the three additional Members.

MR. BUTT seconded the Amendment, pointing out that there was no part of the United Kingdom more deeply interested in this question than Ireland, and submitting that it was not unreasonable to ask that the agricultural districts of Ireland should be represented. Speaking in conformity to the wishes of a meeting which had been held, he would suggest as additional Members of the Committee the three hon. Gentlemen named by his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Nolan).

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Twenty-three," in order to insert the words "Twenty-seven,"—(Captain Nolan,)—instead thereof.

VISCOUNT SANDON confessed at once, on the part of the Government, that the Committee would be stronger if it had more representatives of Ireland, which, undoubtedly, had a very deep interest in the question. Government were willing that there should be four more Members appointed, and that three of these should be Irish Members. In the meantime, the House might decide, in accordance with the suggestion in the Amendment, that the total number should be 27, and the particular Members to be appointed could afterwards be considered.

MR. STORER observed that the names of hon. Members connected with the English counties and tenant-farmers were conspicuous by their absence. It should be remembered that although consumers had the first interest in this matter, it had been very much abated by the large importations of American meat. The farmers were the parties chiefly interested. It was their herds that suffered, and they had to pay the tax for compensation in a great proportion, as it came out of the county rate to which they were contributors.

Mr. Ascheton Cross

Mr. CALLAN urged that the Committee should consist of 29 Members, and that the hon. Members for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) and Forfar (Mr. J. W. Barclay) should be added.

SIR W. HART DYKE felt himself mainly responsible for the names on the Committee, and when it was stated that tenant-farmers were conspicuous by their absence, he was bound to add that the first hon. Member to whom he applied to be a Member of the Committee was the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read), who refused to serve.

Mr. MARK STEWART said, he had gathered from what had been said that three out of the four additional names were to be those of Irish Members. He felt rather disappointed, because Scotland was deserving of consideration as being an integral part of the United Kingdom. [Laughter.] He would explain the matter a little more fully. No cattle were allowed to be imported into Ireland, whereas Scotland was subjected to the importation of cattle from foreign ports all over the world, and cattle disease and the plague were brought over in that way. It was therefore important that Scotland should be considered in this matter, and he thought it right she should have an additional Member. There was a great amount of interest felt in Scotland in this matter. It was spoken of throughout the whole country, and if this was the only reason, Scotland ought, in his opinion, to be more fully represented than it was. It was a question in which, no doubt, the Government took all the precautions that could be possibly taken to stop this contagious plague from disseminating among cattle throughout the country, but those means were inadequate and insufficient for the purpose. It was therefore with great satisfaction that he found they were able to meet together in that House in order to appoint a Select Committee. As hon. Members very well knew, he had a Motion on the Paper on this subject, and probably if he had persevered with that Motion, this Select Committee could not have been discussed, much less appointed; but he was willing to waive that Motion in order that this Committee should be appointed, because he knew it would have been a sort of dog-in-the-manger policy to have obstructed the formation of the Committee. He was therefore inclined to support the Committee, in the hope that if carried through it would tend to stop the cattle plague.

Question, "That the words 'Twenty-three' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Words "Twenty-seven" inserted.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Ordered, That the Committee do consist of Twenty-seven Members.

VISCOUNT SANDON moved "That Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson be one other Member of the Committee."

Mr. PARNELL inquired what four names the Government intended to propose in addition to those on the Paper?

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked whether they would accept the three names which he understood the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had to propose?

Motion agreed to.

VISCOUNT SANDON moved "That Mr. W. E. Forster be one other Member of the Committee."

Motion agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Chaplin be one other Member of the Committee."

Mr. PARNELL repeated the request that the Government would declare their intentions, and to enable the noble Lord to do so, he moved the omission of the name of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin).

Amendment proposed, to leave out the name of Mr. Chaplin, in order to insert the name of Mr. Clare Read. — (Mr. Callan,) — instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the name of Mr. Chaplin stand part of the Question."

Mr. ASSHETON CROSS said, it was usual to propose one name at a time. As soon as those names proposed by the Government were accepted, it would be perfectly competent for the hon. and learned Member for Limerick to move the addition of any of the names in his Notice. But no name could be proposed without Notice.

Mr. BUTT admitted that was the usual course. But the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) had engaged to accept three other names. Was it unfair to ask him what those names were?

MR. CALLAN said, though he did not wish to offer any objection to the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, he would vote under the circumstances that the name of the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) be substituted.

MR. W. JOHNSTON supported the nomination of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin).

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, it would be impossible for him to vote against the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, because he was eminently qualified to serve; but he could not understand why the Government would not say who were the three Irish Members they intended to propose.

MR. W. H. SMITH explained that the hon. Member for South Norfolk had refused to serve, though the Government were exceedingly anxious that he should.

MR. CALLAN said, the hon. Member's objection was to the terms of Reference, and not to serving on the Committee if those terms were altered.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that the best course would be for the Irish Party to allow the 23 first-named of the Committee to be nominated, and then to divide if necessary on three additional Irish Members which it was proposed to appoint. At the same time, he denied that the present mode according to which Select Committees were chosen by the Whips on each side was satisfactory. When there was a large independent Party in the House they ought to be consulted. The Irish Members were not anxious to break the Rules of the House more than they could possibly help. [Laughter.] He meant they were not anxious to strain the Rules of the House.

SIR W. HART DYKE said, it was well known for many years that the system on which these Committees were presented to the House was not one that was represented as absolutely perfect, but as conducive to the convenience of the House. The system might be good or it might not; but, as far as he was himself concerned, it was a very uncomfortable one. It was impossible to cast a ray of satisfaction on the path of one hon. Member without embittering and destroying the political aspirations of another. The Home Secretary was asked whether Her Majesty's Government were prepared at once to announce all these names. His right hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. Adam) knew how they had been harassed about this list of names. That very fact would show that if the right hon. Gentleman rose at once and said he was ready to give the four names he would be in this difficulty—that hon. Members might have risen and said it was impossible that those names could be accepted. In conversation with his right hon. Friend and with his noble Friend (Viscount Sandon) the Amendments which had stood for days on the Paper had been discussed, and they came to the conclusion that if the House wished that three Members representing Irish constituencies should be added, those three Members should be the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. French), the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. King-Harman), and the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore). Those three names were included in the various Amendments on the Paper.

MR. ADAM quite agreed with what had fallen from his hon. Friend. No one knew better than his hon. Friend and himself the difficulty of forming these Committees, and the amount of badgering they received proved to him that it was impossible to get what would be admitted to be a fair Committee, because everybody seemed ready to raise objections. No doubt there was a good deal to be said for the claim of Ireland to have some Irish Members on the Committee, and he quite agreed that two sitting on that side and one on the other side—namely, the hon. Members for Roscommon and Clonmel (Mr. French and Mr. A. Moore) and the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. King-Harman)—should be appointed. Their names were already on the Paper, and therefore no further Notice would be required.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said, he should vote against every name on the Committee unless their men were put on. It was all very well for the Government to ask them to agree to the first 23 names and then say that they could divide on the 24th. They would go to a division on every name.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD remarked that there was certainly a desire on both sides of the House that the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) should sit on the Committee.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, that he thought the Government had gracefully conceded the point that three more Irish Members should be placed on the Committee. It was now admitted that there was a third Party in the House; and he hoped that the Government would further act gracefully by acceding to the names mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan).

MR. P. W. MARTIN said, that in a very late conversation with the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) he said that nothing on earth should induce him to serve upon the Committee. As to the remarks of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), who said that the Government had gracefully conceded the point and allowed three more names to be added to the Committee, he might say that the Government had no power to interfere with the rights of the House, and he should object to the names of the Irish Members who had been referred to.

MR. BUTT said, he would have voted for the hon. Member for South Norfolk if it had been certain that he would serve, but it had been distinctly stated that he would not. It had been said that his objection was not to serve on the Committee, but to the terms of the Reference; but unless he withdrew his objection to the terms of the Reference he (Mr. Butt) could not vote for him in any case. He must express his extreme regret at the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. Adam), in suggesting that the name of the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) should be substituted for that of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), a suggestion which could only tend to widen the breach which already existed between different sections of the House.

MR. W. E. FORSTER reminded the House that the question was whether the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) should or should not sit on the Committee. The name of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) might be left out of the discussion till he was proposed. He regretted the increased numbers of the Committee. The plain truth was that 27 was too many, and there would be increased difficulty attending the examination of witnesses. It was not the case that the Committees were chosen by the front benches. The right of choice was with the House, but some one must needs nominate. For himself he would be willing that his own name should be withdrawn, and that he should be allowed to offer his services as a witness instead of as a Member of the Committee. With reference to the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) that Gentleman had distinctly told him that nothing would induce him to serve. But the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire was also a Gentleman who would prove a good Member of Committee, and he hoped he would be elected.

MR. COURTNEY said, that he was sorry that the House appeared to be on the eve of a prolonged wrangle. The increase of the numbers of the Committee which had just been deprecated was a foregone conclusion, and had been conceded by Government. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) said that the Irish Members had met together and had selected three Members whom they desired to represent the whole body—namely, the hon. Members for Sligo (Mr. King-Harman), Cavan (Mr. Biggar), and Roscommon (Mr. French). Two of these Members had been accepted; but in the place of the hon. Member for Cavan the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) had been proposed. He confessed that he regarded this as a most unfortunate proposal, and he could hardly express the sorrow with which he had heard the remarks of the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. P. W. Martin). Anything which tended to increase the breach between any Party in the House and the great body of hon. Members was, in his judgment, to be much regretted. Even if it were true, which he did not allow, that they had to deal with an unreasonable person, they ought not to combat that person in an equally unreasonable way. Several times he had had to regret the manner in which it had been proposed to meet such conduct. He rose for the purpose of appealing to the reasonableness of the hon. Member for Cavan, and he would ask him to get up in his place and decline to serve upon the Committee. He knew this was a great request to make; but a mistaken prejudice which had been created must be banished by such action on the part of the hon. Member for Cavan. ["Question!"] He maintained that he was speaking strictly to the question. If the hon. Member for Cavan would decline to serve, he would be doing a very great thing for the Party of which he was a Member.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY agreed that a Committee with so large a number of Members would be very heavy and unworkable. With regard to the suggestion which had been made to the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) he should offer no advice. He thought that, being engaged in a trade which was intimately connected with the subject with which the Committee would have to deal, the hon. Gentleman would prove a decided acquisition to that body. Although that hon. Member had been represented as obstructing the progress of Public Business, and although he might have done so on some occasions, he did not think any person who had heard him speak in the House could recall a single occasion on which he had been as offensive to any Member of the House as the Representative of Rochester (Mr. P. W. Martin) had been that evening. A great deal had been said about the dignity of the House. Hon. Members stood up heated in argument, and, excited perhaps by the interruptions of their opponents, used language which might not be pleasant, but which was excusable because it was uttered in hot blood. The hon. Member for Rochester, however, got up in cold blood and made a directly personal attack upon another hon. Member. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER thought the hon. Member was travelling beyond the Question before the House.

MR. CALLAN asserted, with reference to the question as between the hon. Member for South Norfolk and the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, that at a late hour on the previous night the former had not withdrawn his name, and that, while objecting to the terms of the Reference, he was ready under the peculiar circumstances to act.

MR. BENTINCK thought the House generally must regret that a discussion of this kind should have taken the turn of a personal debate. For his own part, he declined to go into the personal question. As for the subject actually before the House, he regretted that the Motion of the hon. Member for the Wigtown Burghs (Mr. Mark Stewart) had not come on, because he regretted the appointment of the Committee altogether. He should vote for the appointment of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin).

COLONEL PARKER desired to express on behalf of the agriculturists of the country their earnest wish that the name of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire should be retained on the Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER believed there could be no doubt that his hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) had been repeatedly asked to serve on this Committee, and had expressed his unwillingness to do so. On the other hand, there could be no doubt that there existed in the House a strong feeling that it was desirable that his hon. Friend should take part in the deliberations of the Committee. The House had agreed that the Committee should consist of 27 Members. There were at present only 23 names on the list, and hon. Gentlemen from Ireland had indicated that they would propose three other names, thus only bringing up the number to 26, and leaving one name still to be supplied. He would therefore suggest they should nominate the hon. Member for South Norfolk as a Member of the Committee. If his hon. Friend, who was not now present, should afterwards decline to serve, and wished to be removed, that would be a matter for subsequent consideration.

MR. CALLAN said, that after the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, that the concession of the right hon. Gentleman only affected a portion of the case, and did not remove further objections to the constitution of the Committee.

Question put, "That Mr. Chaplin be one other Member of the Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 156; Noes 23: Majority 133.—(Div. List, No. 104.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Jacob Bright be one other Member of the Committee."

Mr. Courtney

MR. ADAM expressed his regret that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) should have found fault with the course which he had taken in proposing the substitution of the name of the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) instead of that of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar). He had not the slightest objection to see the latter hon. Gentleman sitting on the Committee; and he had suggested the name of the hon. Member for Clonmel because he had found it set down twice among the names proposed, while that of the hon. Member for Cavan was set down only once.

MR. BUTT said, he hoped they might now come to a termination of this discussion in which he had been exceedingly unwilling to take part. It did not credit to either side of the House, and, he thought, did not tend to add to its dignity. The three hon. Gentlemen's names which had been suggested by the Irish Party had been unanimously elected at a very full meeting of the Party, and the name of the hon. Member for Cavan was chosen, with the others, by that meeting, which included many who did not sympathize with a great deal which the hon. Member for Cavan did. That hon. Gentleman might be right in the course he pursued, or he might be wrong. He would not stay to discuss it, but was it right to ostracize any Member of the House? If they thought the hon. Member for Cavan displayed any surplus energy, let them put him on a Committee and give him something to do. Do not make an outlaw or a martyr of him, for that would only tend to magnify him. It seemed to him that an attempt had been made to gratify petty spite in this matter. If they thought the hon. Member for Cavan had done wrong, let them arraign him before the House and censure him for it. But he appealed to the House not to reject his name because of his unpopularity.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman's notion of what constituted a martyr must be a somewhat curious one, if he was under the impression that the word was applicable to the case of an hon. Member because he was not about to be appointed to serve on a Committee. The real question before the House, however, was the appointment as a Member of the Committee of his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright). He did not understand the "ostracizing" of any hon. Member. If a Gentleman was elected by a constituency to sit in that House he was competent to serve on a Committee, and he was informed that the hon. Member for Cavan had a good deal of practical acquaintance with the subject which the proposed Committee would have to consider. That practical knowledge which the hon. Member for Cavan possessed would no doubt be of service on the Committee; and the hon. Member's name therefore might very fairly be proposed and considered as soon as the names now before the House were disposed of.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Wilbraham Egerton be one other Member of the Committee."

MR. PARNELL remarked that he was very sorry to have heard observations made on the occupation of the hon. Member for Cavan. It was true that the hon. Member for Cavan was in business; but he wished they had more such hon. Members, and Ireland would then be in a much better position.

MR. BENETT-STANFORD rose to Order, and asked whether the hon. Member for Meath was in Order in alluding to the name of the hon. Member for Cavan?

CAPTAIN NOLAN was about to speak, when—

MR. SPEAKER said, he could only decide one point of Order at once. The name of the hon. Member for Cavan would come on for consideration by-and-by. At present the Question before the House was, whether Mr. Wilbraham Egerton should be added to the Committee.

MR. PARNELL would not refer further to the name of the hon. Member for Cavan, but certainly the question of occupation had been introduced. ["No, no!"] The miserable question of personal conditions had been introduced by an hon. Member who ought to have known better. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER again reminded the hon. Member that the Question before the House was whether the name of Mr. Wilbraham Egerton should be added.

MR. BUTT suggested to his hon. Friend that, after the conciliatory disposition which had been shown on both sides, they might trust to the good sense of the House and not object to the name now before them.

MR. CALLAN thought that if the Government would state that they accepted the nomination of the hon. Member for Cavan all opposition would cease.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER objected to his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland giving any such undertaking at present. All the Government desired was, that the Committee should be nominated in a regular, business-like way. They had no prejudice at all in the matter, and nothing was further from their thoughts than to speak lightly of any hon. Member's occupation. They had paid the most sincere respect to all the Members of the House, and certainly it would be their very last idea to make an objection to anyone on account of his occupation; but it was a most irregular course to bring up the name of another Member when a name was submitted to the House to vote upon. The name of the hon. Member for Cavan would be duly considered by-and-by.

MR. J. COWEN said, every name ought to be judged on its merits, and if the hon. Member for Cavan was guilty of any offence let him be punished. This dispute, he thought, had arisen because of a feeling in the mind of the Irish Members that the hon. Member for Cavan was, being struck at. If it were shown that that was not intended, the opposition would cease.

LORD ESLINGTON thought no one would object to the name of the hon. Member for Mid-Cheshire (Mr. W. Egerton). He conceded that the hon. Member for Cavan was well qualified to be a Member of the Committee. He protested against any one entertaining the feeling that any hon. Member was ostracized. It was most desirable that Ireland should be represented on the Committee, and for this special reason—that the cattle disease had been kept out of Ireland. The law appeared to have been better carried out there than in England, and it was most desirable to place experienced Members from Ireland on the Committee. If the hon. Member for Cavan had rendered himself somewhat unpopular, that ought not to prevent him from being nominated. He had been proposed by Irish Members, he had their confidence, and he (Lord Eslington) hoped the House would accept the name.

MR. PAGET protested against its being supposed that the House were bound to appoint as a Member of the Committee an hon. Member who had been selected by Members who called themselves "The Irish Members." It was an attempt to dictate to the House, which he hoped they would be slow to recognize.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: The hon. Member who has just spoken may be perfectly easy in his mind. We object to the name of the hon. Member for Cheshire—that is all.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that one side of the House was, as the hon. Member said, dictating to the other as to the composition of the Committee. He wished to tell the Government that there was a peculiar unfairness in putting the name of the hon. Member for Clonmel before that of the hon. Member for Cavan.

MR. SPEAKER wished to point out to the House that the Question before it was the name of Mr. Wilbraham Egerton. When all the names originally proposed were nominated, the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Butt) would be called upon to make his Motion, and the House could then discuss the nomination of the three Members mentioned in it.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he hoped that the hon. Member for Cheshire would be nominated to serve on the Committee. But in present circumstances he did not consider him so fit a man as his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan.

MR. SPEAKER would again remind the hon. and gallant Member that the name of the hon. Member for Cavan would be more properly brought forward when it was proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Colonel Kingscote be one other Member of the Committee."

MR. BUTT moved—"That the name of Mr. Biggar be substituted for that of Colonel Kingscote." He hoped the House would excuse him for trying to say a few words, not in the way of opposition to the name of Colonel Kingscote, but to show their feeling in desiring to have Mr. Biggar on the Committee. In the early part of the evening they expressed a desire to have Mr. Biggar on the Committee, and the Government sent them a communication that they objected to that and another name, and they suggested the name of the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore). The Irish Members, however, wished to have Mr. Biggar on the Committee. He appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say that when the name of the hon. Member came forward the Government would not offer any opposition. If he gave such an assurance, he believed there would not be another word of opposition from the Irish Members. It was hardly necessary to say that he did not intend to persist in his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ADAM said, he had no objection to the name of the hon. Member for Cavan being added to the Committee; but he did not think the hon. and learned Member for Limerick was treating the hon. Member for Cavan fairly by running him against the hon. Member for West Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote).

MR. BRUEN did not feel himself committed by the resolution of a so-called Irish Representative meeting, at which the Irish names to be proposed on the Committee were agreed upon. No Irish Conservative Members had been summoned to it.

MR. SULLIVAN explained how the meeting was convened and composed, and stated that Irish Conservative Members were intended to be present at it. If the Government were going to avenge upon the hon. Member for Cavan any fault which he might have committed, they had better say so at once.

MR. SPEAKER pointed out that the name of the hon. Member for Cavan was not before the House.

THE O'CONOR DON expressed a hope that the House would terminate the unseemly wrangle in which they had been engaged. If the Government would say they would not oppose the nomination of the hon. Member for Cavan the matter would be at an end.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it would be impossible for the Government to give such a pledge as that asked for by the hon. Member who had just sat down.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN pointed out that in order to satisfy certain English Members, the Government had already promised to propose the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) as one of the four new Members to be added to the 23 whose names stood on the Paper. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, therefore, was somewhat inconsistent when he said that Government could not agree to the name of any other Member until the 23 had been appointed. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had waited all the evening in order to vote for the three Irish Members whom the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had proposed; but as hon. Members from Ireland persisted in opposing names to which no one objected, and thus causing unnecessary delay, he should think of his own constitution rather than of the constitution of the Committee, and remain no longer.

MR. PARNELL said, he intended to propose an Amendment. The hon. Member for Clonmel, as high sheriff of his county, would not be able to attend on the Committee. There was at present no cattle plague in Ireland; but if it should break out there, the farmers of Ireland would be ruined. It was the duty of Irish Members to insist on being properly represented on the Committee, and they had met and determined on three names—the only real reason assigned for rejecting the name of the hon. Member for Cavan, who was one of the three, being the miserable prejudice that had been avowed by an hon. Member opposite.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member had not been speaking to the Question at all.

MR. PARNELL said he would not propose, as he intended, the nomination of the hon. Member for Cavan.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member announced at the commencement of his speech that he would move an Amendment. If he had done so his speech would have been in Order; but as he had not concluded with doing so he must inform the hon. Gentleman that his whole speech had been out of Order.

MR. PARNELL said, that he was sorry that any misunderstanding should have arisen. He therefore begged to move the substitution of Mr. Biggar's name for that of Colonel Kingscote.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE seconded the Amendment. It was better that a Vote should be taken than that the Amendment should be withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the name of Colonel Kingscote, in order to insert the name of Mr. Biggar,"—(Mr. Parnell,)—instead thereof.

MR. BUTT hoped that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Meath would not be pressed. He complained of hon. Members below the Gangway opposite setting an exceedingly bad example, remarking with reference to certain noises from the opposite benches in that quarter that he could conceive nothing more inconsistent in any man who felt the dignity of the House and the responsibility of a Member of Parliament than to sit silent, excepting when he sought to disturb others who were speaking. He would suggest that all the remaining names on the list should be accepted by the Irish Members, and then a vote should be taken as to the name of the hon. Member for Cavan, in respect to which he would rely on the good feeling of the House.

MR. P. W. MARTIN, having been alluded to, wished to explain. When the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) asked the Government to accept his names en bloc, he (Mr. W. Martin) said it was not in the power of the Government to do that. When he said he had a personal objection to the hon. Member for Cavan, that was not exactly the idea he wished to convey to the House, although for a reason which he would give, he had individually an objection to the hon. Member serving on the Committee. Some time ago, a Bill in which he (Mr. Martin) took an interest, was unanimously read a second time and passed through Committee, and the hon. Member, although in his hearing he said he had only read that Bill a few minutes before, suddenly made it an opposed Order. That showed that if elected he might possibly take a course which would bring the whole of the important business of the Committee to a standstill. He had occasionally spoken to the hon. Member, and he had no personal objection to him whatever; but he preferred the hon. Member for Kildare.

MR. W. E. FORSTER was sorry that that Amendment had been moved, and hoped it would be withdrawn. If the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) wished to see the hon. Member for Cavan placed on the Committee, he was taking the course to render that impossible by running his name against that of the hon. Member for West Gloucestershire.

MR. SPEAKER pointed out, that if the House declined to substitute Mr. Biggar's name for that of Colonel Kingscote, it would still be open to any hon. Member to propose the addition of the hon. Member for Cavan to the Committee.

MR. BIGGAR wished to make a personal explanation with reference to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. W. Martin). The fact was that he thoroughly approved of the Bill to which the hon. Member had alluded, but he wished to have a clause inserted, and that was his reason for making it an opposed Order. It was perfectly true that he had read the Bill only a few minutes before; but it was short, and he had thoroughly comprehended all the points.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, his only objection to the hon. Member for West Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote) was that unless Irish names were added to the Committee, the Irish Members would oppose every name. He appealed to the hon. Member for Meath to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR observed that he did not blame the Government for acting as they had done, as they could not manage the Party behind them. There had been several occasions within the last week or two on which the Government had expressed their intention of taking a certain course and then left the House, whereupon their followers took a different course. Hon. Members opposite wished 23 nominations to the Committee to be accepted before the hon. Member for Cavan's name was submitted to them. That name would then be objected to. If the Government would give their assurance that they would do their best to secure a vote on the hon. Member's name without prejudice when it was reached, no doubt hon. Members from Ireland would not oppose the other names. If such a pledge were not given, Irish Members would be justified in opposing every nomination.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN hoped that the Amendment would be withdrawn, as it presented a false issue to the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was clearly understood that the Amendment was made not with any view of objection to the name of the hon. Member for West Gloucestershire (Colonel Kingscote), but with the intention of bringing on a discussion on the question whether the hon. Member for Cavan should be appointed or not on the Committee. The hon. Member for Meath had made this Motion, not with any view of pressing it, but to put himself in Order; and therefore he suggested that the House should allow the Amendment to be withdrawn, and that the other names should be agreed to; and after that, when they came to the appointment of the four additional Members, the discussion might be taken. He thought that course would save time.

MR. SULLIVAN asked what corresponding advantage the Irish Members would obtain if they accepted the offer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

MR. MARK STEWART would vote for the hon. Member of Cavan when the proper time came; but he protested against the course of placing his name against that of every other Member proposed.

THE EARL OF DALKEITH hoped the appointment of a Committee would be proceeded with, and that hon. Members for Ireland would not offer any further opposition. He would remind them that Scotland had a right to be represented, but Scotch Members were too modest to come forward.

MR. R. W. DUFF complained that more Scotch Representatives had not been placed on the Committee.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY said, two Members to represent Scotland was a totally inadequate number.

Question, "That the name of Colonel Kingscote stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Colonel Kingscote nominated one other Member of the Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. James Corry be one other Member of the Committee."

MR. PARNELL said, they had now been over three hours discussing this question, and it was clear that it could not be finished that night. He therefore moved that the further consideration of the Committee be adjourned until Thursday.

MAJOR O'GORMAN seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned." —(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. BRUEN begged the hon. Member not to persevere with the Motion for Adjournment. While hon. Members were talking the Cattle Plague was spreading.

MR. BUTT also hoped the hon. Member for Meath would withdraw his Motion. He should not vote for an Adjournment, nor should he vote against the name of any other Member, believing that such a course would tend to prevent the accomplishment of the object he had in view.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question, "That Mr. James Corry be one other Member of the Committee," put, and agreed to.

Mr. PEASE, Sir GEORGE JENKINSON, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Sir RAINALD KNIGHTLEY, Mr. MURPHY, Mr. ELLIOT, Mr. MUNDELLA, Mr. CAMERON of Lochiel, Mr. ARTHUR PEEL, Mr. RITCHIE, Mr. JOHN HOLMS, Mr. TORR, Mr. ANDERSON, Major ALLEN, Mr. NORWOOD, and Mr. ASSHETON, nominated other Members of the Committee.

MR. BUTT moved, "That the name of Mr. Biggar be added to the Committee."

Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Biggar be one other Member of the Committee."

The House divided:—Ayes 90; Noes 113: Majority 23.—(Div. List, No. 105.)

MR. SULLIVAN moved the Adjournment of the House, on the ground that some heat had been thrown into the proceedings of the past hour, and the Members of the Government had been divided in their support of the Amendment; and therefore he thought some time should be given to the Government to consider what names they would adopt.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Sullivan.)

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had a Notice on the Paper to move the addition of two other names.

MR. BUTT declined to make any further Motion on the subject.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought there was no necessity for the Adjournment. The question on which the House divided was a question for the House, and not for the Government; and as the House had decided the question, he was of opinion that the subject might be there allowed to drop, and the remaining Members of the Committee appointed.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY suggested that the Motion for the Adjournment of the House might be amended and altered to the adjournment of the Debate. He intimated that on the next name he would move to substitute a Scotch Member.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had voted in the minority, and was sorry for the decision which the House had just arrived at. He hoped there would be an Adjournment of the Debate.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 35; Noes 156: Majority 121.—(Division List, No. 106.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. French be one other Member of the Committee."

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked, having seen the Chief Secretary for Ireland go into the Lobby against his hon. Friend (Mr. Biggar), what Ireland had to expect? He should divide the House on the questions of the Adjournment of the House and the Debate.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that this was not a Government division, and he felt it his duty to exercise his individual judgment upon the matter before them. Surely they had the liberty of deciding who, in their judgment, was the fittest Member to serve on this Committee, and he had considered the qualifications of the hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. A. Moore) to be preferable to those of the hon. Member (Mr. Biggar).

MR. CALLAN moved the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Callan.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Government wished to add three Irish Members to the Committee.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 17; Noes 127: Majority 110.—(Div. List, No. 107.)

Question again proposed, "That Mr. French be one other Member of the Committee."

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. James Barclay.)

The House divided:—Ayes 18; Noes 96: Majority 78.—(Div. List, No. 108.)

Question, "That Mr. French be one other Member of the Committee," put, and agreed to.

Mr. King-Harman nominated one other Member of the Committee.

Further Proceeding on Nomination of the Committee adjourned till Thursday.

(Mr. Holt, Mr. Harcastle, Mr. Charles Wilson.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HOLT, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said: Mr. Speaker, in making that Motion, the House will probably expect me to state the object and explain the provisions of the Bill, as well as notice the objections raised to, and give my reasons for, the course I am pursuing in thus bringing the subject forward for consideration. The object of the Bill is two-fold. It aims at supplying a defect in Martin's Act, and it is also intended to prohibit painful experiments known as vivisection. Hon. Members are aware that Martin's Act is the Act under which prosecutions for cruelty are conducted. It has been a very valuable Act; but experience has proved that it is defective—in one respect, in that its provisions are restricted to domestic animals. To remedy that defect I propose to the House to enact—

"If any person shall from and after the passing of this Act cruelly torture or wantonly or barbarously injure any vertebrate animal he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act."

I trust this will so far commend itself to the approval of hon. Members that I need say little in support of it. It is, I believe, well known that acts of cruelty, condemned by every one, have remained unpunished, because, though revolting to the feelings of the whole civilized community, the law cannot reach them. As I imagine that any objections which may be taken to this clause will relate merely to details, I need not dwell on this part of the Bill. The object of this Bill is also to provide a special remedy for a special form of cruelty; to prohibit the practices known as vivisection. To effect this, I ask the House to enact that—

"From and after the passing of this Act it shall not be lawful to perform any experiment causing, or being in itself of a nature to cause, pain or disease in any vertebrate animal, except for the purpose of alleviating or curing any disease from which such animal is suffering; and any person except as aforesaid performing or taking part in any such experiment, or permitting any such experiment to be performed upon any premises over which he has control, shall be deemed guilty of an offence against this Act."

and inspection of places where there may be danger that cruelty is practised, and for the entry, on warrant, to search private premises where there may be reason to think that experiments are conducted. The Bill contains also provisions for the administration of the law, taken, with slight alteration, from the Cruelty Act of last year. Such is the object, and such are the provisions of the Bill. In the next place, I think I ought to notice some of the objections which are raised to the legislation proposed, and the arguments offered in defence of vivisection. First, let me try to remove one of the objections raised, which I know to influence some persons, and which may be present to the minds of some hon. Members. I find the movement against vivisection is regarded by some persons as an attack on the Medical Profession. Now, Sir, I wholly repudiate such a charge, so far as I am concerned myself. I am attacking not men, but practices and opinions—practices and opinions which have been denounced and are denounced by medical men—I make no attack on the Profession. To me it is a source of deep regret if, through the action of some of its leading members, an honourable and noble Profession should have become in anywise identified in the eyes of the public with vivisection, and should be thereby lowered in dignity and position in their estimation. But I will not admit that the Profession, as such, is to be confounded with the advocates of vivisection. I know that there are many medical men of no little experience who oppose the practice, on scientific, no less than on moral grounds. I have presented Petitions to this House signed by medical men, in favour of the total suppression of vivisection. I have met with language employed by medical men in denouncing vivisection as strong as any I have seen anywhere. I am told that many doctors, especially country practitioners, are ignorant of the whole subject; and I hear that at this moment there is a movement going on, which will, I hope, result in the complete vindication of the Faculty throughout the United Kingdom from any complicity in physiological cruelty. I deprecate any attack on the Profession; but I say that if medical men choose by their own act to rank themselves under the banner of vivisection, they must not expect that the fact of their being members of that Profession will save them from becoming involved in the same condemnation with vivisectioners. Another objection is raised by those who tell us that our demand for the total abolition of vivisection is Utopian, humanitarian, sentimental, and that our object is not within the range of practical legislation. If this means that because we cannot with absolute certainty stop cruelty in scientific research, therefore we ought not to forbid it by law, I reply that you do not argue in this fashion on other questions. Such an argument would be a bar to every attempt to repress crime by legislation. I look on this as a moral question. Vivisection is an immoral act, and therefore to be suppressed. It is as a moral question that I have taken this up: I say that whatever may be the reasons or the results which you can bring forward, unless it can be shown that the practice of torture is morally right, the Legislature is bound, if it deal with the subject at all, to prohibit it altogether; and I cannot abandon that ground. But when I examine the argument, irrespective of moral considerations, I contend that if the opposition to vivisection be well founded, it is no argument against legislation to say that we cannot entirely put it down, or that we shall thereby compel physiologists to visit other countries for their cruel experiments. I repeat, you do not argue in this fashion on other questions. Let me illustrate my position by reference to a crime created by law, not otherwise morally wrong, but inconvenient and injurious to the material interests of society, and consequently totally prohibitive. There is nothing morally wrong in making a model of a shilling or of a bank note, any more than in striking a medal, or in preparing a fac simile of Magna Charta. You do not inquire into the motive; you prohibit it because you feel that the interests of society require it, and you forbid the act absolutely, in spite of the circumstance that you may fail to prevent its commission, and that you may drive the skilled engraver, or the clever artizan, to practise his art in other countries. Sir, I do not say the cases are parallel, but I do say the argument is untenable in either case. Under this head I think I may properly notice the argument offered to the House last year by my hon. Friend the Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham), whom I regret not to see in his place. If I understand him aright, he urged that we are engaged in an Utopian scheme, and he remonstrated with me for attempting to reverse the course of nature. I understood him to argue thus—"Nature is cruel; the processes of Nature bring good out of evil; do not attempt to be wiser than Nature: be content to leave things as they are." I think my hon. Friend will see that if his argument were sound, nothing ought to be done to civilize the savage or to cultivate the earth: because Nature is savage and nature is wild. My hon. Friend would upset the whole course of modern civilization. I cannot think that he is of opinion that we live in a perfect world; nor would he sanction the doctrine that the disorders of the world are to be the measure of our duty and conduct. I submit that we live in a disordered world, that we are surrounded with evil, and in conflict with evil at every step, and that it is not the course of Nature, but the overruling providence of God, which brings good out of evil. Though we may not be able to account for the origin of evil, nor for the great amount of pain and suffering apparently unmerited which we see around us, surely we are not on that account to ignore it! We may not be able effectually to remedy it. Are we therefore to add to it? True,—the beasts prey one upon another; but I do not see how anyone can possibly justify the cruel acts of an intelligent, responsible man by a reference to the habits, instincts, and passions of the irresponsible beast. I submit that the civilization of which we boast is of a most imperfect type if it permits us to increase—nay, if it do not compel us to lessen, so far as we can, innocent suffering whether in man or beast. Let the guilty suffer, under a just sentence, according to their deserts, and in their case temper justice with mercy; but let innocence rejoice in the protection of a righteous law. Another allegation which I think I ought to notice, is that our statements are exaggerated. Whenever a vivisectioner meets with an exaggerated statement, he is perfectly justified in describing it as exaggerated. Sir, in this case there is no need for exaggeration. The facts are bad enough without exaggeration. I do not admit the justice of the charge made against us, though I admit that if our assertions be compared with those made by vivisectors, there is a wide difference; but I say that I have observed on the part of the advocates of vivisection a constant desire to extenuate their experiments and to magnify their results. It would appear from the statements of some persons, that the great work of physiological life in respect of vivisection, is to "scratch the tail of a tadpole," and that the result, in the vast majority of instances, is the prolongation of human life and the relief of suffering; the tadpole suffers little; mankind are vastly benefited. In reply to the charge of extravagance, I will simply turn to the Blue Book, and ask whether there has been anything charged against the cruel physiologists which its pages do not amply confirm? The experiments described and uncontradicted, described as performed in England, and admitted to be true, are sufficiently horrible to justify the public excitement which prevails. Take Mr. Wickham Legg's experiments on cats, and Dr. Rutherford's on dogs—are not they bad enough?—the latter of which, by the way, have been so pointedly condemned by a man of the highest scientific authority, Sir William Thomson, in a letter to The Scotsman. He says—

"Sir,—In your print of this morning I see a report of Professor Rutherford's paper on the secretion of bile, read at the meeting of the Royal Society yesterday evening, when, as President, I was in the chair. As chairman, I did not feel that I had the right to express my opinion that experiments involving such torture to so large a number of sentient and intelligent animals are not justifiable, by either the object proposed, or the results obtained or obtainable, by such an investigation as that described by Professor Rutherford. I feel this opinion very strongly after many years' serious consideration of the general question of the advisableness or justifiableness of experiments involving cruel treatment of the lower animals.

"University, Glasgow, March 6th, 1877."

Is it possible that there can be anything more shocking than the experiment spoken of by the late Sir William Fergusson. He says—

"I have reason to imagine that such sufferings incidental to such operations are protracted in a very shocking manner. I will give you an illustration of an animal being crucified for several days perhaps; introduced several times into a lecture room for the class to see how the experiment was going on."—[1037.]

I do not know what is learnt, I do not know what can be learnt, from an animal in such an unnatural condition; but I say that the thing is too horrible to admit of exaggeration; and that, be the results what they may, the experiment is unjustifiable. I do not think it possible that any graver charge can be brought against vivisectors than that which rests on the authority of Sir William Fergusson. We are told there is exaggeration. Is not the exaggeration on the other side? We hear it said again and again that experiments are performed under anæsthetics, and the public are led to believe that the animal in such cases is insensible to pain. Of course, an experiment may be commenced under anæsthetics; does anybody believe that an animal can be kept for three or four days under its influence? Is there no exaggeration here? I fear that those medical men are right who tell us that the anæsthetic is exhibited to narcotize public feeling rather than to relieve the suffering animal. But, Sir, I know I shall be told that we dealt with this subject last year, and that before we re-open it, we ought to wait to see how the Act works. This argument may satisfy those who want to get rid of an unpleasant subject, or who object to vivisection only in so far as they consider it is an abuse of a lawful practice; but those who regard the practice as unlawful in itself cannot rest content with an Act, however well it may work, which licences the abomination and can be made to protect the cruel experimenter. What are we to gain by waiting to see the working of the Act? Is it not clear that the Act will work as the Home Secretary works it? Is it not also evident that the mode of working the Act in one year, even in the hands of the same Minister, is no criterion how it will be worked in another year? Much less can it afford any evidence how the Act will be worked under a change of Government. Does anyone doubt that my right hon. Friend desires to work the Act from the humane point of view? For myself, though I lament that he has been persuaded to depart from the position he originally assumed, I do not expect to see any Home Secretary work the Act on more humane principles. Work it as well as he may, I am not satisfied to leave, even in the hands of my right hon. Friend, the power with which this Act entrusts him. I object to leave it in the power of any man to authorize the performance of the experiments described in the standard works for instruction and reference accepted in England. I object altogether that it should be in the power of any learned Corporation to issue certificates for such experiments. I think that our national character is at stake, and I desire to vindicate it without delay from all complicity with cruelty. But, Sir, I submit that we have seen enough already of the working of the Act to justify further legislation. The Return lately issued shows as much as my right hon. Friend's advisers think it expedient to reveal of the working of the Act. It gives us to understand that we must not expect full Returns, and that the Act is to be worked partly in the dark. We are not to know the number of applications, nor the names of the successful applicants, nor the terms and conditions of the licences. When it shows that no licences have been issued for the more painful experiments performable under the Act, it shows that the Act has done one piece of service—it has demonstrated that these experiments are not necessary, and might just as well have been prohibited altogether; but it reminds us that they are permitted under the Act, and that we must not rest until it is repealed. It shows that the system of licensing established last year was a system of secret licensing—a system at variance with the strongest feelings of the people and self-condemned, and that the shield of secrecy is required to protect the tender feelings of vivisectioners from the rough usage of public opinion. The Return shows further, that the licences issued are mainly for purposes of demonstration to students—the very thing which the public justly dread as likely to have a demoralizing effect. Remember, this implies the constant repetition of experiments from which nothing new is to be learnt—the demonstration of facts which can be described in print and illustrated by diagrams. Remember, this demonstration is employed in lectures, not exclusively addressed to medical students, but intended to form part of a course of general education; in lectures, too, which are attended by young ladies, who are thus receiving that higher education which is intended to raise them in the social scale—to perfect their womanly accomplishments. Remembering this, we regard the working of the Act with no satisfaction, and are ready to agree with Dr. Anthony, who thinks it a bad practice to permit vivisectional experiments for the purpose of demonstration; and with Dr. Haughton, who expresses an equally decided opinion in very strong language—

“I would shrink with horror from accustoming large classes of young men to the sight of animals under vivisection. I believe that many of them would become cruel and hardened, and would go away and repeat these experiments recklessly, without foresight or forethought; science would gain nothing, and the world would have let loose upon it a set of young devils.”—[1888.]

What a charming prospect for English society in the next generation! Does it not justify us in making a stand against this kind of education, and in seeking, without delay, to repeal an Act which works in this direction? The Return further discloses the fact that one of these licences is connected with the Gloucester County Asylum; one with the Glasgow Royal Infirmary; and others with London hospitals. This will not increase public satisfaction; but I shall return to this phase of the question in a few minutes. I maintain, Sir, that this Return ought to make my position stronger, and that when its full significance is understood, it will make the demand louder for the total prohibition of vivisection. Having thus replied to some preliminary objections, I will endeavour to deal with the question on its merits, and to grapple with the arguments by which the advocates of vivisection support their position. My position, in brief, is this—First, I regard the practice as morally wrong, and, therefore, to be forbidden; and in the next place, I submit that, whether you consider vivisection in itself to be lawful or unlawful, whether you deem it to be an abuse in itself, or only in so far as it is carried to excess, the evidence in the Blue Book shows that the only way effectually to stop the abuse is to prohibit the practice. Why should we not prohibit the practice? The advocates of vivisection assert that it is necessary for the progress of science—necessary for the relief of the suffering—and attended with beneficial results. I join issue with them, and assert that it is morally wrong—scientifically erroneous—socially dangerous. You tell me that vivisection is necessary. Before asking how you establish the necessity, I ask—Where do you get your authority to do what you like with the creatures placed in your power? I know you have the power; but right and power are not interchangeable terms. The exercise of power without right is selfish tyranny, and the only right which man possesses is that which the Creator has given him. He gave man the right to rule—but not with unlimited authority. You will search in vain for any right to torture. Many persons seem to think that if in the exercise of power which we possess we are guided by a benevolent motive, it is a lawful exercise of that power; but I submit that no motive can justify an immoral act. You may pity the man who steals a box of pills to relieve a suffering child, but you do not applaud the act or approve the man's moral perceptions, much less do you recognize the motive as a ground of exemption from prosecution. It must be a mistake to think that the civilization, which is very strict in requiring a recognition of the difference between mouse and man, ought to be indifferent to the cultivation of humanity, or to regard cruelty, even to an animal, as a venial sin, because perpetrated from a benevolent motive. But how do you establish the necessity which you allege to exist? Do you assert there is no other means by which medical knowledge can be advanced, and means discovered for the relief of human suffering? Turn to the Blue Book, and you will find the opinions of eminent medical men, expressed in no ambiguous terms, to the effect that they do not consider experiments on animals as the most important source of knowledge. Sir James Paget says [382]—

"I can quite believe that ardent physiologists put more trust in the experiments on living animals than I should; and certainly those studying therapeutics and diseases think more of them than I should. I think more of the advantage of clinical enquiry."

Dr. Acland says [957]—

"I do not think that for the purpose of advancing the knowledge of medicine, experiments on animals are the most important things."

Sir William Fergusson was asked [1100]—

"Have such experiments, in your opinion, had any direct bearing upon the progress of surgical practice?"

He replied—

"Well, I do not think it. I am as familiar as most people with these experiments, and I cannot say that I have been much impressed with the value of them."

But admitting that clinical and pathological observation in the human subject is the more important means for the advancement of medicine, can you show that vivisection is any means at all? You point to discoveries and results which some persons tell us are reckless assumptions. The discovery of the circulation of the blood has been adduced as an instance in point. Yet, what has Dr. Lauder Brunton lately said respecting Harvey's investigations? I take from The British Medical Journal, of 17th March last, an extract from Dr. Brunton's Goulstonian Lectures—

"Harvey himself was led to form his ideas regarding the course taken by the blood from the position of the valves in the veins, and might possibly have been able to describe it exactly, without making a single experiment."

You also bring forward Hunter's operation for the cure of aneurism. Dr. Macilwain said before the Royal Commission that this assertion is [1845] "entirely untrue," and Sir James Paget, in the Hunterian Oration delivered last February, is reported in the medical papers to have said, with reference to Hunter's scientific renown—

"No one seems to have known better than he did the danger of reasoning from physiology into practical surgery;"

and with especial reference to the operation for the cure of aneurism—

"This was no laborious result of physiological induction; it was a plain result of facts, collected in the wards and in the dead-house."

And so with other alleged discoveries. One witness says [5669]—"We have discovered the use of nitrite of amyl." Another replies—"It was nothing more than a happy guess."—[1781.] Whilst a doctor, to whom I have spoken on the subject, says—"Whatever may be its effects on animals, it has proved fatal to man." We hear a great deal of the value of experiments on guinea pigs as the cause of the success which has attended Mr. Spencer Wells in his celebrated operations. So far as I can learn, the facts do not bear out the statements made. In the first place, the operations on guinea pigs were not new—the facts had been ascertained 100 years ago by Richat on his dog. Upon that, however, I do not insist, as I do not admit that the success of Mr. Spencer Wells arises from vivisection in any degree. I rather urge that if these experiments on guinea pigs were of the value attributed to them, they ought to be of no less service to other operators in ovariectomy. But the fact is, that, though Mr. Spencer Wells only loses 22 per cent of patients, other surgeons lose 76 per cent. This satisfies me that the success of Mr. Spencer Wells is not to be attributed to experiments on animals, but to his own skill and care. Again;—I call attention to the action of the Medical Society of Victoria. They have lately, by a formal decision in solemn conclave, come to the conclusion, after 20 years' experience, that experiments on dogs, conducted to obtain an antidote to snake-bite, afford no clue to the action of remedies on man; and they have discontinued these experiments. You may point to the alleged valuable contributions to science made by the researches of Dr. Ferrier, with reference to the functions of the brain. Do you know that Dr. Brown-Sequard, one of the greatest of living vivisectioners and authorities on vivisection, has given details of cases so recently as last August, which prove that the teachings of vivisection on the functions of the brain and nerves are a tissue of mistakes created by vivisection, but rectified at last by correct clinical observation during life, and careful examination of diseased structures after death? Thus the sufferings of animals in these experiments have been wholly thrown away. I think I have said enough to throw doubt on the necessity for vivisection. I maintain that you have not yet established the necessity: but I go further, and maintain that it is scientifically erroneous and misleading—that it can be shown to be scientifically erroneous and misleading—and that, whether you regard the illogical mode of procedure, or the actual result to the human patient. Look for a moment at the course of procedure; I say a scientific enquiry ought to be conducted in a logical fashion. Tell me whether the rules of logic are not wholly disregarded by those who employ vivisection to advance medical science, and to relieve human suffering? Now, Sir, one of the objects for which vivisection has been employed, is to ascertain the action of drugs on the various organs of the human body. A physiologist desires to ascertain the action of a particular drug on, say, the liver of a man, for especial use, when that organ is diseased. Remember he is a scientific man; he is engaged in scientific research; he requires, above all things, accuracy in his conclusions; he ought, above all things, to be logical in his proceedings. He is most anxious not to take a leap in the dark, not to act the part of an empiric. A mistake may be attended with fatal results to the human patient whom he seeks to benefit. Surely such a man engaged in such an investigation ought to be logical in his procedure! How does he proceed? Of course, he secures a licence from the Home Secretary; then, as it seems to me, his mistakes begin. He takes a healthy dog, he subjects him—of course under anæsthetics—to the usual treatment. The body is cut open, the bile duct divided and brought to the outside; the drug is administered in the usual way; the result is carefully noted. When it is done, what have you got? When it has been repeated 100 times, what have you got? The results may not vary in the least, but what do they establish? They show the action of a certain drug on the liver of a healthy dog placed in an abnormal condition, and nothing more. Your experiment proves absolutely nothing as to the action of the drug on the liver of a sick dog—there may be conditions present which would vitiate the results—much less as to its action on the liver of a sick man. Yet you call this scientific investigation. Is it not beyond dispute that if you want to know the effect on man you must experiment on man? Dr. Rutherford admitted this to the Royal Commission. He said [2926]—"I experiment on dogs; I leave it to others to experiment on man." And Dr. Houghton illustrated the point forcibly by saying [1885] that—

"Notwithstanding the exhaustive series of experiments with reference to the action of mercury by the late Dr. Hughes Bennett, there is not a doctor in Europe or America who has altered his practice in treating congestion of the liver with blue pill."

Thus the hundreds and thousands of victims which have suffered at the hands of vivisectioners have suffered in vain, so far as any logical deduction is concerned.

You may have made some guesses at the truth, with apparent success in some cases, but you cannot deny that it may be the case when you come to apply your so-called results in practical medicine, you may do irreparable injury to hundreds of patients before you find out that your conclusions are mistaken. This attempt to escape from empiricism by a disregard of the rules of logic cannot inspire the public with any great amount of confidence in the medicine of the future. It is well for the patient class that the Faculty has enough common sense to disregard theory and trust to experience. This establishes my third point. I say vivisection is not only morally wrong, and scientifically erroneous, but it is socially dangerous. I mean it leads, it has led, to positive injury to the human patient. This is no imaginary idea. I will endeavour to prove my point by reference to the practice of two men who in former years were at the head of the Profession—Sir Astley Cooper and Mr. Travers. I have obtained my information from a book recently published by Dr. George Macilwain. [Vivisection. Hatchards, 1877.] Page 94—

“Sir Astley Cooper thought that when the neck of the thigh bone was fractured within the bag or capsule which encloses the joint of the hip, repair by bony union was impracticable. . . . To prove this, as he thought, he made some experiments . . . on dogs, and finding that the fractures he made in the thighs of dogs united only by ligaments, he regarded that as a confirmation of his doctrine. . . . Sir Astley Cooper was surgeon to one of the largest hospitals, and a leading teacher of surgery. Concluding that bony union could not be obtained in the cases referred to, he recommended and adopted a practice which rendered it impossible. Thus, when the patient had been in bed for a fortnight or so, . . . he recommended him to rise and use a crutch, which necessarily involved lameness for life. The lamentable result . . . can only be estimated by considering what might have been the number of cases confided to his care, besides those to such of his pupils . . . who . . . would adopt the practice of their distinguished teacher.”

“The very measure which Mr. Travers was led to recommend to combat the peritonitis (in the operation for strangulated hernia) was exactly that it was most dangerous to employ. . . . [Page 106.] I believe that no more disastrous error ever proceeded from vivisection than the one in question; and whether Mr. Travers’ treatment proceeded from what he did in his operations, or from what he neglected to do, it still illustrates the misleading character of vivisection, to which there always seems more or less tendency, inseparable from that mode of investigation.”

Here, then, we have definite instances, brought to our notice by a medical man, of the socially dangerous effects of vivisection. I believe it to have another effect equally dangerous. It encourages experiments on man, and that, I much fear, for the purpose of demonstration as well as in the interest of science. I speak on the authority of an eye witness who has seen two things done in an hospital for the purpose of demonstration without regard to the pain inflicted on the patient. One is the rubbing together the ends of a broken bone to afford an illustration of what is termed crepitation. A doctor was passing through the wards with his class of students; they came to a man whose leg had been broken and not yet set; the doctor rubbed the ends of the bone together to let his pupils hear the sound. When he passed on to the next case, the young men repeated the operation for their own instruction or amusement—say, in the interest of science—and when the patient screamed and writhed in agony, the doctor only cried—“Hold him down, hold him down!” Another instance given to me, also by an eye witness, is found in the case of a patient suffering from a dislocation of the wrist. One of the characteristics of this injury is that it is necessary, when the dislocation has been reduced, to retain the bones in their proper places by splints and bandages, otherwise it will recur. In the case in question, the wrist of the patient was set, but not bandaged in order that the dislocation might recur, for the purpose of demonstration to the class of students; and I am told that the pain the patient would suffer in the interest of science is extremely severe. There is another instance which I cannot pass over; an instance reported in The Lancet on the 20th and 27th of last January. The Glasgow Royal Infirmary figures in the recent Return as a place in which they are engaged in the pursuit of science, and apparently they are not very particular as to the means they employ, so when they get an opportunity of dealing with a case of human hydrophobia, they disregard the established rules of practice in their eager search after knowledge. I shall put the facts more briefly before the House by reading a letter which appeared in The Lancet of January 27th on the subject. I understand the fact of the dog passing through the ward has been explained by the Secretary to the Infirmary to have been an accident. I accept the explanation, but, I say, that had such an accident happened in the wards of a homœopathic, hydropathic, or mesmeric hospital, the carelessness of the authorities would have been most loudly denounced in the medical journals. The letter in The Lancet is to the following effect:—

"Sir,—I have read with astonishment a case of hydrophobia in the Glasgow Royal Infirmary in your impression of to-day. I will not now discuss the question of the case being hydrophobia or not. But I will ask, how came a dog to be allowed to pass into the chamber of a man in the state there described? Was it for experiment, or was it accidental? If for experiment, God grant the Vivisection Act may protect our species. If accidental, it is to be blamed in no measured terms. . . . I quote your correspondent's words:—'When seen at midday, the hope was expressed that the symptoms, whatever was their origin, were passing off, and that the patient was in a fair way towards recovery. At 3.30 p.m., an event took place which completely and suddenly altered the aspect of the case. While the patient was lying, to all appearance, calmly in bed, a dog passed through the room, and was seen by him. Immediately thereafter he started up in bed, with his arms extended, and his eyes staring, his whole countenance indicating intense horror. He jumped out of bed, and, in attempting to climb over the screen, fell upon the floor; there he lay for a few minutes, groaning and talking, and tossing his limbs about.' Again—'Pouring from one vessel to another did not produce any effect; upon a few drops being sprinkled upon his face, the same sobbings were performed, and he complained of such a low trick being done upon him.' Again I quote the words of the article—'For a short time there seemed to be a lucid interval, in which, in pitiful tones of voice, he asked those around him to take him up into some quiet room, and have an end made of him. This period of repose did not last long; for in a few minutes, after being breathed upon and fanned with a towel, he became again incoherent and maniacal.' And once again—'While standing behind him and out of his sight, I blew my breath once or twice upon the neck and face, when at once the muscles of the neck and of the upper and lower extremities became rigid, and the diaphragm acted spasmodically: the spasm was not followed by a second, without he was again provoked.'

"ARTHUR RICHARDSON, M.R.C.S."

I make no comment on this shocking case. I simply quote the words of a medical man who has written with reference to it—

Mr. Holt

"These Glasgow cases demonstrate that the practice of cruel experimentation on the lower animals leads, as a matter of course and of necessity, to disregard all human suffering; and they show, beyond all question, what medical practice, under the influences that exist and are daily extending, with the sanction and approval of the most eminent members of the medical schools, will assuredly become, in hospitals and out of them, if the public does not interfere to prevent it."

This makes the subject one of an eminently practical character. The question must become one of intense interest to the humbler classes, who in their hours of pain and weakness are treated in hospitals and county asylums. Your licences are some of them associated with these places. The names of the men are not given. May not the patients justly feel alarmed lest they should fall into the hands of some reckless experimenter? The course of our practice in sanitary regulations is to separate from their friends, and to isolate persons suffering from infectious disease. We send them to be treated in special hospitals. Is it not a matter of the very gravest importance to the country that no suspicion should be permitted to attach to those institutions? Remember, they will hereafter be placed under the charge of men who have been trained in the schools of vivisectional demonstration, for which you are now issuing your licences; and I cannot feel indifferent to the fact, broadly stated by Dr. Moxon, in the Hunterian Oration for the present year, that, under our modern system—

"There is growing up a generation of physicians who are so imbued with the scientific spirit as absolutely to forget, in the highest issues, that their Profession has any practical aim."—[Medical Times and Gazette, March 3rd, 1877.]

This is no light and trifling matter. I regard it as a question of the gravest import, which demands the most careful consideration of Parliament. How does the matter stand? Some persons are seeking to justify cruelty, that they may gain knowledge, and the knowledge, when gained, has not necessarily any practical aim. We have passed an Act which legalizes cruelty with this object, and I conceive our first duty ought to be to recognize that we have not gone far enough, and to replace the Act of last year by a more thorough measure. I know that with the momentous issues which now engage public attention, this subject may easily be put aside, but I claim a place for it amongst the important social questions of the day. I ask hon. Members not to put it aside as disagreeable and troublesome, but to regard it as a question of importance; "as a question," to quote words better than any of my own, lately written to a friend by a general officer, well known to many sportsmen in this House—

"That undeniably affects our national character, and which ought not to be treated with careless indifference. It is right or wrong. Let every reflecting individual take a part in the matter; seek for information, and make up his mind to uphold or oppose the practice."

We demand the absolute prohibition of vivisection. We believe that nothing short of that will cure the evil and vindicate our national character. The well-being of society demands that cruelty shall be punished by law, not merely in the humbler and less educated classes, but amongst the learned, the refined, and the powerful. Our moral perceptions demand, the true interests of science demand, the well-being of society demands, that good motives shall not be permitted in this country to extenuate bad actions—that results shall not be accepted irrespective of the means by which they are attained. I desire to see vivisection banished from this country as a relic of our savage nature, a practice of a barbarous age, inconsistent with our Christian profession, a disgrace to true science, and a blot upon our civilization. I beg to move the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Holt.)

DR. CAMERON in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, he did not object in any way to the amendment of Martin's Act, but he did object to the proposal to interfere with vivisection as regulated by the Act of last year. The hon. Member for North-East Lancashire (Mr. Holt), in attempting to legislate upon the subject, had introduced about as crude and unworkable a measure as it was possible for the mind of man to conceive. This did not arise from any want of study, because the hon. Member appeared to have been applying his mind to the question for a considerable time. In 1875 the hon. Member had joined the Society for the Suppression of Vivisection, and in the autumn of that year he gave evidence before the Royal Commission. In the course of his evidence, he stated that up to that time he had paid little or no attention to the details of the subject. He had intended to do so, but had been prevented by illness. He had had time enough, however, to discover that the affairs of the society were in a very bad condition, and that the society in reality consisted of a secretary, who expressed as the views of the society whatever he chose to state, without summoning any meeting of a regular committee. This gentleman declined to have his accounts audited, and the hon. Member (Mr. Holt) stated himself that he was determined either to reform the society, or to retire from it. The hon. Member received one lesson on the subject of vivisection from the Commission, but he (Dr. Cameron) was sorry to see that it had already been forgotten. After informing the Commission that he had made no particular study of the matter, the hon. Member quoted as an illustration of the uselessness of vivisection, the fact that Harvey's great discovery of the circulation of the blood was not due to that practice. The hon. Member quoted this on some second-hand authority, as he had done in his speech to-day. "Well," said one of the Commissioners (Professor Huxley), "have you acquainted yourself with the original writings of this author?" "No," returned the hon. Member. "Then allow me to read this passage to you from Harvey's works," and Professor Huxley read the following:—

"When I first gave my mind to vivisections as a means of discovering the motions and uses of the heart, and sought to discover there from actual inspection, and not from the writings of others, I found the task so truly arduous, so full of difficulty, that I was almost tempted to think with Fracastorius, that the motion of the heart was only to be comprehended by God."

And then a little farther on—

"At length, and by using greater and daily diligence, having frequent recourse to vivisections, employing a variety of animals for the purpose, and collecting numerous observations, I thought that I had attained to the truth."

"These," said Professor Huxley, "are Harvey's own words, and I presume you will modify the opinion you have expressed." The hon. Member replied, "My opinion is based on a statement of Boyle's, which I have read." Yet notwithstanding that lesson which the hon. Member then received, he had again fallen into the same mistake to-day regarding Harvey's discovery. Before the Commission the hon. Member explained that his objection to the practice of vivisection was that it did not come within the grant of the lower animals to man made by the Almighty. He did not think sporting justifiable, but he would not interfere with it by legislation, because it was connected in some degree with the question of the supply of food. In regard to vivisections in connection with farming operations, he did not propose to interfere with the mutilations of domestic animals which took place, because he said he considered there must be some good reason for the practice adopted with respect to lambs, calves, pigs, &c., or otherwise it would not prevail so extensively. The only point on which the hon. Member expressed any distinct or decided conviction was in regard to the excision of the ovaries in sows, a practice which he unreservedly condemned. He wound up his evidence by saying that so repulsive to him was vivisection, that if he was seriously ill and his only chance of recovery was to employ a practitioner who had obtained his knowledge of his disease through vivisection, he would do so with great reluctance, and if he had a relative placed in a similar position he would not employ such a practitioner at all. [Mr. Holt: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member said "Hear, hear!" but this protestation of the hon. Member of his readiness to sacrifice his friends to his convictions reminded him (Dr. Cameron) of nothing so much as the manner in which Artemus Ward had vindicated his reputation for patriotism when it was called in question during the American War—namely, by protesting his readiness to sacrifice his brothers-in-law and every other male relative to the conscription, provided only he was allowed to remain at home. The Bill which the hon. Member introduced last year upon the subject had at least the merit of being intelligible. That Bill provided that—

"It should not be lawful to perform any experiments of any kind causing, or of a nature to cause, pain or disease in any animal, or to cut or wound any living animal except for the purpose of killing any animal, or alleviating or curing any disease from which such animal was suffering, or performing any operation required to render any such animal better suited for the service of man, or ascertaining, in pursuance of a judicial inquiry, and by direction of the Secretary of State, and under such regulations as he might prescribe, the nature or operations of any supposed poison for which there was no known chemical test: Provided always,—that it should be an offence for a person to treat any animal with wanton cruelty, or to subject it to unnecessary suffering."

The Times, commenting upon that Bill, said—

"As for Mr. Holt's Bill, physiologists will probably be glad to see it, for the absurdity of the position taken up by the author was transparent. He would have no operations on animals for the alleviation of human suffering, but he would permit the performing of any operation to render animals better suited for the service of man, in health, of course. These operations might be of any sort, performed by any one, however unskilled, and without the use of anaesthetics. Could any proposal be more ridiculous? and yet it was seriously printed and laid on the Table of Parliament."

He (Dr. Cameron) presumed it was in order to meet comments of that kind that the hon. Member had this year modified his Bill, and had cut out the express provision legalizing the forms of agricultural vivisection. But in doing so, the hon. Member had provided only for the punishment of wanton cruelty inflicted on any vertebrate animal, while he had absolutely prohibited experiments for purposes of scientific research. The effect of this provision in the Bill of this year was precisely the same, therefore, in effect as the specific provision in the Bill of last year, because no magistrate would convict any man of wanton cruelty who merely performed cutting operations upon living animals for the purpose of rendering them more suitable for the service of man. The hon. Member had not ventured to state that the Report of the Royal Commission went in the teeth of the evidence. But once admit that the Report of the Commission was in accordance with the evidence, and all the extracts given by the hon. Member from the answers of individual witnesses to isolated questions simply tended to show these isolated statements had been refuted by the great balance of evidence. The Report of the Royal Commission was, on the whole, a wise Report, and the Government last year introduced a Bill embodying the recommendations contained in that Report, and passed them into law. The Bill of the Government was open to certain theoretical objections; but, practically, it did everything required to remove all the evils that were formerly alleged to exist. The Act provided that no experiment should henceforth be performed on animals except by a person licensed by the Home Secretary, and for the advancement of physiological knowledge; that experiments should then be performed only under the influence of anæsthetics, except on the production of a special certificate that the use of anæsthetics would nullify the results it was hoped to obtain. Curare, about the action of which some doubt existed, was not to be deemed an anæsthetic; animals were to be killed before recovering consciousness; and no experiment was to be performed without anæsthetics on a dog, cat, horse, ass, or mule, except on special certificate that no other animal was available for such experiment. Judges in criminal cases might order experiments in cases where they were necessary for the detection of crime, and the Secretary of State was empowered to require details to be furnished of all experiments. The results of the working of the Act during the last six months had, as he would show in a few minutes, been perfectly satisfactory. But, before proceeding to that point, he should like to point out another mistake into which the hon. Member had fallen. He had dwelt upon the revolting effect which the performance of these experiments would have upon certain classes of young ladies before whom, he said, they were performed. Why, the Act of last year positively prohibited experiments upon living animals being made before the general public at all. A Return, to which the hon. Member alluded in the course of his speech, had recently been published as to the working of the Vivisection Act, and it showed that 23 certificates had been issued under that Act during the six months it had been in operation, and that in only one case had a licence been granted permitting experiments without anæsthetics. Even in that case, the licence was subject to the proviso that the Inspector should be satisfied within a moderate time that the experiments themselves were not of a nature calculated to inflict pain. At the present moment, therefore, there was not a single licence existing for any experiment calculated to inflict pain except under the influence of anæsthetics. Not a single certificate had been issued dispensing with the obligation of killing the animal before it recovered consciousness. There again, however, the hon. Member had gone wrong, and had dwelt upon the great sufferings experienced by the animals in recovering. At the present moment, hon. Members would see the walls placarded with illustrations of dogs and cats writhing in torture undergoing vivisection, and this despite the fact that not a single certificate had been issued under the Act of last Session permitting any painful experiments upon these animals. Meanwhile the hon. Member, without waiting for the Return, and not knowing how the Act was working, brought in his Bill, which repealed the Act of last Session, prohibited wanton cruelty generally, but in doing so excepted sporting, and agricultural vivisections, which would be allowed to go on unheeded, because they did not come under the head of wanton cruelty. In the present Bill, as compared with that introduced last year, there was one very important and deliberate omission. Last year the hon. Member provided that experiments should be lawful if they were necessary for the purpose of furthering the ends of justice, such as the detection of poison; but this year the hon. Member withdrew that exception from the Bill, and as the measure now stood, if it were passed to-morrow, and a man were poisoned with strychnine or some other poison difficult of detection, it would be unlawful to make any experiment, even if such experiment were necessary, in order to prove that a murder had been committed. He was satisfied there was no chance of a Bill like this being allowed to pass, but its introduction had been made to serve as an excuse for a renewed agitation on the subject. He protested against the unfair manner in which that agitation had been conducted, and the reckless fashion in which charges had been scattered about. The hon. Member had referred to certain experiments which were stated to have been made in the hospitals, and instanced a case in which a patient suffering from a fracture had been ordered by a surgeon to be forcibly held down, in order that the students might one after another familiarize themselves with the crepitus produced by rubbing the ends of the broken bone together. Now he (Dr. Cameron) did not believe in that case. At all events, the law provided amply at present against any such outrage or assault. The same remark would apply to the case in which it was alleged that a surgeon had allowed a re-dislocation of the wrist, in order that he might demonstrate the accident to his class. If the hon. Member was possessed of the real facts of the case, and they were as stated, there could not be the smallest difficulty in punishing the surgeon who was guilty of such inhumanity. He should like to say a word or two as to what had occurred at the Glasgow Royal Infirmary. The hon. Member led the House to infer that there was some connection between the cruelty alleged to have been carried on in the case to which he had referred, and the fact that a licence for experiments on animals had been granted to Glasgow Infirmary. The simple explanation of the fact would be found in this—that there was a medical school attached to the Glasgow Royal Infirmary. As to the proceedings in regard to the case of hydrophobia, he had unfortunately not got details by him, because he did not see what possible connection the incident had with vivisection; but he had a strong impression that the surgeon under whose charge the case occurred had been able to explain the whole matter in a satisfactory manner, and to show that there had been gross exaggeration and misrepresentation in regard to it. He knew that the whole circumstances had been brought before the Governors of the Royal Infirmary, and that it was found that nothing had occurred more censurable than carelessness in allowing a dog to run through the Infirmary. So far as he remembered the explanation, everything that took place in the way of experiment took place before the nature of the disease was ascertained, and was undertaken in order that the nature of the disease might be determined. Hydrophobia did not occur, even in such a large institution, once in 10 years, and it was necessary to make some tests or experiments to ascertain the exact symptoms, in order to determine what the disease was. The hon. Member said that, “as might have been expected after such treatment the patient did not recover.” He (Dr. Cameron) never heard yet of a patient affected with hydrophobia who did recover; the patient invariably died; so that the death which occurred in this case had nothing to do with the matter. To show the reckless manner in which charges against the medical profession had been made, he might refer to the evidence given by the Secretary of the society—Mr. Jesse—who charged Professor Huxley with encouraging vivisection, because he had published a handbook of physiology for the use of schools, in which, to make his explanations the more effective, he used a very common, though a slightly figurative, form of phraseology. “Take, for example,” he said, “an animal, cut its spinal cord, and pinch its foot, and such and such phenomena will occur.” “What,” said Mr. Jesse, pointing to such a passage, “could be more conclusive as proof that Professor Huxley inculcates the practice of vivisection upon the boys and girls for whom his work is written?” Professor Huxley replied—

“Well, let us take another passage of the book; for example, this—‘If the upper arm of a man, whose arm is stretched out, be tightly grasped by another person, the latter, as the man bends up his forearm, will feel a great soft mass, which lies at the fore part of the upper arm, swell, harden, and become prominent. As the arm is extended again the swelling and hardness vanish. On removing the skin, the body which thus changes its configuration is found to be a mass of red flesh sheathed in connective tissue.’ Are you of opinion that that passage suggests that boys and girls should remove the skin from one another’s arms?” “I do not know,” replied Mr. Jesse, “I never thought of it before. I should like to take it home and look it over.” “The book is accessible to you,” retorted Mr. Huxley. “I now take you to page 16 of the same work—‘Let any person in the erect position receive a violent blow on the head, and you know what occurs. On the instant he drops prostrate in a heap, with his limbs relaxed and powerless.’ Do you think that that is an encouragement to boys and girls to knock one another on the head?” “I do not know,” was Mr. Jesse’s reply, “It has rather a tendency that way, I should think, if they are experimentally inclined.”

He (Dr. Cameron) did not know whether any hon. Members from the sister Island were present; but if there were, and there was anything in the argument of Mr. Jesse, he thought he ought not to have read the extract. Mr. Jesse went farther in his misrepresentations. Without a shadow of proof he accused various hospitals of misappropriating funds which ought to be applied to the treatment of patients to the purposes of vivisection, and he now charged the hon. Member for North-East Lancashire with misappropriating the funds of the Anti-Vivisection Society. A hand-bill had been issued by Mr. Jesse with reference to the action by that hon. Gentleman in connection, he (Dr. Cameron) presumed, with the reformation of the society which the hon. Member had promised to undertake. A portion of it, printed in red ink, ran in these words—

"The taxed costs saddled upon you by Messrs. James Maden Holt, M.P., Harrison, and Bagshawe exceed £600. Though the Chancery suit was never authorized by the subscribers, and was persisted in against the expressed desire of the most munificent and a large majority of the known members of the society, nevertheless, Messrs. J. M. Holt, M.P., Harrison, and Bagshawe do not consent to pay one farthing of the above costs."

More unkind still, Mr. Jesse proceeded to turn the hon. Member into ridicule by publishing a number of extracts from the evidence given by him before the Royal Commission, concluding with the extract from The Times, which he (Dr. Cameron) had quoted, and which stigmatized the Bill of the hon. Member as "utterly ridiculous," and stated that physiologists would probably be glad to see it. Since the days when the hon. Member for North Warwickshire accused another hon. Member of being a Jesuit in disguise, there had not been, in Parliamentary experience, anything to equal these re-creminations. The funds of the society were now free, and they were being devoted to disfiguring the walls with pictures and disseminating misleading handbills containing gross misrepresentations as to the real opinions of the persons quoted, with regard to vivisection, Sir Thomas Watson was quoted as saying that an experiment at the time of an animal being insensible was really of little or no value. Did that mean that Sir Thomas Watson was a supporter of the Bill of the hon. Member? What Sir Thomas Watson did before the Commission was to give examples of important results which had been obtained from vivisection; and to protest against its incautious restriction. Sir William Fergusson, it was true, thought that the results attributable to vivisection had been greatly exaggerated; but, far from denying that very important results had been obtained, he admitted that these results were of the greatest value, and so little did he approve of the proposition of the hon. Member that he was opposed to any legislation that would trammel scientific men, and suggested that a strong expression of the Commissioners' opinion would be sufficient. Dr. Acland, so far from supporting the hon. Member's proposition, pointed out that observation of the living structures had revolutionized old theories of animal economy, and urged that while incompetent persons should be restrained from making such observations, public opinion was generally sufficient in other cases. Dr. Taylor was also quoted as against these experiments, but his evidence was to the directly contrary effect. Before the Commission he pointed out that experiments were useful for the discovery of antidotes, and, that as new drugs were continually being found, they were necessary for discovering their properties. Again, he pointed out that when chemistry failed to detect a poison, it might be necessary to apply part of the substance said to have produced death to a living subject. Not merely had he repeated these misstatements contained in the society's handbills, but the hon. Member had fallen into other mistakes in the same direction, especially in reference to Sir James Paget and Professor Houghton. From the official summary of the evidence given before the Commission, which had just been published, he found that Sir James Paget stated that experiments on animals were often necessary in cases of novel inquiry, and that he gave a number of instances of their utility. As to Professor Houghton, that gentleman undoubtedly gave some strong evidence against the state of things which existed previously to the passing of the Act of last year; but what he advocated was the regulation, not the abolition, of vivisection. And if hon. Members would turn to the abstract of his evidence they would find that it contained one of the strongest practical arguments which could be desired against the proposal before the House. They would find that Professor Houghton had himself made some experiments upon frogs, which demonstrated the antagonistic actions of nicotine and strychnine, and that in consequence of the publication of the result of these experiments in America, nicotine was tried as an antidote in a case of strychnine poisoning in the human subject "and proved, as it had since done in five or six cases, successful." Thus, these experiments which Professor Haughton himself had undertaken upon frogs, had been instrumental in saving several lives. The amount of vivisection practised in this country was extremely small, and the vivisections which did occur in the country were, as was shown in the Return, entirely painless. There was not a single experiment that was not performed under anæsthetics, and there was not a single case in which the animal had not been killed before its recovery. Even before the passing of the Act of last year the extent of these experiments had been grossly exaggerated. One of the gentlemen whose name had been held up to loudest execration by the anti-vivisectionists was Dr. Klein, who had conducted for the Privy Council investigations into the transmissibility of tubercular or consumptive diseases, and researches into the nature of some of the contagious diseases of cattle. The important facts brought to light by Dr. Klein's investigations afforded ample justification for them. And what was the amount of animal suffering which he had inflicted, and which had brought upon him all this odium? In the course of a year's lectures he used, for purposes of demonstration, according to his evidence, 10 or 12 animals, mostly frogs, no dogs, and possibly one kitten. In his Privy Council experiments with reference to zymotic and epizootic diseases, three monkeys, three dogs, two cats, and four white mice had been used. The experiments, so far as the monkeys were concerned, consisted in giving them infected food, and as the result was to show that the disease experimented on was incapable of being produced in them, the experiment did them not the slightest harm. [Mr. Holt: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member said "Hear, hear;" but it seemed to him that the monkeys had decidedly the best of it in that experiment. The suffering inflicted on the animals used in these experiments was a mere drop in the ocean as compared with that daily inflicted for agricultural and sporting purposes. If the promoters of this movement wished to illustrate the walls with horrors, they should represent surgical operations on mankind before chloroform was discovered. The hon. Gentleman had for a wonder abstained from following the usual practice of anti-vivisectionists, and denying that experiments upon animals had anything to do with the discovery of chloroform. They were in the habit of asserting that this discovery had been brought about by means of experiments instituted by Professor Simpson on himself and his assistants, forgetting apparently that these were animals of a very important class. To show, however, the value of experiments on the lower animals, even in connection with this discovery, he might mention an incident which had been narrated to him by his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair). That right hon. Gentleman was Professor of Chemistry at the time when Dr. Simpson was conducting his researches into the properties of anæsthetics, and he was in the habit of supplying him with such chemical products as Dr. Simpson thought from analogy might be possessed of anæsthetic properties. On one occasion he obtained from him some bi-bromide of methylene, and before proceeding to test its properties upon himself, administered some to some rabbits. The result was apparently most satisfactory; anæsthesia was speedily produced, and the animals recovered without sickness or other bad effect. It was resolved that on the following day Professor Simpson should try the drug himself, and he was about to do so when some one suggested that before proceeding with the experiment they should see how the rabbits were getting on. On visiting them it was found that they had all died during the night. The agent, though apparently harmless, was possessed of deadly properties, and he need hardly say that, under the circumstances, Professor Simpson did not proceed with the experiment upon himself. In this case the life of the discoverer of chloroform—a life the value of which to humanity could not be over-estimated—had, in all probability, been saved by an experiment involving the sacrifice of a few rabbits. The introducer of the Bill had contested the assertion that Hunter's operation for the cure of aneurism was due to his experiments upon animals. Whether Hunter had, in the first place, been led to adopt the correct system by pure inductive reasoning, or through his experiments, he (Dr. Cameron) would not stop to argue, but this was clear—that Hunter had had extensive recourse to experiment in the course of his investigations; and that, without the aid of the facts elicited by these experiments, his operation, though it might have been discovered, would not have been established as the practice of surgery. The hon. Member for North-East Lancashire was particularly unfortunate in his selection of the arterial system as his battleground on which to combat the utility of vivisection, for there was no part of the human economy for our knowledge of which we were more clearly indebted to experiments upon animals, than the arterial system. It was by means of vivisection that Galen discovered that arteries were filled with blood, and not with air as was previously supposed. As they had seen, it was to vivisection that Harvey was indebted for the discovery of the circulation of the blood. The present system of tying arteries in operations was the result of experiments on animals made by Mr. Jones. Previous to these experiments, surgeons, in tying arteries, took the greatest care not to cut or bruise them for fear of inducing secondary hæmorrhage; but, in spite of all their precautions, the loss of life by secondary hæmorrhage was very great. Mr. Jones, however, discovered by means of his experiments, that if you wished to secure an artery properly, instead of dealing with it too tenderly you must tie it so tightly as to cut its inner coat. He found that if this were done, nature at once set up a reparative process, and secondary hæmorrhage became a rare complication. Again, within the last few years, by means of experiments on animals, Professor Lister had elaborated a most important improvement in the practice of ligaturing arteries. In many cases of operation a fatal irritation was kept up in the wound by the ends of the ligatures used, which had to be left hanging out of the wound until the arteries which they tied sloughed through, and allowed of their removal. Professor Lister, by means of experiments upon calves and other animals, discovered that a ligature prepared with carbolic acid might be cut off short and left to be dealt with by nature—that it gave rise to no abscess or suppuration, but became encapsuled in the surrounding tissue, and in course of time absorbed. Turning from the surgery of the arteries, however, let them look at numberless diseases to which mankind was subjected, and they would find that some of their most valuable knowledge was due to experiments upon the lower animals. Look, for example, at diseases produced by internal parasites. The subject was too technical to enter minutely into in that place; but for all their knowledge of the nature and causes of those diseases and their mode of prevention, they were indebted to such experiments. Then look at cholera. They had not been able to discover any cure for that fell disease, but they had discovered what was almost equally important—the agency by which it was disseminated, and the means to prevent its spread. They had found out the terrible danger which lurked in apparently inoffensive dejecta of cholera patients, and the subtle manner in which these colourless excretions might poison our wells and rivers and convert our sewage system into a hotbed of disease. And how had this important knowledge, which enabled them to combat an epidemic with intelligence and to guard against it with success—how had it been gained? By means of experiments on animals—chiefly white mice. He had a long list of other discoveries in medicine and surgery for which they were indebted to experiments on animals, but he would not weary the House by referring to them further. [Cries of "Go on."] Well, he might refer to the operation of the transfusion of blood—the history of the discovery of vaccination—the practice of resecting joints. By means of experiments on animals it was shown that if a joint were cut out and the limb treated in a certain way, nature would supply a new joint and the utility of the limb remain very little impaired. Consequently in numerous cases of diseases or injuries of joints, where formerly a limb would have been amputated, the operation of resection was practised, and the patient when cured retained a very useful limb. In the same way it had been demonstrated that the periosteum or membraneous sheath of bone was endowed with the capacity of secreting and regenerating bony tissues, and in many operations involving the excision of diseased bone, the periosteum was now preserved under such conditions as enabled the bone which had perished to be restored. In his Bill of last year the hon. Member had made an exception in favour of experiments on animals undertaken for the purpose of furthering the ends of justice. That exception he had now, however, deliberately cut out. It might, therefore, be well to remind them that the murder by Palmer, which created so much sensation in the country some years ago, was brought home to him chiefly by means of experiments upon frogs. The case, too, against Dr. Pritchard, of Glasgow, who poisoned his wife and his mother-in-law, would, in all probability, have fallen through, had it not been for a series of experiments on animals, instituted by Dr. Penny, which conclusively established his guilt. Turning to the brighter side of the picture, he would refer to the evidence of Dr. Taylor before the Commissioners to show that if experiments were sometimes necessary in order to send men to the gallows, they might be useful in saving men from it. Dr. Taylor mentioned the case of a child which died of symptoms of poisoning, and a post mortem examination resulted in the detection of arsenic in the stomach. The mother was arrested for the murder of her child; but Dr. Taylor and Dr. Pavy investigated the case, and found that the child was suffering from ringworm, and had been treated with an ointment which contained arsenic. By experiments on living animals Dr. Taylor and Dr. Pavy discovered that arsenic being readily absorbed by the skin, traces of it could be found in the stomach in a few hours after it had been applied externally, and by that means the woman, who might otherwise have been consigned to the gallows, was sent forth to the world without a stain upon her character. As he had said, there was not the smallest chance of the present Bill being allowed to pass; and, under ordinary circumstances, he would not have troubled himself to expose the inconsistency of the well-intentioned hobby-mongers who, pursuing the shadowy horrors which they supposed to be flitting about in the 23 licensed physiological laboratories, left unheeded the thousand instances of needless suffering inflicted every day under their very noses, in the shamble, on the moor, and in the farmyard. But while he had simply wondered at the infatuation of a Gentleman who, holding it within the grant by God of the lower animals to man, to mutilate them, to hunt them, and to shoot them down, regarded it as contrary to that grant to sacrifice a few rabbits, white mice, or guinea pigs, for the purposes of acquiring knowledge which might prevent the spread of an epidemic, which might enable the surgeon to save a hundred limbs, or which might rescue the suspected murderer from the gallows—while he should have simply smiled at such infatuation, and the measure in which such ideas were embodied, in view of the agitation that was attempted to be got up under cover of the Bill, and the misrepresentations which were rife on the subject, he had considered it his duty to come forward and explain what appeared to him the real merits of the case and the real nature of the question at issue. He would conclude by moving the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Dr. Cameron.)

MR. HARDCASTLE supported the second reading of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Dr. Cameron) had endeavoured to meet the case by citing instances which he (Mr. Harcastle) would admit did not involve any very great suffering, and in which humanity had benefited from experiments made upon the inferior animals, but he entirely overlooked the real point at issue, which was whether those Professors who had recourse to vivisection for the illustration of their teaching could be trusted to keep within the bounds of moderation. To show the length to which some experimentalists would go, he would refer to the fact that in France, where the practice existed, it had been carried to such an extent that those who practised it had become quite callous as regarded the torture to which they subjected the animals on which they experimented. The Report of the Royal Commission bore out the assertion that there had, too, been several instances of the same thing in this country, and it was one of the great difficulties in dealing with this subject that the details were of so painful and revolting a character that it was almost impossible to get persons to listen to them with patience. He would only quote one or two cases mentioned in the Report to show to what lengths the practice had been carried in France, and by Professors and even students in this country. In one instance a celebrated French experimentalist had run red-hot irons into the anterior lobes of the brain of a dog; but, to use his own words, although he beat it severely to keep it quiet afterwards, the animal raised such piteous cries that, for the sake of the neighbours, he was obliged to destroy it "after some days." The same operator cut open a bitch, and while she was lying in torture brought to her her pups, which, notwithstanding her agony, she began to fondle and lick. Another dog, after being cruelly tortured, managed to escape, and sought to propitiate his tormentor by placing his paws upon his shoulders and licking his face, but in vain; he was strapped down again, and the torture continued. But such atrocities were not confined to France. At St. Bartholomew's Hospital 16 cats were cut open while under chloroform, their biliary ducts were tied, and they were allowed to remain in that miserable condition until they died, which in some cases was not for three weeks. Evidence was given that medical students, too, sometimes performed experiments upon live animals, apparently for amusement, for nothing new resulted from their inexperienced researches. With regard to the argument put forward by Professor Huxley, that none but men of science had a right to form an opinion upon this matter, he ridiculed it. He believed that these learned Professors could not safely be trusted with the powers they claimed with reference to this subject. It was impossible to know to what extent they would go. Under the present Home Secretary there was some guarantee that the experiments would not be carried to excess; but some day we might have some admirer of those scientific men for Home Secretary, and then God help all the poor dogs and cats of London! A dog was a most intelligent animal. His sense—it was more than instinct—soon detected what was going on, and there could be no doubt that when dogs were put in a place for the purpose of vivisection, and one of them after another was taken away, the remaining dogs, scenting blood, suffered in anticipation the torture that awaited them. In dealing with so intelligent an animal as a dog, we were dealing with a creature that suffered far more than inferior animals, which were unconscious of the fate that awaited them; and as regarded the argument that shooting and hunting inflicted more torture on the brute creation than vivisection, it was to contrast the aggregate pain of thousands with the concentrated agony of one—which was absurd. Besides, man was by nature a hunting animal, and there could be no comparison between killing fairly in the chase, or for food, and strapping a writhing creature to a board to torture it for hours. He did not pretend to a scientific view of the case, but he dreaded lest the power should be left in the hands of the vivisectors to practise such cruelties as those which he had described. He thought that sufficient evidence had not been advanced to show that the beneficial results were at all proportionate to the cruelties and suffering which the experiments involved, and, therefore, he had pleasure in seconding the Motion for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. M'LAREN said, he had listened with very great attention to the address of his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), and although he did not agree with his conclusions, he certainly admired the talent and research, and the arguments which he had adduced. But it seemed to him that one large portion of his hon. Friend's argument was altogether beside the question which naturally agitated the public mind. His hon. Friend dwelt largely on the effects of poison, and the advantages which arose from experiments made with poisons upon animals. But the form of vivisection which the public complained of was not that animals were poisoned. The cruelty which the public protested against was taking a living dog or other animal, pinioning him down to a table, making incisions in his body, exposing his intestines—it might be his heart—or practically dissecting the body to show the nervous system, and doing all these things on animals for the alleged benefit of science. This was not a new agitation, nor was it an unreasonable one, because the society who worked in this great city for the protection of animals against cruelty were almost unanimously willing to consent to Lord Carnarvon's Bill as originally introduced by the Government. If that Bill had been allowed to pass into law, there would, he believed, have been very little, if any, agitation at the present time. But that Bill was entirely altered. The Bill in its original shape showed a desire on the part of the Government to put an end to what was complained of as far as possible; but it was altered again and again until it became a kind of licensing Bill—a measure for licensing parties to do what the original Bill was intended to stop altogether. He admitted that in the present Home Secretary they found a very humane administrator; but that might not always be so, and, moreover, it was not a wise thing to make the option depend upon the goodwill of one man whether these laws should be administered or not. To show that what he had stated respecting the objects of the Society for the Protection of Animals liable to Vivisection was correct, he would read a passage from their Report, in which they stated—

“If Lord Carnarvon’s Bill had been suffered to pass in its original form the Society would have recognized it as a tolerably fair compromise between humanity and science, and would have dropped further agitation.”

That showed that the most influential parties engaged in the present agitation were not unreasonable men, who were prepared to set themselves against everything of this nature, but were willing to accept a fair compromise. It had been strongly alleged that the Royal Commission was, if not literally, almost altogether in favour of the present state of the law; that they discovered there was no real and solid cause of alarm or distrust, and that there was no great degree of cruelty manifested, so far as an opinion might be formed upon the evidence that had been laid before them. Now, the Royal Commission in their Report stated that very severe experiments were constantly performed, and witnesses had spoken from personal knowledge of the sufferings which had been often unnecessarily inflicted in the name of science. He thought that after such a statement it was really going too far to say that the Report of the Royal Commission was in effect to whitewash all the parties charged with cruelty in the matter of vivisection. They went on to say—

“It must be accepted as a proof of the willingness of men of the highest eminence in science to submit to the consideration of the Legislature this difficult question.”

Mr. M'Laren

The Royal Commission here referred to the fact that the most eminent physiologists in London were averse to vivisection to the extent to which it had been carried; that they were most willing to put a stop to it, if not altogether, at least to a great extent; and that they were disposed to co-operate with the Government in promoting the Bill which was introduced on the subject. This showed that the leading men of the Medical Profession were in favour of something effective being done. What those opposed to vivisection now complained of was, that this had not been done, and they said that if the Legislature would not reduce its use to a minimum which would not affect the public feeling, they must insist on the abolition of the whole thing. He (Mr. M'Laren) did not contend for the absolute prohibition of vivisection; but he thought that the latitude that was at present given was much too great. Reference had been made in the debate to the alleged discreditable opposition that had been brought forward in some instances on the side of the question which he now supported. He did not know exactly what was referred to, but he was aware of opposition of a very discreditable kind that had been brought forward on the other side of the question. Not very long ago he had the honour of presiding at a public meeting in the city which it was his privilege to represent, and which contained the largest medical school in the United Kingdom. It was a meeting to hear a lecture on his side of the question, from a very eminent man, Dr. Childs, of London. And what was the discreditable conduct of their opponents? It was that a band of 40 or 50 medical students took possession of conspicuous parts of the room, and shouted, whistled, and stamped, and made every conceivable noise, so that it was impossible for the address to go on. He now spoke of what he saw, and he had then to declare that the lecture could not be proceeded with, and dissolved the meeting. When Dr. Childs was afterwards invited to a meeting held in a larger hall, a much larger body of students appeared at the second meeting than at the first, and effectively prevented the delivery of the address in support of the cause which he had now the honour to advocate. Dr. Childs, on both occasions, was put down by mere physical, brute force, by noise and clamour; and if the word "discreditable" could be used at all, in connection with the discussion of this subject, he said that no proceedings could be pointed to in any part of the Empire to equal the discreditable proceedings that took place on the part of the medical students of Edinburgh in order to prevent the other side of the question from being stated. It was supposed after the first meeting, that the medical Professors would have used their influence to restrain the students, and keep them away from the second meeting; but, so far as his informants had been able to learn, no such efforts were made. His hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow had referred to the feeling, on this question, of a distinguished surgeon, now no more—Sir William Fergusson. He had not the evidence of Sir William Fergusson before him, which his hon. Friend had stated was to the effect that vivisection had, in certain cases, done good. He would not willingly impugn his hon. Friend's accuracy, because he knew that he would not make any statement which he did not think the evidence would bear out, but he (Mr. McLaren) had a strong recollection that in reading that evidence, he found Sir William Fergusson declared that he had never known of any important discovery having been made through vivisection. The entire address of his hon. Friend was to the effect that to stop vivisection would be to stop scientific progress, and that the experiments that were made were necessary in the interest of science. He was informed, on very good authority, that in the larger medical classes many experiments were made on living animals, merely for the purpose of showing by observation to the students that things were true which they knew and believed to be true without those exhibitions of cruelty. In a respectable London paper this paragraph occurred respecting one of the Professors in the Medical School of Edinburgh, who was examined as a witness before the Royal Commission—

"Professor Rutherford has not been allowed to ask to repeat his old frightful experiment on the capillary organs of thirty dogs—an experiment conducted, as the Professor boasted at the meeting of the Royal Society in Edinburgh on 6th March last, without either chloroform or opium, and which Sir William Thomson, one of the most distinguished scientific men in the Empire, afterwards declared, in a letter to The Scots- man of the following day, is not justified by either the objects proposed or the results obtained or obtainable."

Now, he knew there were thousands of people whose feelings were harrowed by the cruel experiments, as they considered them, that were made in the medical school of Edinburgh. He knew also that this feeling had gone so far that parties who had subscribed liberally to the new building for extending the medical school had said that if they had known such practices existed they would never have subscribed one farthing. He cordially supported the second reading, but admitted that in Committee a few Amendments would have to be made in the Bill.

Mr. FORSYTH, in opposing the measure, said, he was one of those who had originally joined heartily in the agitation against vivisection which resulted in the Act of last year, and he entirely sympathized with the motive of those who had brought forward the Bill. We all abhorred cruelty, but there was such a thing as zeal without discretion, and he thought the advocates of the Bill had let their zeal outrun their discretion. He believed that the Act of last year provided sufficient safeguards against further cruelties, inasmuch as it provided that no animal could be experimented upon, unless it was at the time as destitute of feeling as the table before him, with the further condition that it should be put to death before it passed from an insentient to a sentient state. They ought, he thought, to be content with that, without endeavouring to debar the surgeon from the whole field of discovery. He thought it was absurd that experiments should be prevented on living animals, when precautions were taken to absolutely annihilate the pain. If the object of the Bill had been to repeal a Proviso in the Act of last year, allowing vivisection without anæsthetics in cases where their use would frustrate the object of experiment, he should have voted for it. He could not believe that it was right for any scientific purpose to inflict pain on sentient beings. The Bill would not allow the making of even painless experiments with the view of discovering means of removing human suffering. It contained a provision against an infliction of wanton injury upon a vertebrate animal. That phrase included men, birds, reptiles, and fishes, and excluded the whole insect world. He should like to know on what ground the Bill was limited in that manner? Why was the beetle, for instance, to be excluded? Shakespeare said—

“The poor beetle that we tread upon
In corporal sufferance finds a pang as great
As when a giant dies.”

It was the bounden duty of those who supported the Bill to show that, notwithstanding the Act which was passed last year, torture had still been inflicted upon animals, but not a single case had been adduced to-day. The supporters of the Bill had not shown that the Act of last Session had been evaded or was a failure, and as its operation had not yet been sufficiently tested, he should oppose the second reading of the present Bill.

MR. COWPER-TEMPLE observed that the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) and the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Forsyth) had argued on the assumption of the efficiency of the Act. It was too soon to judge of its results. Although the applications for licences had been few, for experiments in laboratories, where was the security that unlicensed cruel experiments had not been made? The names of the vivisectors were kept secret, and the Inspector must have great difficulty in discovering and proving any evasion of the Act. We knew that experiments were generally conducted in private laboratories; but the Act did not contain any effective machinery by which such evasion could be brought home to those who practised in those places. The Home Secretary did not give the names of the gentlemen who had received licences to make experiments, and the public had no means of ascertaining them. That was a new thing in the administration of this country. With regard to what had been said by the hon. Member for Glasgow as to the administration of chloroform to animals, in order that experiments upon them might be conducted without pain, it should be remembered that in the case of a human being, chloroform had to be frequently administered during a prolonged operation, and the human being could give notice that a fresh dose of chloroform was necessary, but animals could not do so. Again, it was not by any means certain whether the administration of anæsthetics had the same effect on the lower animals which they had on man. The application of anæsthetics was troublesome and expensive, and might often be ineffectual, unless especial care was used. In various parts of Europe lectures on physiology were accompanied by experiments on living animals which frequently involved great suffering and even torture to the animals operated upon. Those experiments were not made for the discovery of some new truth, but for striking illustration of lectures, and to demonstrate the effects and action of pain upon the nerves of sensation. If such a horrible system became the common method of studying physiology, it must tend to harden the feeling of students and make them indifferent to the infliction of pain, and he should like to hear some reason assigned why these most cruel and revolting exhibitions were so indispensably necessary? It was, he thought, creditable to the British nation that it had given more attention to the prevention of cruelty to animals than some Continental nations; but there was a danger of cruel physiological experiments being introduced from abroad which rendered it a matter worthy of serious consideration whether they ought not to have a more efficient and stringent Act on their Statute Book than the one of last Session. He did not say that they ought at once to pass another law on that subject; but he was glad that question had been again brought under discussion, because he feared that a spirit of reckless indifference to animal suffering would become prevalent unless effective means were taken before long to repress the abuses to which he had referred.

DR. LUSH said, that many of those who supported the Bill were animated by a fictitious, and in some respects factitious, enthusiasm. They spoke as if the Act of last year had not passed, and referred to experiments of a cruel and revolting kind, which could not now take place in this country. He thought that when Gentlemen of calm judgment spoke in that House of exposing to young persons the suffering and palpitating internal anatomy of living animals on the dissecting table, it was evident that people of less balanced minds would be still further carried away by their feelings on that question. He could not understand how the last speaker (Mr.

Mr. Forsyth

Cowper-Temple), believing in the existence of the horrible cruelties which he said were perpetrated in foreign Universities, could have had the heart to schedule those Universities in a Bill, as he had done, as fit places for the education of ladies. Everything relating to foreign countries, however, was quite outside the sphere of the present debate, and many of the speeches delivered that day would have been more appropriate when the Act of last year was under discussion. It was alleged to be unnecessary that actual physiological experiments should be carried out before persons who in after-life were to have the responsible care of the injuries and ailments to which men were subject; but he thought that if the high character of the British medical Profession was to be sustained, it was absolutely necessary that those who were to be our future practitioners should not be mere phantom physicians and surgeons, deriving their ideas from diagrams and papers only, but must have an opportunity of witnessing life as it existed. With regard to the conduct of the students of Edinburgh University on the occasion of the lectures in favour of the suppression of vivisection, he did not agree with the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. M'Laren). He had attended many meetings at which young men had been present, and he had always noticed on their part a desire to act with discretion, and he could not help thinking that the hon. Member had cast an undeserved slur upon the beneficent society which existed in the University. The 3rd clause of that Bill would be practically inoperative, because there were many animals which for agricultural and other purposes underwent operations amounting to positive vivisection, and sometimes to vivisection in its grossest and most painful form, from which that clause would not protect them. He further maintained that the Act of last year had not had time to develop its power; while he also denied either that there was any desire on the part of medical men to evade that Act, or that the Home Secretary had shown any unwillingness to carry it into full and fair effect. On the other hand, a false cry of humanity had been raised in favour of the present Bill, which he trusted the House would reject by a large majority.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON hoped that the House would adopt the principle of the measure, the details of which, if too drastic and stringent, could be amended in Committee. They could not enforce the law, unless they had a register of all those who were licensed; and he thought the most important provisions of the Bill were those which referred to the registration of places where vivisection experiments were carried on, because they afforded checks for the prevention of malpractices. He believed that if the Act of last Session had been passed in its integrity, it would have satisfied public opinion, and that there would have been no occasion to have brought forward the present measure. That Act, however, was defective in regard to ensuring the use of anæsthetics, which should, in his opinion, be made obligatory in all experiments on animals without exception. He trusted that the Bill would be read a second time so that it might be considered and, if necessary, modified in Committee.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, speaking on behalf of the Government, said, that while as sincerely hostile as anybody could be to the cruelties complained of, he did not think that a sufficient case had been made out in favour of the present Bill. When they were told of the tortures inflicted by students experimenting on dogs in England, he must observe that those were the arguments used last year to induce them to adopt the measure on that subject which then became law. He could state from his personal knowledge of that Act that it had been entirely successful in effecting the purposes for which it was passed. It had been said that there was no means of knowing whether there had been any evasion; but he would remind the House that formerly no difficulty had been found in discovering cases in which pain had been inflicted on animals. A further allegation was that it did not provide that the animals experimented upon should be effectually protected from pain by the use of anæsthetics; but the fact was that the Act required the person operating to possess a scientific certificate and also to have the sanction of the Secretary of State, while the animal operated upon must be placed under the influence of some anæsthetic of sufficient power to prevent pain, and if the experiment was one which would cause it to suffer afterwards, the animal must be killed before the effects of the anæsthetic had ceased. Not only had the Act worked as it was intended to do, but his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had found in the whole profession of physiologists and those who practised experiments the greatest readiness and the greatest wish thoroughly to carry out the Act. Not a single instance of its violation or evasion had been adduced, and surely it would be absurd to repeal the Act and pass another which they had refused to accept last year. It had been frequently stated and circulated that the use of anæsthetics under the Act was entirely optional; but no allegation could be more misleading or contrary to the fact than that notion. Every precaution was adopted in respect to those licences, and there was only one instance in which an experiment had been sanctioned without the absolute use of anæsthetics. Any case of evasion, or of the infringement of the conditions of the licence, would soon be discovered. It was not the fact, as his hon. Friend (Mr. Holt) had suggested, that the learned Bodies issued these licences. The Secretary of State, having the opinion of learned and scientific men before him, issued his certificate upon his own responsibility, and no matter who might happen to preside at the Home Office at any time, the public opinion of the House and the country would be a guarantee against any Minister abusing his functions from any feeling in favour of vivisection. He could not consent to the second reading of the Bill, considering that sufficient time had not elapsed to ascertain the practical operation of the Act of last year, and believing that a proposition to repeal an Act of the Legislature within a year after its passing was quite unprecedented. He therefore asked the House to maintain the beneficial legislation it adopted only last Session, and which, while restraining the horrors that were perpetrated in days gone by, yet allowed, with comparative immunity from pain to the lower animals, those advances in medical science to be made which it would be contrary to the public interest to arrest.

MR. HOLT replied, remarking that if the Act of last year had been passed in the form in which it was originally introduced, the country would have been much better satisfied. Some future Home Secretary might licence experiments of as horrible a kind as any ever performed in this country or abroad; and he objected to a law permitting any man to authorize experiments of that character. He quoted a statement to the effect that young ladies at Girton College attended the lectures at the University Laboratory, and on reaching the more advanced course of demonstrations might be taken to see experiments in which rabbits were suffocated under the influence of chloral, which he believed, in the opinion of some physiologists, was not an anæsthetic. Was that, he asked, a fit school in which young ladies should study? He hoped that the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) would vote for the second reading of the Bill, and then in Committee move to strike out the word "vertebrate." For himself, he was for protecting invertebrate as well as vertebrate animals, and he had only confined the Bill to the latter, in consequence of a representation that it would in that form better meet the views of the weak brethren.

MR. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT expressed a hope that next year a Bill would be brought in excluding dogs from the influence of anæsthetics.

BURIALS BILL—[BILL 36.]

(Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Alderman M^r Arthur, Mr. Richard.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, that it was not his intention to enter into any discussion on the Bill at the fag-end of a Wednesday afternoon. But he had another reason for not proceeding with the Bill, and that was that the Government had introduced in the other House a professedly sanitary measure dealing incidentally with the question raised by the Bill. And it would hardly be consistent with Parliamentary propriety to have two discussions, one in each House, proceeding upon parallel lines. He had originally intended to postpone the Bill; but, on looking at the state of the Order Book, he found there was no possibility of its coming on again this Session, and he therefore thought the more judicious course would be to ask the House to allow him to withdraw it altogether. At the same time, he begged to give Notice that when the Government Bill came on for second reading in that House he would move a Resolution embodying the principles of his Bill, and asserting the right of Nonconformist parishioners to have their dead friends and relatives buried in the parish churchyard with services of their own selection, and by ministers of their own choice. In case the Government Bill should not reach that House—and such a contingency was within the bounds of possibility—he reserved to himself the right to bring forward his Resolution as an independent Motion. He would now only express the fervent hope, in which he was sure every party, he might almost say every man, in the House would join, that this unhappy and distressing controversy, which had agitated the country for so many years, might be closed speedily and for ever. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving that the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill be discharged.

MR. RIDLEY, who had given Notice that he would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, remarked that the hon. and learned Member in the course he had just taken had consulted the convenience of the House, no less than the interests he had in view. He would only add that he cordially joined with him in the hope that the controversy on this subject might speedily be settled.

Motion agreed to.

(Mr. William Johnston, Mr. Chaine, Mr. King-Harman.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. W. JOHNSTON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it was a Bill to enable the Grand Juries of Ireland to grant increased remuneration to the assistant county surveyors, and also, with the approval of the Lord Lieutenant, to grant them superannuation. The present salaries of these officials was fixed at a maximum of £80 a-year. Considering that they had all passed examinations as engineers, he thought it was impossible to obtain the services of a qualified man at such a salary. They had each of them to travel, perhaps, 1,000 miles in the course of a-year, and one of the provisions of the Bill would give the Grand Jury power to vote them a further sum for travelling expenses. He trusted that the House would read the Bill a second time. If there was anything in it which the Government regarded unfavourably, he should be happy to consider any Amendments which might meet their views. He had only further to add that he hoped hon. Members for Ireland would assist him in obtaining this small modicum of justice for a deserving, and, at the present time, badly-paid body of men. He concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. William Johnston.)

MR. BIGGAR, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, the hon. Member who moved the second reading (Mr. W. Johnston) said it was a modicum of "justice to Ireland." He (Mr. Biggar) did not view it in that light. It was a Bill which proposed to take money out of the pockets of the ratepayers, without their consent. He knew very well what the duties of the assistant surveyors were, and he thought £80 a-year a very fair salary in relation to those duties; and, in his opinion, the Grand Juries should not have power conferred upon them to make orders to give them superannuations. As a matter of fact, they merely gave their spare time. ["No, no!"] He thought they were very fairly paid for driving, on an average, three miles a-day. He had several relations who had held the office, and as they did not give their time to it he thought they were already sufficiently well paid. They were certainly gentlemen of respectability; but he could not see why the Grand Juries should have increased powers conferred upon them to impose increased expenses on the cesspayers; and he therefore moved the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Biggar.)

THE O'CONOR DON ventured to say that there was no such persons as assistant county surveyors. They were only assistants to the county surveyors, and the difference was an important one, as these gentlemen were trying to get themselves recognized as independent county officers. Their position, he admitted, was one of the most anomalous kind. Although they were appointed by the county surveyors without the intervention of the Grand Jury, they could not be removed without the sanction of that body. He thought that legislation of the kind proposed by the Bill was rather premature until their position was more clearly defined, and placed on a more satisfactory footing, although he admitted that their salaries were at present small. From a public point of view the result of raising the salaries of the county surveyor's assistants would be an advantage. Practically, the greater portion of the county work had been thrown upon them; and it followed that if the salaries were too low, the class of men would not be the best in the profession, and they would also be open to temptations from contractors to accept remuneration in a manner that would not conduce to the benefit of the county. Believing that legislation was required on the subject he would not oppose the second reading, but should the Bill reach Committee, he would feel bound to suggest considerable Amendments.

MR. MACARTNEY supported the second reading of the Bill, taking exception to several of its provisions, however. The most objectionable part, he thought, was the Proviso giving the power of increasing the salaries of the assistant surveyors to the Grand Jury, without having previously obtained the assent of the magistrates and associated cesspayers at the baronial presentment sessions. That power, he thought, should be subject to some control from the ratepayers. The general tendency of legislation had been to give the ratepayers control in the county expenditure, and it would be unfair to make an exception in the present instance and deny the ratepayers a voice in the matter. He thought, however, that it would be well if, for the future, assistant surveyors should be fewer in number, better paid, and selected from a class of men fitted to succeed eventually to the office of county surveyors. The hope of ultimate promotion would induce a higher class of men to serve at first in the subordinate office.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, that the only way to have good roads in Ireland was by paying the assistant county surveyors well. He knew the work they had to do, and therefore gave his hearty support to the measure. It had been stated that those surveyors did not travel many miles in the year, but they travelled not only 1,000 but over 6,000 miles a-year; and out of their salaries of £80 a-year they paid at least a third of that in expenses, leaving them only £60. He hoped the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would withdraw his Amendment and allow the Bill to be read a second time, which might be amended in Committee.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING objected that the Grand Jury should have the power of deciding in the matter of salaries of those men; he was not in favour of superannuation. They were a most useful class of men, and their labour and services were very valuable, as the main part of the work was really done by them. The late Government showed every disposition to take the subject in hand; but the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) was prevented from doing so by pressure of other business. It was evident the men were underpaid, and all the objections urged by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) could be dealt with when the Bill came to be considered in Committee. The men, as a class, were very dissatisfied. They had to do a great deal of important work, and they were badly paid. To say, as had been done by the preceding speaker, that a third of their income was expended in travelling expenses, was to understate the fact. He believed that half of their salary was so consumed, and that left the men only £40 a-year to live upon. Amendments might be made in Committee; but, in his opinion, it would be only fair to give them something additional in the matter of pay.

MR. BRUEN said, he should vote for the second reading of the Bill, as he thought the assistant surveyors ought to be fairly paid.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he had no objection to the Bill being read a second time, but several provisions would require careful attention in Committee. Before the House proceeded to a division, he thought they should have an understanding from the hon. Member who introduced the Bill that he was prepared to accept an Amendment limiting the power of the Grand Jury to grant increases to the salaries of the assistant county surveyors.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH was of opinion that the Bill would require considerable alteration before it became law, and he certainly thought that the question as to whether the salaries should be raised ought to be referred to the presentment sessions as well as to the Grand Jury. The Government would object to the relations between these assistant-surveyors and the county surveyors being changed. As had been well observed, the former were assistant to the surveyors and were not county officers, and, therefore, he could not agree to the provision for pensions. He also doubted the wisdom of increasing the travelling allowances. The limit at present fixed for the salary, £80, he admitted, was unsatisfactory. This class of men occupied a responsible position, the duties of which were in many respects analogous to those of the surveyors to Highway Boards in England, and he did not think it was always possible to secure competent men at so low a salary. An increase, therefore, might very fairly be assented to; but as to what the precise limit should be, that would be a matter for consideration in Committee. Under these circumstances, he felt justified in supporting the second reading of the measure, as he felt sure that the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston) would not object to have these points dealt with in Committee.

MR. SHARMAN CRAWFORD entertained very great respect for the assistant surveyors, whose duties, he knew from experience, were very arduous in measuring stones and in various ways assisting the surveyors. He agreed in the remarks of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), that the Grand Juries should not have the settlement of those matters, and he should vote for the Amendment, as at present it was not desirable that any change should be made. That should be deferred until the House saw what form for county administration the measure which the Government intended to bring forward would assume. It might under a new system certainly change the position of these surveyors' assistants. He should be glad to see the position of the class improved, and if they were deprived of their private practice, and they did practice, some of them largely, then some compensating arrangement should be made; but at the present moment he felt it would be injudicious to make any change in the relation of this class to the surveyors. With that view he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan.

MR. H. HERBERT said, he should vote against the Bill.

MR. PARSELL thought that the Bill had been brought forward at an inopportune moment; and that the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston) and those who supported him would have better consulted the interests of a most meritorious class of men if they had postponed this question until the whole system of county administration had been brought before the country by a Government measure. It was his intention to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan.

MR. D. TAYLOR supported the Bill, and thought the position of the surveyors' assistants required consideration. Until a reform of the Grand Jury system was brought about, he believed the Bill would be for the benefit of the counties.

MR. CALLAN considered credit was due to the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. W. Johnston) who introduced the Bill, and hoped it would be amended in Committee. He should support the second reading.

MR. W. JOHNSTON said, in reply, he could assure the House that he would receive all Amendments that might be proposed in a favourable manner.

ng | tions put by the two hon. Gentlemen

ot | MR. GOURLEY: The answer of the
v. | hon. Gentleman is scarcely explicit. I d | should like to read the second paragraph of my Question—

By way of explanation, I may tell the hon. Gentleman that the reason why I ask is that at the present moment a large number of vessels are bound with cargoes to Russian ports in the Black Sea, that those vessels, with their cargoes, are bound to proceed until official notice is given of the blockade of those ports. Some of those vessels have coal on board, and during the American War coal was declared to be contraband of war by our own Government. What I want the Government to do is this—to inform the shipowners and merchants of this country whether they consider coal to be a contraband of war or otherwise, and also to endeavour to bring about an arrangement with other Governments as to what is to be looked upon as contraband of war during the existence of hostilities between Russia and Great Britain.

MR. RKE: I am sorry that my answer is not as explicit as the hon. Gentleman would wish, but I think I have answered the Question so far as I possibly can. If the hon. Gentleman wishes further information on the subject, it is of vast importance, not only to the Government, but to all the people of this country, and if he will be good enough to give me Notice, I will be very happy to answer his Question.

MR. GOURLEY: My Notice is already given. What I want to learn is the Order!”]

MR. RKE: If the hon. Member will put a new Question, he is good enough to give Notice of it.

MR. GOURLEY: It is the same Question. With your permission, I will read the second paragraph of it.

TION FOR COMPULSORY SLAUGHTER —LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. PAGET asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, seeing the national importance of early information of an outbreak of Cattle Plague and with a view to afford reasonable inducement to owners of stock to declare the existence of this disease immediately on its outbreak, he will endeavour to provide by statute that compensation for compulsory slaughter of affected animals shall be awarded on a scale at least as liberal as that now in force in case of pleuro-pneumonia under the Animals Order, 1875?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I have referred the Question of my hon. Friend to the Lord President, and I hope, I need not assure him, that we fully appreciate the importance of the matter to which he has called attention. Considering, however, that these matters will shortly be investigated by the Committee, which we hope will be soon at work, we think we should not be justified in giving any opinion, and still less in proposing any legislation, respecting any part of the subject, until the Report of the Select Committee has been received.

MR. PAGET gave Notice that he would take an early opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the subject.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—
THE SUEZ CANAL.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNTZ asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If, in view of the complications which may arise from the war between Russia and Turkey, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take such steps, in concert with the other great Powers, as would secure the neutralization of the Suez Canal?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: If by the expression "neutralization" is meant an arrangement which would prevent, in time of war, the ships of war of any nation from passing through the Canal, that would be an arrangement which would prevent Her Majesty's Government from making use of the Canal for the purpose of sending the ordinary reliefs to and from India, and to such an arrangement Her Majesty's Government was not disposed to lend any aid. But Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to take steps for the protection of the navigation of the Canal.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—
CONTRABAND OF WAR.—QUESTIONS.

MR. COLLINS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government, in view of the magnitude of British interests affected by the question, will propose to the Governments of Russia and of Turkey to specify what articles or merchandise on board ships of neutral nations they will empower Prize Courts in their respective States to adjudge as contraband of war?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, as there is another Question upon the Paper on the same subject by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley), if the House will permit me, I will answer both at the same time. I need hardly remind the House that the question as to what is and what is not contraband of war has at all times given rise to much discussion. I need hardly also remind the House that there are certain things which are always called contraband of war, such as arms, military stores, gunpowder, and things of that kind. There are also other things which have been held to be contraband of war, according to their destination, and according to other circumstances, decided by the Prize Courts. It has never been usual for any Government, and certainly not for this Government, nor do I think it would be possible, to define what, under all circumstances, should be considered contraband of war; and I do not think that it would be in the interest of English merchants to call on belligerents to define what they consider to be contraband of war, because the effect of that might be that certain goods which have not hitherto been held to be contraband of war by a Prize Court might be declared by a belligerent Government to be contraband of war. Under these circumstances it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to call on the belligerent Powers to define what they consider to be the articles which ought to be included under the term contraband of war. At the same time Her Majesty's Government will watch very narrowly the proceedings of the Prize Courts with the view of seeing whether any articles are declared to be contraband of war which have not hitherto been included in that category. I may mention that I have been asked privately by several hon. Members within the last few days whether certain articles are contraband of war. I do not mean to name the articles in detail, because I do not think it would be judicious. I may, however, mention one thing which is down in these Questions—namely, coal. That is one of the articles held by some Prize Courts to be contraband of war according to the destination, and also according to other circumstances which are to be adjudicated upon by the Prize Court. With regard to other articles mentioned by some hon. Members, I can only give the same answer, and I may add that until they have been declared by a Prize Court to be contraband of war it is impossible to give any definite answer on the subject. The Question of the hon. Member for Sunderland also proceeded to inquire whether we have received any official notification of the nature of the blockade and regulations intended to be established by the Turkish Government in the Black Sea, Bosphorus, and Dardanelles, and whether the Russian Government has forwarded official notice and regulations relative to the mining of harbours other than that of Odessa? We have not received any more information about the blockade of the Black Sea than that which I communicated to the House the other night. The regulations which we were told at that time were going to be issued by the Turkish Government have not reached Her Majesty's Government, and when they do reach us we shall not lose a moment in publishing them. In regard to mining operations carried on in certain ports belonging to Russia, I have not heard that any ports in the Black Sea have been mined except that of Odessa. Another question asked is as to the alleged destruction of a British vessel by striking a torpedo on entering Kertch. No information of that destruction has reached Her Majesty's Government, but we have sent a telegram to our Consul to inquire what has taken place. When the reply has been received, I shall be very happy to communicate it to the House. I think this answer will cover the whole of the subjects contained in the Questions put by the two hon. Gentlemen

MR. GOURLEY: The answer of the hon. Gentleman is scarcely explicit. I should like to read the second paragraph of my Question—

By way of explanation, I may tell the hon. Gentleman that the reason why I ask this is that at the present moment a large number of vessels are bound with cargoes to Russian ports in the Black Sea, and that those vessels, with their cargoes, are bound to proceed until official notice is given of the blockade of those ports. Many of those vessels have coal on board, and during the American War coal was declared to be contraband of war by our own Government. What I want the Government to do is this—to inform the shipowners and merchants of this country whether they consider coal to be a contraband of war or otherwise, and also to endeavour to bring about an arrangement with other Governments as to what is to be looked upon as contraband of war during the existence of hostilities between Russia and Turkey.

MR. BOURKE: I am sorry that my answer was not as explicit as the hon. Member would wish, but I think I have answered the Question so far as I possibly can. If the hon. Gentleman wishes for further information on the subject, which is one of vast importance, not merely to the Government, but to all the merchants of this country, and if he will be kind enough to give me Notice, I shall be very happy to answer his Question.

MR. GOURLEY: My Notice is already on the Paper. What I want to learn is this—[“Order!”]

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member proposes to put a new Question, he is bound to give Notice of it.

MR. GOURLEY: It is the same Question. With your permission, I will read the second paragraph of it again—

“Whether any international arrangement exists defining contraband goods; if not, if he will take such steps as Her Majesty's Government may deem necessary to procure an international schedule of contraband merchandise.”

MR. BOURKE: I thought I answered that Question. No international arrangement does exist, and I think I said that in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government it would not be expedient for a neutral Government to ask a belligerent Government what they consider contraband of war.

TURKEY—MILITARY CONTRIBUTIONS OF EGYPT.—QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he could state what is the amount of Force, Egypt is by Treaty obliged to supply on the demand of Turkey; and, whether Egypt is obliged to supply Troops on the demand of Turkey in addition to the Tribute she pays, or does the payment of Tribute cease when Troops are furnished?

MR. BOURKE: When the hon. Gentleman uses the word "Treaty" in the Question, I conclude that he means Firman. According to the Firman—or rather Firmans, for there are three of them, I believe—issued by the Porte to the Khedive, the latter is bound to send 30,000 troops to the Porte in time of peace, and that number may be increased in time of war according to what the Porte considers to be reasonable. The payment of the Tribute from the Khedive to the Porte has nothing at all to do with the furnishing of troops.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS (IRELAND). QUESTION.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA (for Mr. MELDON) asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether any representations have been made to the Treasury by the late or present Registrar of Deeds in Ireland on the subject of uncomparated documents, and what reply or replies have been made thereto; whether a special report was at any time made on this, amongst other subjects, relating to the office in the year 1865; and, whether a consolidated Dictionary Index on paper from the year 1870 to the present has not been compiled and is now in official use, and what steps the Treasury have taken to have such Index placed in the hands of the public, and how much of the surplus earnings of the office, amounting to £42,000 in the year 1867 and upwards, has been applied to render the office more useful and convenient to the public?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, it is true that representations have been made to the Treasury from the Registry of Deeds in Ireland on the subject of uncomparated documents. This matter was reported upon, among others, by a Departmental Committee in 1865. I am not prepared to lay their Report, which is a confidential document, on the Table of the House. A consolidated Dictionary Index has been prepared, and is in official use, but at present it is not intended to place it in the hands of the public. I am aware that the office claims that up to 1867 its surplus earnings amounted to the sum stated—namely, £42,000—but during the last 10 years the total annual cost of the office has largely increased, and, instead of a surplus, there has been a deficiency, amounting in the 10 years to about £26,500. The deficiency is annually increasing.

EPHING FOREST COMMISSION—THE EVIDENCE.—QUESTION.

MR. J. HOLMS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session to give effect to the recommendations of the Commissioners on Epping Forest; and, if so, when?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, the Home Secretary had already stated that he could not undertake to fix a time for the introduction of a Bill until the voluminous evidence had been printed. When it was it would be considered with a view to the bringing in of a Bill, although the present state of the Public Business was not very promising as to its passing. No difficulty could arise from the suspension of the powers of the Commissioners, as they would be alive until the end of next year.

CLOSING OF BURIAL GROUNDS. QUESTION.

MR. GREENE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether there are any practical difficulties in the way of closing overcrowded churchyards or other burial grounds?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON, in reply, said, there were no actual difficulties in the way of closing burial grounds, but from the fact that the Home Office was not in connection with the officers who looked after the sanitary arrangements of the country. There were some difficulties, which would be overcome by the transfer of the authority to the Local Government Board. The present practice was for a complaint to be made, for an inquiry to be made into that complaint, and for an order being made in Council following on that inquiry for closing the churchyard.

NAVY—NAVAL OFFICERS ON THE RETIRED LIST.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will state on what authority officers on the Retired List can be called on for active service, and in what respect they differ from officers on the Reserved List or on half-pay in their liability for active service; whether the liability of retired officers to be called on for active service is regulated by Order in Council or by the Statute Law; and, if he will inform the House the authority by which

“The Admiralty has power to remove from the list of the Royal Navy any officer whatever, whether on full-pay, half-pay, or on the Retired List, and this without reason assigned?”

MR. A. F. EGERTON (for the First Lord of the Admiralty) said: Sir, I have to inform the hon. and gallant Member that officers on the Reserved or Retired List can be called upon for active service by Order in Council, according to the Queen's Regulations, cap. 7, sec. 3, art. 1. The power of the Admiralty to remove the names of officers from the list of the Royal Navy rests on immemorial usage, and is an exercise of the prerogative of the Crown.

MERCHANT SEAMEN'S BILL—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

MR. BURT asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he can state when the Government will introduce their promised Bill to amend the Law relating to breaches of contract of seamen?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, I have a Bill entitled the Merchant Seamen's Bill, already drafted, dealing with both breach of contract and discipline of seamen, and I am only waiting the earliest opportunity to ask leave of the House to introduce it.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the frequent and increasing practice of the purchase by brewers of licensed premises when sold after the death of a former owner—thus creating a new claim for vested interest and an encouragement to drinking, and thereby neutralising the intentions and efforts of the legislature; also the practice of single justices (not acting in public or in Court) of granting an extension of hours for drinking; and, whether he will take any steps, by legislation, or the issue of a circular and other means, to endeavour to check the evils arising from the prevalence of the practices above described?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Secretary of State could have no knowledge of the purchase by brewers of licensed premises after the death of the former owner, and he could not prevent the purchase of such premises by brewers. As to the second part of his Question, he had to inform the hon. Baronet that a single justice had no power to grant an extension of the hours for public-houses to be kept open on special occasions; that could only be done by two justices of the peace in petty sessions assembled. He was, however, of opinion that the merits of each application for an extension of the hours should be carefully considered, and, if possible, a uniform system be adopted, so as to prevent different rules being laid down in different parts of the country. There were difficulties, no doubt, in the way; but the magistrates, when they assembled at quarter sessions, might consider and discuss the whole question.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS — ABUSES AT ELECTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. HIBBERT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been directed to the abuses which have occurred in many places during the last few years in the election of the guardians of the poor; whether in consequence of the dissatisfaction caused thereby he is prepared to recommend such an alteration of the Law as would permit the votes to be taken by ballot instead of by voting papers; and, whether the tenure of office for which guardians are elected might not be advantageously extended from one to three years?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that the number of contested elections for Guardians of the Poor in 1874 was 630, and in 1875 it was 720. Complaints had been made of malpractices, but many of them had not been well founded, and in 1874 it had only been found necessary to hold an official inquiry into two cases. Under these circumstances, he did not feel it necessary to recommend such an alteration of the law as would permit the votes to be taken by Ballot. Apart from the advantages of the use of the voting paper, the substitution of the Ballot would lead to increased expense. With regard to the tenure of office by Guardians being extended from one to three years, the subject had been frequently brought before him by Boards of Guardians themselves, but he was not prepared to make any general alteration on the subject. He should, however be very glad to try the experiment in places where the feeling for the change prevailed. That feeling he believed existed to a great extent in Lancashire and some parts of London.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—MAPS OF THE SCENE OF WAR.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY stated that he proposed to place in the Library of the House, for the inspection of hon. Members, maps of the scene of war, marked from time to time by an officer of the Intelligence Department, which would afford assistance to those Members who wished to follow the progress of the war.

NAVY—NAVAL COLLEGE—THE SITE. QUESTION.

MR. A. F. EGERTON (for the First Lord of the Admiralty) asked the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight to postpone the Motion of which he had given Notice for to-morrow night in reference to the proposed site for a Naval College. He was sorry to say it was very doubtful whether his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty could be in his place to-morrow, and, even if the Motion were brought on it would be impossible for the First Lord to state what decision the Admiralty had arrived at, because the right hon. Gentleman was still waiting for some sanitary Reports as to other sites that had not yet been received.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he was anxious to meet the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty. The question had been postponed three or four times, and it would be of great convenience to hon. Members interested in it if the right hon. Gentleman would assist him by giving him a day to bring it forward, or give him a promise that the Admiralty would not act on the Report in favour of Dartmouth until the matter had been fully discussed.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, he thought his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty would allow him to give that pledge—that no decision would be arrived at until after the subject had been discussed in that House. As to securing a day for the discussion that was not within his province.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

(Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Assheton Cross, Mr. Walpole.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress April 30th.]

Clause 16, (Objects of statutes for University).

MR. COURTNEY moved, in page 6, line 1, to leave out "either at any College or Hall within the University." His object was to provide that the appointments to Scholarships created by the action of the Commissioners to be appointed under the provisions of the Bill should be confined to unattached students.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the question had been fully considered, and he did not think any hardship could be inflicted upon unattached students by the provisions of the Bill as it stood. The Commissioners would have power to make special rules with regard to the Scholarships in question. He could not, therefore, accept the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. LOWE moved an Amendment on the clause with the object of securing an "examination by the University of all persons seeking to be matriculated." He understood that in the existing course of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge there was no examination before students were admitted. The person seeking admission might be in the most lamentable state of ignorance, and yet be admitted to the Universities. There was an examination in several of the Colleges, he did not know of what sort; but he thought the present was an unsatisfactory state of things, as without such examination as he proposed a great deal of time, which otherwise might be turned to better account, must be wasted on elementary instruction. The Universities ought not to be occupied in mere teaching, that belonged to public schools. Mr. Pattison, Rector of Lincoln, a scholar, and a gentleman who had paid great attention to the subject, while pointing out in a work of his the existing unsatisfactory state of things, argued that, though the Universities had no examination, the Colleges had, and that beyond that put forward in the Responsions, the University examination would be of no use at all. But from the fact that a great many persons were plucked at the outset, the inference was rather in favour of the value of such examinations. The University examinations would be more strict than those of the Colleges; and if the thing was worth doing at all it was worth doing well. It would tend greatly to raise the standard of instruction at the Universities if such examinations were granted, and it would also have the important collateral effect of keeping schools up to the mark. The principle of the proposal was already admitted in some of our best Colleges and Universities, and he hoped it would be adopted in this Bill.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 5, after sub-section 8, to insert the words "For the examination by the University of all persons seeking to be matriculated."—(Mr. Lowe.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the Amendment seemed at first sight to promise great advantage, but on studying it carefully he was not prepared to admit it into the Bill. His right hon. Friend wished to have such an examination that nobody who was not perfectly qualified should be admitted into the University; and he supposed, which was contrary to the view that he had generally taken, that the University was the teaching power, and not the Colleges. At present the Responsion was the first University examination, but the Universities had so many examinations now to conduct, that he (Mr. Hardy) could not think it was advisable to add another. Many of the College examinations were as hard as the Responsion, and a question had been raised whether the Colleges were not straining out men too much by their examinations. The object of the Committee should be, not to make the Universities exclusively for honour men; pass-men gained many advantages by their connection with the University, learning a good deal, and being brought into contact with men of great ability. As to plucking, he could point out to the right hon. Gentleman at least one in a very remarkable list connected with this Bill who had been plucked in the Responsion, and if he had been excluded from his future career in the University, the world would have lost a great deal. Under the circumstances, he thought there was no ground for altering the present system. The University had already the power in its own hands. It could at any time lay down a rule that no one could be a member of the University, unless he passed a certain examination; and, therefore, there was no use empowering the University to do what it could do now.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he was glad to hear the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and thought the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowe) had this great fault—that it really amounted to an arbitrary dictation to the Commissioners that they should insist upon the Universities reforming themselves after one exclusive model and no other. The present system could be so extended as to provide that no one without a reasonable amount of knowledge should enter a University. ["No!"] Trinity, as well as some other Colleges, he believed, at Cambridge had an entrance examination which answered to the Responsions at Oxford. The examination for the degree used to be taken at the end of the career of a non-honour man; now it was divided into two, the earlier part being taken in about two years, after which he had at his own option to go up for a second examination in some special subject. Thus, for a Trinity non-honour man, there were in all four examinations, varying in character—entrance, little-go, general and special, besides the intermediate College examinations. He was astonished at the financial argument of his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London, who said the Colleges wished to let in men easily in order to fill their rooms, &c. So far from the Colleges going into the highways and byways to tout for men, there was a tendency to raise the examination standard almost to a degree which some old-fashioned persons might think not desirable with the view of meeting the pressure of so many men coming in. The difficulty of the University, on the other hand, was a want of resources. But the object of the Bill was to take money from the rich Colleges in order to enrich the poor University, and the experiment, such as it was, had best be tried without the interference of his right hon. Friend's suggestion. He trusted that the Committee would not accept the Amendment.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, it might be true that there was a preliminary examination at Cambridge. [An hon. MEMBER: There is not.] He left Cambridge men to speak on that, but certainly that was not the case at Oxford. Every College there had an examination of its own, or dispensed with an examination altogether. There were 14 or 16 different standards of examination. At his College, Balliol, the standard which those entering the College as fresh men had to satisfy was exceedingly high—almost an honour standard. He remembered that when he was at Oxford there was one Hall which was called a back door of the University, because men could slip into the University by that door without examination at all. Was that a proper state of things? There should be a general matriculation examination, so as to exclude those who could never be taught anything, and went to the University merely to waste their time. The clause of his right hon. Friend was merely an enabling clause—it left the subject to the judgment of the Commissioners, and, therefore, he would support his right hon. Friend if he went to a division.

MR. GORST said, in most of the Colleges at Cambridge there was no entrance examination at all. It would be unfair to allow students at Colleges to enter upon easier terms than the poorer unattached students. He should support the Amendment. It did not propose to legislate for the University, but merely suggested to the University in what direction it should legislate for itself.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that there was more in the Amendment than at first appeared, and that if adopted it would change the whole character of our English Universities; and although it was true enough as regarded most of the points raised, that this was only an enabling clause and it might be left to the discretion of the Commissioners to deal with them or not, yet it was different in the present case, which was whether or not to give a quasi direction to the Commissioners to introduce a new principle into the Universities. The real point was not whether there should be a preliminary examination, but whether it should be uniform and conducted by the University instead of by the Colleges. It was a mistake to suppose that the Colleges at Oxford admitted students without examination. Some, no doubt, were more lax than others, but upon this point as upon some others, he could not help saying that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) seemed to speak of the University as he knew it 30 years ago, since which time great changes had been effected. In Balliol, University, and some other Colleges the standard of matriculation was high, and the result secured an aggregation of clever and reading men in those Colleges. In most of the other Colleges young men were required to pass an examination, showing them to be fit to pass their Responsions, and the unattached students were subjected to a similar examination before they were allowed to enter the schools for their Responsions. This Amendment would be changing the existing system altogether. No doubt the standard differed in different Colleges; but did they want all men to go in for honours, or did they want or inary men as well as extraordinary, to go to the University? He did not think it desirable to have a uniform examination conducted by the University. If they did so, the standard must either be high; in which case, many men would be kept from the University who under the present system, went there with great advantage to themselves; or it must be low, which would prevent the aggregation of talent in Colleges which now obtained that result by strict examinations. He held strongly the opinion that the first entrance to the University should not be made too difficult, and that the subsequent and regular University examinations should be the real tests of proficiency.

MR. A. MILLS said, that in some Colleges the entrance examination was too high, and in others it was too low, and in others there was no examination whatever; for that reason he should like to see the matter in the hands of the University. The Amendment would put an end to such an unsatisfactory state of things. He should therefore support it.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT thought that, as by matriculation a man became a member of the University and not a member of a College only, the University as a whole should determine what were the conditions on which students should be admitted to that body. The greatest curse to the University was a class of Colleges which would notoriously admit anybody upon any terms. He should support the Amendment, inasmuch as it would exclude the dunces and idlers who went to the Universities without ever intending to take a degree, but merely for pleasure, just as some men went into the Guards, and whose presence there was injurious to the discipline of the place. Surely the University ought to be able to say it would not admit a man to come to a place of study unless he knew something and intended to learn something more.

MR. MOWBRAY opposed the Amendment as unnecessary. He believed that at Oxford every College had a preliminary examination for students. There were between 250 and 300 unattached students who were examined by delegates appointed by the University. Within the last few years the University had appointed a body of delegates to conduct examinations at public schools, and there were many of the boys now at school who had passed the examinations conducted by the delegates appointed by the University. The present system was an elastic one which was adapting itself to existing requirements, and would do all that could be desired if time were allowed.

MR. WALTER said, there were some words wanting to his right hon. Friend's (Mr. Lowe's) Amendment, which, if they were inserted, might induce him to vote for it; otherwise he regretted that he could not do so. The words he would suggest were "in lieu of the present college matriculation examinations;" because there could be nothing more cruel to young men entering the University than that they should have first to pass through a University matriculation examination and then have to undergo a second examination to get into a particular College. In the case of unattached students, a University examination might be a very proper thing, because those students did not belong to a particular College. But the proposed University examination, if it was to be good for anything at all, ought to be good for the Colleges as well as for the University. He doubted whether the idea of making certain Colleges corps d'élite was good either for the young men or for the Colleges. The attempt to maintain such a standard as that of Balliol would require them to drive away at once two-thirds of the undergraduates. That would be a bad thing. No University could do anything of that kind, and it would be ridiculous to attempt it. If they were to have a University examination, it must be a more moderate one than the examination which now existed in certain Colleges; but, on the other hand, a second examination ought not to be insisted on for admission to a particular College. He, therefore, hoped that his right hon. Friend would accept the words he had suggested as an addition to the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN asked whether the hon. Member moved the insertion of the words?

MR. WALTER said, he was willing to do so if the right hon. Gentleman agreed to that course.

MR. LOWE agreed with the view of his hon. Friend who had last spoken, but thought that by his suggestion they might, perhaps, be going too far in the way of interference. It would be wrong in his opinion to limit the powers of the University without a full discussion of the question. It was quite conceivable that there might be some better mode of dealing with the matter than even the one which his hon. Friend proposed.

MR. FORSYTH admitted that his opinion had been somewhat changed in the course of the discussion, and he was now disposed to vote for the Amendment of the right hon. Member for the University of London. It was rather preposterous that there should be no general rule among the Colleges on that subject.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE observed that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) having always argued that the Colleges were the teaching bodies and the University was the examining body, was perfectly consistent in now proposing that the examination should be conducted by the University, and not by the Colleges. The right hon. Member opposite (Mr. Mowbray) urged that the University had appointed an Examining Board which was now practically carrying on a matriculation examination. But that was an argument for the present Amendment, and not one against it.

MR. J. G. TALBOT opposed the Amendment because it would introduce an uninteresting uniformity in the Universities, and might operate unjustly towards the dull men. If Mr. Carlyle's description of the great body of the people of this country was true, the majority of the students must be below the high standard advocated by some right hon. Gentlemen. He hoped that a standard would not be adopted which would keep out ordinary men.

MR. STAVELEY HILL contended that Balliol College, for instance, would not accept an ordinary University standard for a matriculation examination. He opposed the Amendment, not because it was not a very desirable Amendment in itself, but there were so many difficulties in the way of carrying it into practice that it would cause greater evils than those it was intended to remedy. He believed he was correct in stating that there was no entrance examination in the Scotch Universities.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman was perfectly correct. There was no entrance examination in the Scotch Universities, and Scotch educational reformers deeply regretted it. But why was there no entrance examination at the Scotch Universities? Simply because a good many of their students were so miserably poor that they could not obtain adequate preparation. Was that the case at the English Universities? Surely not. Why the only people for whom there was a University entrance examination at Oxford and Cambridge were the unattached students—that was, the poorest students.

MR. HENLEY believed that the Amendment would shut the door to that large class of persons called "unattached students." They were an important element of our University system, and nothing should be done to deprive them of the advantages they now received from a University training. He regarded the Amendment as a very retrograde step.

MR. MOWBRAY explained that the examination of unattached students was not a University education.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 180; Noes 239: Majority 59.—(Div. List, No. 111.)

MR. GREGORY moved to insert in page 6, after line 5, the following words:

"For regulating the residence of undergraduates and the duration thereof, and the number of terms to be kept by them as qualification for a degree."

He said, under the present system young men had practically to reside three years at a University before taking their degree, and it seemed to him that it was a great hardship to require so long a residence from many who might be perfectly able, if they applied themselves to work, to take their degree in a shorter time. He did not think, generally speaking, that young men were qualified to enter a University before 18 or 19, three years' residence brought them to 21 or 22, and if they had to go to the Bar or to medicine they would require two or three years' additional study before they would be able to practice at their Profession. That would bring them to 24 or 25 before they could earn a shilling for themselves. In addition to this, the fact of having more time to prepare for his degree than was necessary tended to demoralize a young man rather than otherwise. There was also another consideration. The expenses at the University were not much less than from £200 to £250 a-year, which to a large number of persons was a considerable sum, and to many parents was a question of capital rather than of income. Now, if we could save the young men a third of the expense and enable them to go to a profession a year earlier than at present, it would be conferring on them a great benefit, without, as he believed, any injury to the University.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, after line 5, to insert the words "For regulating the residence of undergraduates and the duration thereof, and the number of terms to be kept by them as a qualification for a degree."—(Mr. Gregory.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. RATHBONE supported the Amendment, on the ground that to oblige young men in all cases to spread their University education over so many years neither tended to raise the tone of University education, nor did good to the young men themselves. He had spoken to many men who had not only been at the University, but distinguished themselves there, and they told him that the first year they did very little work, the second year they put on more steam, and they made a spurt at the end. Therefore, there was much useful time wasted under the present system. It might fairly be said that the tone of Oxford was too sceptical and critical, and not sufficiently practical. A very distinguished man had even told him that he considered an upper fourth form boy in some respects better fitted for practical life. The degree of Bachelor of Arts, at all events, should be allowed to be taken at the end of two years if a man passed the necessary examination, and that of Master of Arts might be reserved for longer residence. Two years would certainly enable a student to go through a very sufficient course at the University, to give him a foundation which, followed up by reading afterwards, would render him a very useful member of society. At present, a boy stayed in the sixth form of our public schools, under very admirable discipline, until he was 18 years old, and adding to that four years at the University, and two or three years for learning a business or profession, he would be 25 before he began the practical work of life. In these days there was often no time for an education so prolonged which would be practically unavailable except to those who had a profession not only ready for them, but which would be kept waiting for them. He hoped that power would be given to the Universities to include men who were anxious to add culture to their business qualifications, and he was confident that this could be done without diminishing the significance of the University degrees.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, as one of those who by privilege, though with the same examination as others, had taken his degree in two years, that in his own day the feeling was that three years was too long a time to spend in reading for an ordinary degree. There was nothing objectionable or revolutionary in the proposal that the Commissioners should have power to consider whether an alteration should not be made in the present system. He considered, too, that the Long Vacation ought to be shortened.

MR. GOSCHEN wished to point out that there were two separate branches of the question; first, the actual time, or the number of terms, spent by undergraduates at Oxford; and, secondly, the length of those terms. The time, then, might evidently be curtailed in two ways. He would suggest the addition of the words "for regulating the residence of undergraduates and the duration thereof and the number of terms to be kept," an addition which would not involve the cutting down of the terms. The time spent at the University might be the same as at present, but put into a smaller number of years. Certainly the arguments for a shorter time were very strong; but, in his opinion, it would be better to lengthen the terms than to shorten the time required for study. Those who were in favour of the Amendment did not wish to diminish the aggregate standard of work necessary for obtaining a degree, or to lay down any definite rules, their object being to direct the attention of the Commissioners to this important subject and to give them powers to deal with it.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN considered the Amendment valuable, and remarked that it had always been his opinion that men went up to the Universities too late and stayed too long. He had been very glad to hear the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone) express his views on the matter. Those views bore out what he had himself heard in Manchester lately. He asked some friends there if they considered the expense of a University education too high, and if they would send their sons to the Universities if the expenses were lower. Their answers were—"No; we are not influenced not to send our sons to the Universities by the consideration of the expense. Money we can spare for the object; but we are influenced by the too long time necessary for them to obtain their degrees; and we are anxious to bring our sons into business earlier than a University education will admit." Persons who intended to go into business as solicitors, merchant, &c. were now in the habit of going to the Universities, and he thought they ought to be enabled to curtail the period of study by one year.

MR. GOSCHEN suggested to amend the Amendment by inserting the words "and length."

MR. GREGORY expressed his willingness to add the words suggested by the right hon. Gentleman to his Amendment.

MR. J. G. TALBOT, though sympathizing with a great deal which had been said, felt bound to oppose the Amendment, as he did not believe it possible to crowd into two years what now required three years. It, moreover, interfered with the internal arrangements of the Universities, which had far better be left in their own hands.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he was strongly in favour of the Amendment.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE agreed that it was desirable that the members of artistic and other professions should enjoy the advantage of a short University career; but this was a matter relating to internal studies, with which this Bill—very properly, as he thought—did not propose to interfere. The Amendment had much good in it, and he did not see why there should not be a class of undergraduates who should recognizedly go to Oxford or Cambridge, not for the purpose of taking the Arts degree, but to pass creditably their Little Go, or Moderations. Still, this was a matter of internal regulation which ought to be considered by the Universities themselves.

Mr. Osborne Morgan

MR. JAMES was of opinion that a reform in the direction indicated by the Amendment would never be effected if it were left entirely to the internal administration of the University. The Fellows themselves were the greatest opponents of any curtailment of the period.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he did not think the Amendment was very appropriate to the clause upon which it was submitted. That clause began "with a view to the advancement of art, science, and other branches of learning," and he could hardly see how the Amendment would tend to advance art, science, or other branches of learning. The Amendment, on the contrary, was intended for the benefit of certain classes in the country. He would not take objection to it, however, on that ground, because he had a strong impression that a University education was desirable for the professional classes. His reason for opposing the Amendment was, that he did not wish by this Bill to interfere with the internal administration of the Universities. The object of the Bill was to give the Universities power to improve themselves, which they did not at present possess. They, however, at the present time, possessed the power to shorten the term of residence, and he had heard that preparations were being made at Cambridge to try an experiment upon the subject. Personally, he should be very glad to see a shorter period of residence allowed to persons who chose to qualify themselves for a degree.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he could not quite accept the position of the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the interference of Parliament in this matter. The interests of the Governing Bodies of the Universities might not be in conformity with the wishes of Parliament. The academical terms had been in existence for a very long period, and there had been no movement on the part of either University to curtail the period of residence. This, he thought, was a matter which ought not to be withdrawn entirely from the cognizance of the House.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY regretted that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill had not accepted this most reasonable Amendment. He would prefer that the Amendment should be carried rather than the whole of the Bill. He would not dwell upon the economical advantage of the Amendment, but urged its adoption mainly on the ground that it would contribute most materially to "the advancement of art, science, and learning." It was a scandal, which was being more and more felt, that the Universities should practically be lying idle for more than half the year, and he, therefore, begged to move to amend the proposed Amendment by the insertion, after the word "number," of the words "and length," so that the Commissioners might have power to prolong a term if they thought fit.

Amendment amended, by adding, after the word "number," the words "and length."

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE moved, in page 6, to leave out sub-section 11, and to insert (as one of the purposes for which the Commissioners might from time to time make provision)—

"For erecting and founding any office connected with any special educational work done out of the University under the control of the University, and for remunerating any secretary, officer, or officers employed in the management of such educational work: Provided always, That the performance of such educational work shall not entitle a person to hold a Fellowship in any College for a longer term than seven years."

The noble Lord said the University of Cambridge had recently established a syndicate to promote teaching of a higher character in the large towns. The work of this syndicate had been very successful. It employed men of the highest distinction, who taught very large classes. The salaries and other expenses of the teachers were paid by the large towns. The University at the same time had appointed another syndicate on University teaching in the University. This syndicate had recommended a large increase in the number of University teachers. It was believed by many persons that the two systems might be brought into connection—the system inside and that outside the University—and that the teachers in the large towns should hold their appointments direct from the University, and have the position and status of University teachers, while continuing to be paid, as at present, by the votes of the large towns for University teaching. If that were done, they would come within the terms of those clauses which in several Colleges it had been proposed to confer, under new statutes, upon University teachers—that was to say, they would be able to retain their Fellowships for the performance of such work. In order, however, to prevent too large a number of Fellowships being held in this manner, he proposed to limit their tenure to seven years, more especially as he was informed by Professor Stuart, that there was a wish to treat these University Lectureships away from the University as probationary posts, from which the occupant would be promoted to posts within the University after a certain length of service. A clause similar to that he was proposing was among the revised Trinity statutes, and he had received strong evidence of support from many influential members of both Universities. The Amendment also proposed to enable the University to pay the secretary and inspectors for the work done in the large towns, but not the teachers. On this latter point he did not understand there was much difference of opinion between himself and the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE thought that the proposal of the Government and that of the noble Lord were in effect the same, both being to enable the Commissioners to make provision for carrying on the same good work of University extension, not by means of confiscation of College revenues, but by sending teachers to the large towns. He feared, however, that the Amendment was so drawn as to admit of the appropriation of University funds to the payment of secretaries and so on who would be located out of the University, and would be as much municipal officers as a town clerk.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE assured the Committee that nothing was further from his intention, and he believed the clause was framed to carry it out.

MR. MUNDELLA, as one connected with towns in which the University Extension scheme was being worked with great success, wished to say, on the part of those towns, that they desired to pay for all the teaching they received. The relations of those towns with the University Staff were characterized by mutual regard and appreciation, and the towns were only anxious that the members of the staff should lose no advantages. The object of the Amendment was to authorize the payment of an organizing Staff, such as a secretary to the syndicate and an inspector to examine and report upon the work done in the towns, which supervision would be undertaken on account of the University. For all besides that the towns were willing and anxious to provide, regarding University extension as the greatest educational movement of the time after the development of elementary education. The towns could not go to the University, and they found the University coming to them. In Sheffield there were 1,500 and in Nottingham 1,000 students of all positions in life, who received the same instruction in the same classes. A bookseller had told him that, in consequence of this movement, he had sold in one year more books on political economy and constitutional history than he had sold in many years previously; and it was one of the most hopeful signs of the times that these subjects were being studied by the trades unionists, who carried their textbooks about with them, and had their proficiency tested by examination and recognized by certificates. A pleasing result was the development of voluntary effort in all forms, up to the munificence which prompted an anonymous donation of £10,000 to Nottingham, and a gift of £20,000 from Mr. Mark Firth to Sheffield for the erection of University buildings, which would be an ornament to each town. It was thus the towns were doing their part, and Parliament would be glad to do anything in could to encourage the work.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, there was really very little difference between the noble Lord and himself, and apparently it arose from some misunderstanding of the Amendment. They agreed as to the advantages of the educational work commenced by Cambridge outside the University; that the management of it ought to be within the University, and that somebody ought to be paid for managing it. The difficulty in the way of creating an office within the University might not be insuperable, and it was absolutely essential that work done out of the University should not be paid for by the University, which had no superfluous funds. He would suggest to the noble Lord that he should not press the last provision of his Amendment, and that he should accept two Amendments to make it clear that no payment should be made out of University or College funds, and that any officer appointed should be resident in the University.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, he had great pleasure in accepting the proposal of the right hon Gentleman.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE was also quite satisfied with the proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the most convenient course would be for the noble Lord to withdraw his Amendment, and then for the Committee to agree to the clause as amended by the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in opposing the Amendment, said, the noble Lord proposed to omit the sub-section, which was already open to objection, and to make it worse. The noble Lord's new sub-section represented the views of Professor Goldwin Smith and of Dr. Jowett in favour of paying Examiners in the great provincial towns. If the Universities were rolling in wealth, it might be wise to adopt his scheme, but the Universities were poor, and the great towns were rich, and if they wanted to be lectured and examined, they ought to pay for the luxury themselves. The proper function of an University was not to teach school all over the country, and to examine all its adult inhabitants, but to give, by residence and by consort with the best minds, the highest training to the picked youth of England.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the lecturers who went to the towns would be paid by them; but the University would be ready to pay the secretary, because he would remain in the University, and because the Bill set up an office that was a University office. No change would be made as to any part of the money of the University.

Amendment (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) agreed to.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in moving to add, in page 6, the words—

"For altering the qualifications required for membership of congregation at Oxford, and for admission to the electoral roll of the University of Cambridge: and for limiting or abrogating the power of the convocation of the University of Oxford and of the senate of the University of Cambridge respectively to regulate matters relating to the studies of the University, and to the education given in it,"

said, there were two Bodies at Oxford and two Bodies at Cambridge, which were dealt with by this Amendment. A Body consisting of all who had taken their Master's degree, and numbering some thousands in each case, called Convocation at Oxford, and Senate at Cambridge, and a Body consisting of resident Masters called Congregation at Oxford and Electoral Roll at Cambridge. Roughly speaking, and without going into small details, it might be said that the larger Bodies, Convocation and Senate, had the following powers:—They elected the Members for the University, the Chancellors and the High Stewards, powers which the reformers would not touch; they interfered by veto with schemes for the reform of the studies of the Universities, a power which he believed they were not competent to exercise, and of which he would at least enable the Commissioners to deprive them if they thought fit. The smaller Bodies, Congregation at Oxford and Electoral Roll at Cambridge, elected the governing oligarchies, and consisted of some hundreds in each case. The majority of the members of these smaller Bodies were the persons most fit to exercise the powers at present entrusted to them; but in each there was a minority consisting of persons most unfit. Let him state the case of his own University, with which he was best acquainted. There were about 280 names upon the Electoral Roll of the University of Cambridge. About 200 of them were persons engaged in the government of the University or of Colleges, or in the educational work of the University. The remainder consisted chiefly of two classes, the parochial clergy and the sons of tradesmen and others resident in the town of Cambridge, who happened to have taken a Master's degree without ever having held any University or College office. It was a mere accident that these persons had their names placed upon the Electoral Roll, and he wished to remove them from a position in which it was never intended that they should be placed. This question of the government of the University was one doubtless which would have to be settled by a compromise, but he wished to point out to the House that it was in fact a compromise which he suggested. The Liberals did not like to see the country clergy brought up in hundreds to Oxford to vote against a Broad Church clergyman, whose name had been proposed as one of the University preachers for the year; but, although that was the case, they did not suggest that Convocation should be deprived of such a power. On the other hand, they did emphatically protest against the 30 or 40 curates at Oxford, who were locally known, he believed, as "the black dragons," being even potentially a controlling element in the direction of the studies of the University. It was not only of the curates that they complained; but why, he asked, should the ordinary residents of an ordinary provincial town, who happened to have taken their ordinary degrees, the doctors, the solicitors, and the chief constable, able and estimable persons though they might be, have a voice in the administration of affairs for which special qualifications and attention were needed? Now, when the Board of Studies at Oxford had agreed on some much needed reform, and had even succeeded in pushing it through Congregation in the teeth of the opposition of the local clergy, through the unanimity of the residents really engaged in educational work, Conservatives and Liberals alike, it had also to pass Convocation, for which the local clergy then whipped up their allies, and the country clergy then succeeded in throwing out the scheme at the trouble only of that which they were known greatly to enjoy—a jaunt to Oxford to beat the Radicals, a name applied by them to University Conservatives as much as to University Liberals. Such a day's pleasuring was an agreeable variety and relief from a dull country parish, while the men, perhaps a majority of Convocation, who would support the other side, were busily engaged at the Bar, in schools, or in public life, and could not come. An Amendment such as that which he proposed, which would give the Commissioners power to remove from the province of Convocation questions of University discipline and education, would probably do more than any other single reform to elevate the work of the Universities. The Government proposal in 1854 was his proposal, but their Bill was mangled in Committee upon this point. It was foreseen at that time, and prophesied in the debates that then took place, that the absurdity would become evident of committing the decision as to the studies of the University to a body of several thousand gentlemen who knew their University not as it was, but as it had been, and who could not be supposed, as a body, to have given much consideration to the question of what it ought to be. The right hon. Gentleman, who was now Member for Greenwich, pointed out with great clearness in the debates of 1854, that the persons who come up to vote, upon whichever side, were the red-hot partizans, and not the quiet, judicious, impartial men able to judge dispassionately of the merits of the case. Railways, and other modern facilities for travelling, had now completely changed the government of the Universities for the worse. In old days Convocation had been only attended by the residents, and they proposed once more to make the University in this matter what it had been.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, to add the words "(12.) For altering the qualifications required for membership of congregation at Oxford, and for admission to the electoral roll of the University of Cambridge; and for limiting or abrogating the power of the convocation of the University of Oxford and of the senate of the University of Cambridge respectively to regulate matters relating to the studies of the University, and to the education given in it."—(Sir Charles W. Dilke.)

MR. DODSON suggested that the words referring to the qualification for membership of the Congregation of Oxford and to admission to the Electoral Roll should be omitted, and that the first part of the Amendment should only be adopted.

MR. MOWBRAY pointed out what the present state of the law was in regard to the matter, and showed that in certain instances the proposed change might work disadvantageously.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE was willing to withdraw the first part of his Amendment, on the understanding that he would move it again.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE contended that this was too difficult a matter to be decided by an Amendment on the present Bill. The objection taken to the Electoral Roll that there was too much variety in its composition was, in his eyes, an advantage. He might, for instance, criticize the circumstance that they had on the Electoral Roll a certain number of men who were put on it as examiners ab extra, men who had never before seen Cambridge in their lives. Still, these persons were few and eminent, and brought in a new element, while the addition of resident M.A.'s, lay or clerical—parents, it might be, of students—not engaged in tuition was a man of the world addition which wholesomely counterbalanced the possibly too exclusively class feelings of a body containing none but teachers. He should be sorry to see the Roll revolutionized, by their names being struck off, and he trusted that for such a small objection they would not be called upon to enter into a matter which would produce great disputes in the University.

MR. MARTEN said, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Chelsea went entirely beyond the scope of the Bill. It would be much to be deplored if Parliament were to give the Commissioners such a power as that which the Amendment involved, and which would enable them to alter the existing Act passed in 1856 for the regulation of the University of Cambridge, whereby the composition of the Electoral Roll was determined. A body of persons more fit to be entrusted with a share of the government of a great University like Cambridge than those who formed the existing Electoral Roll could scarcely be found. If this matter was to be dealt with practically, there could not be a more convenient arrangement than that by which the working of the University was vested in those who were its actual officers for the time being, and at the same time Masters of Art, who were representatives of the liberal professions, engaged in the everyday business of the town, and well able to judge what was for the benefit of the University at large.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN could not conceive why a man should be thought fit to interfere in the government of the University of Cambridge because he resided within a certain number of yards of the Church of St. Mary's. Among the educating body of the University

there was but one opinion as to these extraneous elements—namely, that they were the greatest nuisance that could be conceived. He intimated that in the event of the present Amendment being rejected, he would move another one disenfranchising these members of the University directly rather than, as the present Amendment proposed, giving the power of disenfranchisement to the Commissioners.

MR. KNATCHBULL - HUGESSEN said, that if the question was to be raised at all it must be upon this clause, which determined the subjects with which the Commissioners might deal. As to curtailing the powers of Convocation to deal with matters affecting University education, he could hardly conceive a body less qualified to deal with such matters, consisting as it did of men scattered all over the country, having long lost, if they ever possessed, any knowledge of University affairs, and being occupied in various pursuits and professions elsewhere. As to the smaller Bodies, the Congregation at Oxford and the Electoral Roll at Cambridge, the proposition seemed to him incontrovertible that the people who managed the internal affairs of Oxford and Cambridge Universities should be engaged either in tuition or in the government of the Colleges. It was most undesirable to have the interference of another element consisting of people who had really no more concern in the management of the Colleges and Universities than any other members of Convocation. For his own part, he could not conceive why the Commissioners, who had already been entrusted with the exercise of most important functions, should not have the power to make alterations in the direction indicated by the Amendment, should public opinion in the University point to them as desirable.

MR. RODWELL opposed the Amendment. It involved a far greater question than was ever contemplated when the Bill was introduced, and struck at the very constitution of the University. If that question was to be raised at all, it ought to be raised in a more prominent shape, so that those who were to be disfranchised might have due notice of the proposal.

MR. JAMES agreed that the question raised by the Amendment would more properly be dealt with in a separate Bill. In the Hebdomadal Council of Oxford there were not six members who did not belong to the clerical party. Why a person living a mile and a-half from Carfax should be entitled to fill these important posts was most difficult to understand. A reformed Congregation would be much the best body for the election of certain offices now discharged by Convocation. At present there was much complaint of the appointment of improper persons, and what was going on now in the matter of canvassing with respect to the vacant offices of Public Orator and the Professorship of Poetry gave this Amendment greater importance. He trusted, therefore, that it would be generally supported by the House.

MR. GOSCHEN believed that in 1854, when this subject was before the House, it was debated for several nights, and if the right hon. Gentleman wished that could be done again, as hon. Members on his side of the House had plenty to say and plenty of arguments to advance against this proposal. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that hon. Members on that side of the House attached the greatest importance to this Amendment. It might be desirable to raise the question at issue upon subsequent clauses, allowing the present Amendment to be withdrawn for that purpose; but, if its withdrawal was objected to, he would support the Amendment. The addition of the resident clergy to Congregation had not worked satisfactorily. The fact of residence alone was not a sufficient qualification, to the exclusion of non-residents. It was not, however, a question between the clergy and the laity. He would prefer the opinion of the purely University body on purely University questions. The functions performed by the two bodies had not yet been discussed, and should be raised at some stage of the Bill. The exercise of patronage was liable to abuse, and no more important function could be assigned to the Commissioners than to see that these abuses were not perpetuated.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY did not complain of fair debate, but what had been alleged against the clause went a great deal beyond what was the original purport of the Bill. The Government had no intention whatever of making this Bill a large disfranchising measure, and the noble Lord who introduced the Bill last year in another House distinctly stated that fact. With regard to the Public Orator and Professorship of Poetry, he saw no reason why Convocation should not appoint them. The Professor of poetry should be a man known beyond the University to have a special knowledge of the subject and a critical acquaintance with it. The duties of Public Orator were not those of teaching, and therefore no real objection could be urged against the present system of election. With regard to the statutes passed by Convocation, non-resident Masters of Arts did not leave their parishes to come up and vote unless there was some important change under discussion; and unless the members on both sides were nearly equal, these gentlemen could not turn the balance. Indeed, there were no reasons why they should be all on one side. There were 364 members of Convocation at Oxford, and not 20 were resident M.A.'s not connected with the teaching of the University. It could therefore be only on very particular occasions that their vote could influence the result. They had but a small modicum of power, and there was no reason why they should vote any one particular way. It was only natural that members of either University residing at Oxford or Cambridge should take a greater interest in its management than those resident at a distance were able to do. When statutes were passed the non-resident Masters of Arts could put the necessary check on them; for although passed by one body they required to be confirmed by the other. But it was seldom that non-resident members had to interfere. Considering, then, the real scope of the Bill, he could not consent to any Amendment like this, which would interfere with the very roots of the constitution of the Universities.

MR. GOSCHEN said, they were all agreed that after the passing of this Bill the Universities should be left in peace for some time, and not be harassed with the immediate expectation of further legislation. Surely, then, it would be wise that the present Bill should deal with all the matters likely to arise soon or in the near future. If this question were not now fully considered, it ought to be at some future stage of the progress of the Bill.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Amendment which the hon. Baronet has proposed is one which, if passed into law, cannot fail to have a permanent and, in the opinion of some who are very well qualified to judge, a most salutary influence upon the future of the Universities. It has absolutely nothing political, religious, or controversial about it. Its effect will be educational and educational alone. The arguments in its favour appeal exactly as much to hon. Gentlemen opposite as to hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. In fact, it will be almost unnecessary to use those arguments; because, if once fairly stated, the case is so plain that it may fairly be left to argue itself. I feel satisfied that hon. Gentlemen are of opinion that this Bill, which professes to be a Bill for making our Universities as useful as possible, should secure that the task of directing the studies of the Universities should be lodged in the hands that are best capable of discharging it. If we omit to ensure this we may just as well drop the Bill at once. Now, the process through which any scheme for altering the system of education in the University of Cambridge has to pass is as follows:—Let us suppose that there is a general feeling that enough attention is not paid to the historical side of Greek and Latin literature. In order to correct this tendency, the Board which has the supervision of classical studies comes to the conclusion that greater weight should be given to history in the final degree of examination. The first step that the Classical Board takes is to lay their proposal before the Council in a Report. The Council, in its turn, appoints an extraordinary Syndicate, which reports on the matter to the Senate, and the Senate meets in the Art Schools to discuss the Report of the Council. Up to this point there is nothing to criticize; but from this point forward the process of University legislation becomes unequalled in absurdity among all the methods of transacting public business which men have ever adopted since society became organized. The Senate, as hon. Members very well know, consists of more than 5,000 persons, of all ages and callings, scattered over the whole civilized and uncivilized world from Calcutta to the Lands End. The consequence is that the body which assembles in the Art Schools to discuss the question is not, and cannot be, the Senate, but those members of the Senate who are resident at Cambridge, and who are engaged in carrying on the work of the University. These gentlemen, than whom a more competent body for the purpose could not easily be found, take the matter into consideration. Speeches are made for and against. The personal influence of the great authorities on classical questions—such men as Dr. Thompson, Mr. Munro, Dr. Lightfoot, Canon Westcott—are brought to bear. Opinions are altered and modified; and then I presume hon. Gentleman suppose that the assembly, having had the case fully laid before them, proceed in due course to a decision. But that is not the way in which matters are carried on under the existing constitution of the University. Instead of having a division upon the spot, while those present are fresh from the argument, a future day is fixed, on which a poll is taken; a poll not confined to those who have listened to the debate in the Arts Schools—not even limited to those who are practically engaged in the educational work of the place—but a poll at which every one of the 5,000 members of the Senate who will take the trouble to come up to Cambridge will have a right to vote. Then at once there begin all those proceedings with which it is the misfortune of all of us here present to be practically acquainted. One poll is very much like another, whether it is about the election of a Member of Parliament or the choice between one system of study and another. There is a canvass and a whip. Post-cards and circulars go out by the thousand. Offers of hospitality are lavishly made; for there is no law against treating in questions of higher education. Men come up to vote this way or that, not because they know anything about the merits of the case, but because they have received a pressing summons from someone who, 30 years before, rowed next but one to them in their College boat. When the day comes the resident members look anxiously round them to see whether there are many strange faces; for they are only too well aware that, if such is the case, the deliberate opinion of those who, responsible for the education of the University on abstruse and delicate questions which it requires a life-time to study, may be swamped by a multitude of persons who are no more fit to decide such questions than a country gentleman of 50 would be fit to draw up a new system of infantry tactics because between the age of 20 and 22 he had been a cornet of dragoons. Hon. Gentlemen may think that I exaggerate; but, in describing the results of a system as anomalous as this, no one can exaggerate, unless he has an imagination much more lively than mine. Some years ago—certainly not a year too soon—it was proposed to introduce a reform of a most vital nature into the final classical examination. The great majority of those concerned in conducting the classical studies of the place were in favour of the change. But, unfortunately, the poll was taken on a day when, besides the excitement of the contest, there was the additional attraction of a flower-show. Non-resident Masters of Arts trooped into the town from a circuit of 50 miles round. Their wives and daughters went to the flower-show, while they themselves crowded into the Senate House, in order to overset, by an off-hand vote, a scheme which had been drawn up with infinite care and after long consideration by a committee composed of some of the greatest scholars of Europe. Sir, it is bad enough for those who have been debating a question in this House, with full knowledge of the subject, when the bell rings, and a crowd of Gentlemen hurry to the Bar, ready to dispose, between two mouthfuls of soup, of a matter the nature of which they have perhaps heard for the first time from our worthy Doorkeeper; but what is that to the crying abuse of a system under which abstruse educational problems, on which it may depend whether the intellectual efforts of the coming generation are to be directed into the right or the wrong channel, are decided by the haphazard vote of people who actually were 100 miles away from the place when the question was discussed, and who, when the matter is once settled, will return home to their own avocations, and very likely by the end of the month will have forgotten that such a question has ever existed. That was the method in which the all-important question of whether Greek should be made a compulsory subject was settled, and, as the people who know best appear to think, wrongly settled a few years ago. It is to enable the Commissioners to apply a remedy to this state of things that the hon. Baronet has placed his Amendment on the Paper. If the Committee thinks fit to agree to this Amendment; if the Commissioners—leaving to the Senate and to Convocation their ancient and splendid functions, the right of electing the University representatives and many of the University officials, the right of petitioning this House, and of laying addresses at the foot of the Throne—confine the duty of superintending educational arrangements to a smaller and more responsible body, then a reform will have been effected which is eagerly desired by many of those who are most actively engaged in the practical work of our Universities. The judgment of hon. Members must, I am satisfied, be in favour of this Amendment; and, on a matter which does not touch Party, the judgment of hon. Members is never appealed to in vain.

MR. STAVELEY HILL observed that there were other assemblies besides the Senate of the University in which it was not necessary that a member should hear all the discussion to enable him to vote. At Cambridge and Oxford the great desire was to bring the question to an end as soon as possible, so that they might know what changes were to be made. He was a member of Congregation and Convocation, and no great change was desired in either of those bodies. He had never heard any dissatisfaction with the present state of things. They could not attempt to make any alteration in this respect in the present Bill, as the subject was not within its scope.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND could not agree with the last speaker that there was no dissatisfaction with the Governing Bodies of the University. It was very doubtful whether the constitution of Congregation did not place too large a power in the hands of the tutorial interest, many of them being very young, acute, and subtle men, with a very moderate acquaintance with the general affairs of the world. Hastily to decide now that the Convocation should be confined to the present teaching members of the University might possibly be a leap in the dark, which might hereafter be regretted. He did not think the University would rest till the Governing Bodies were improved, but seeing no prospect of the question being thoroughly settled by separate legislation, his only course was to support the Amendment.

MR. C. DALRYMPLE said, it was only on particular occasions, as at the election of the Public Orator and the like, that non-resident Masters of Arts voted, and it was an exaggeration to say that the outside voters really overbore the opinion of the University. It appeared always to be assumed that the opinion of non-resident was adverse to that which was wise and enlightened, as well as to any change in the University system. He (Mr. Dalrymple) could remember at least one occasion, when non-residents flocked to Cambridge to support a proposal for a readership in American history, which had been strongly opposed by resident-members of the University—a proposal which, at all events, had the merit of novelty, and might have been of great use to the University. His objection to the Amendment was that the opinion of the outside world was very often of great value, and he believed that, as a rule, questions of education were left to the resident Masters of Arts.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, as to the objection that this Amendment was not within the scope of the Bill, he begged to remind the hon. Members who made it that the Committee had not passed the Preamble, and that the object of postponing the Preamble was that in case of modifying the scope of the Bill the Preamble might be modified accordingly. The Amendment had nothing whatever to do with the election of Members of that House. He would have been willing to withdraw his Amendment and then to propose it in the form suggested some time ago had he not been prevented from doing so.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 115; Noes 143: Majority 28.—(Div. List, No. 113.)

MR. COURTNEY, in moving his Amendment, stated that as far back as the year 1869 there had been a College for women modelled after the organization of the Colleges, and its promoters desired that the students should be subjected to examinations like those at Oxford or Cambridge. The authorities at Cambridge were not prepared at the time to accede to this request, but they had intimated that the Examiners, in their private capacity, might look through the papers, and this had been done from the year 1870 to the present time. In that year the Examiners of the previous examination had consented to furnish these female students with Examination papers and report on their answers, judging them by the University standard. That had been done, and the examiners had certified with respect to them, and the custom had prevailed for the last seven years, not only in the case of the previous examination, but in the case of the pass and the higher examinations for honours. He could not better explain the process than by reading a letter which had been written by one of the examiners of the Classical Tripos in 1873, in which he stated that his colleagues and himself would be happy to examine papers sent up to them, but that it must be distinctly understood that they did so in their private capacity. The whole scope of his Amendment was to give an official recognition to what had thus been done in an unofficial manner. Nothing was wanted but the recognition of the University. He would point out the extent to which this examination of women had been carried. In the year 1870 five students passed the previous examinations, two of them in honours. In 1871 two others passed in honours. In 1872 five passed, and four took honours. In 1873 two passed, and two took honours. In 1874 five passed, and two took honours. In 1875 six passed, and five took honours. In 1876 18 passed, and 12 took honours. Of late years ladies had been tested by the degree examination standards. In 1873 a lady took a position equivalent to a second-class in the Mathematical Tripos; and another, a second in the Classical Tripos. In 1874 two passed in Natural Science. In 1875 two reached the Classical Tripos standard. All these came from Girton College. There was also at Cambridge, Newnham Hall, and an arrangement by which ladies who were members neither of Girton nor of Newnham were admitted to the lectures of the University Professors, and students from Newnham had been examined like the students from Girton. It was not impossible that the ladies attending the Professorial lectures might be admitted to examination in a similar way. All that he wished to suggest was that what was now done by favour should be done publicly and in a recognized manner. The matter was one of considerable importance, and it could not be argued that the practice which the Amendment proposed to legitimate was novel or dangerous. If a gentleman wished to send his boy to a school he could ascertain the character of the schoolmaster; but in the case of girls parents had no kind of authority to which to refer. But the voluntary organization to which he had referred had introduced such an authority, which had been found most useful. Public schools for girls, analogous to high schools for boys, had been established at Notting Hill, Chelsea, Clapham, Norwich, Manchester, and other parts of the country. He did not know, considering the strictly permissive character of this proposal, what objections would be raised to it. He must add a word or two on the second part of his Amendment. Last year an Act was passed enabling any authority which could grant degrees to men under the Medical Act to confer them on women also. It might, perhaps, be argued that under the provisions of that Statute the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge could grant medical degrees to women. But his present proposal did not relate to the granting of degrees of any kind. At present the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge granted licences to practise medicine, but only as a corollary to a medical degree. He now proposed to enable the Universities to grant such licences to practise to persons who had not graduated, provided they fulfilled the necessary conditions of knowledge. The sub-section was purely permissive, and if it were passed the probability was that Cambridge would take the matter up, and that Oxford would not. The greater liberality of Cambridge in this respect was, perhaps, due to gratitude for what that University owed to women. It was a remarkable circumstance that at Cambridge six Colleges were founded by the benevolence of ladies. Considering, therefore, how much we were thus indebted to women, we ought to do what we could now to promote the education of women.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, after sub-section 11, to insert the words "(12.) For enabling the University to examine female students concurrently with male students, subject to such conditions regulating the residence and discipline of such female students as the University may from time to time approve or ordain; and for enabling the University to grant licences to practise medicine to female students who have passed the examinations and fulfilled the conditions which are necessary for obtaining degrees in medicine in the case of male students in that faculty."—(Mr. Courtney.)

MR. FORSYTH said, that, although no one could accuse him of being indifferent to the claims of women, he confessed he felt some difficulty with regard to this sub-section, which was rather ambiguously worded. Its first object was to enable the University "to examine female students concurrently with male students." That meant, he supposed, that they were to be in the same lecture-rooms, to sit side by side on the same benches, and that the Examiners were to walk up and down while the young gentlemen and young ladies were answering the questions. He was afraid the attentions of the young gentlemen would be paid to the young ladies, and not to the examination papers. His real objection to the clause had reference to the first part of it. If ladies were examined in classics and mathematics by University officials, and no degrees were conferred, no better results would follow than were now attainable at Girton College. If the hon. Member for Liskeard had had the courage to carry his Amendment to its logical conclusion, and had proposed that the ladies who acquitted themselves well in the examinations should be named in the Tripos list, and should afterwards have degrees conferred upon them, he would have voted for the proposal. He thought no reasonable argument could be shown why women should not be able to attain degrees, if they passed the proper examinations. As to the second part of the sub-section, he thought it right that licences should be given to female students of medicine who proved themselves fit to practise.

MR. HOPWOOD supported what he regarded as the just demand embodied in the Amendment. He fully recognized the great services which the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken had rendered to the cause of women in this country. He regretted that his hon. and learned Friend had not the courage of his convictions, and had not suggested such an alteration in the proposal of the hon. Member for Liskeard as would carry those convictions to their legitimate conclusion. In reference to the argument that nothing would be gained, he thought a great deal would be gained by the adoption of the proposal; he thought that the mere fact of official recognition of what was now done unofficially would be an immense gain. This Amendment was moderate and effective. It was a very just demand upon the part of those who were making great exertions to elevate those women who showed that they had talent and ability, and, therefore, he should vote for it.

MR. GORST concurred in hoping that the Government would see its way to concede something at least in the direction of the hon. Member's Amendment. He reminded the House that last Session an Act was passed empowering the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to grant medical degrees. The Amendment only asked that the Commissioners should recognize existing facts. Women were examined at the present time, and it was only sought to give the examinations official sanction. He must, however, express his concurrence in the opinion that the first part of the Amendment did not go far enough.

MR. RATHBONE said, the great value of what was at present done was shown in the very superior class of school-mistresses which the system had been the means of providing in some of the schools for girls throughout the country. Female education was one of the most important works of the present day, and nothing would tend to give it such an impetus as to provide a better class of mistresses for girls' schools. The adoption of this proposal would be invaluable to those engaged in the work, and would materially strengthen their hands.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he thought it was a proposal which would introduce a very great change, which ought, if made at all, to be made in a more open and direct form. Many ladies had distinguished themselves at the voluntary examinations; but this Amendment would legalize the position of these ladies as being formally entitled to the honour examinations of the Universities. It could not end there. If once ladies were admitted as a constituent part of the studying or Undergraduate body, not only would they claim to compete with men in the degree examination, and use the degree to which that was the portal, but they would establish an equitable claim for the substantial awards to which examinations lead and demand to be candidates for Scholarships and Fellowships. If Fellows, how could they be excluded from becoming tutors, deans, and masters of Colleges? A charming and an accomplished lady dean would be sure to draw a large number of gentlemen Undergraduates to the College which she ruled; but what would Paterfamilias say? These were not extreme considerations; for the fact was the Amendment proposed to make a great change, as to which no one could see the end.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, the hon. Member argued against the Amendment as being the thin end of the wedge, and, as usual, he was against all change. He would support the Amendment because it sought to recognize and to regulate the examinations now conducted by the University Examiners at Cambridge of the students of Girton and Newnham Colleges. Great efforts were now being made to improve the education of girls, especially in connection with some of the endowed schools and in public day schools; but the great difficulty was to obtain really efficient teachers. The Colleges to which he had referred were doing much to supply that want, and by means of the voluntary and gratuitous assistance of the University Examiners an independent test was applied to the attainments of their students; and it was because it was now proposed to enable the Universities to take in hand this work now done in a manner unrecognized by them that he should cordially support the Amendment.

MR. MUNDELLA pointed out that the examination of the two sexes together would not be a novelty in connection with the Universities, the present local examinations being conducted in that manner. Women had no professional career open to them. If such career could be opened to those who distinguished themselves at the University, some hope might be entertained for the better education of girls.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY understood the object of the proposal to be to bring women in as Undergraduates of the Universities. Practically, it was proposed to put them under the authority of Proctors. He was not opposed by any means to female students having the opportunity of passing examinations and obtaining degrees which might enable them to fill situations and practise medicine; but what he did object to was that they should be subjected to the same conditions and pass through the same examinations concurrently with the male students, for whom originally all those conditions were devised. The hon. Member for Liskeard had spoken of the Colleges which in times past were founded at Cambridge by women, but he must remember for the education of men; and it had been overlooked that in those times the education of the women was carried on in convents, and, of course, separately. He was not aware that Girton College admitted young men. In that very case the advantages of separation seemed to be recognized. The scholars there were under the superintendence of women; they had lecturers of their own; and, he was told, that when they attended lectures away from their College, they still had lecturers for themselves. The whole system, therefore, was one, not of mixed and concurrent education for both sexes, but distinctly of separate education. He believed the success of the teaching was greatly owing to the privacy of the arrangements. Believing, as he did, that this separation was most desirable, he must oppose the Motion of the hon. Member. If the object was to overturn the whole system of male and female education in the country, this was a matter which ought to be settled by Parliament, and ought not to be delegated to Commissioners. With respect to the latter part of the Amendment, relating to the granting of licences to female medical students, it had already been pointed out that it was not needed. If the Universities wished to give medical degrees, they might do so; but he did not think it likely they would exercise that power. While recognizing the importance of giving educational facilities to women, he thought the proposal of the hon. Member for Liskeard to bring female students under the regular discipline of the Universities was not likely to meet the wishes of those whom it was intended to benefit, and that the attempt to carry on the education of both sexes together would only destroy the system of separate education for young ladies, which was at present flourishing.

MR. COURTNEY explained that he did not wish, as the right hon. Gentleman supposed, to bring the girls of Girton College under the same regulations with respect to discipline as the Undergraduates at the Universities. He observed, moreover, that it was not proposed to delegate any absolute final authority to the Commissioners, but only to invite them to frame some working plan which would in due course be submitted to the University Commission and to Parliament.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he at last understood the purport of the Amendment. The Universities had been spoken of by the advanced Liberals as "monastic institutions." He was not prepared to vote for their being "conventual institutions" as well.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY moved, in page 6, line 23, after "the same," to insert—

"(13) For the administration of the University Press and of the funds belonging thereto, and for the publication, not less than once in each year, of the accounts thereof; (14) For the management of the financial affairs of the University."

He remarked that the Press at Oxford some 15 or 20 years ago brought in a net revenue of £13,000, a sum which was now considerably less; but he could not think it right that no accurate information should be given as to what became of a sum of money amounting to a quarter of the whole annual revenue of the University. Account should be rendered of so important a source of income. It was to be remembered that the Delegates of the Press enjoyed the monopoly of printing Bibles, and it might be urged that Convocation had a right to know how its servants administered their money. He could not admit the plea so often put forward, that the University Press was a trading concern. If that was the case, it would be the first occasion on which he had ever heard that a great centre of learning was a trading concern. And in that case the Press authorities should do what other trading concerns did, and lay their accounts before Parliament, instead of shrinking from publicity. He would not charge any individual with mismanagement; he merely wanted to learn the prospective income of the University.

MR. MOWBRAY said, his noble Friend had not been quite clear as to the authority to whom these accounts should be rendered; one thing, however, was quite clear, that the names of the Board of Delegates furnished an ample guarantee against maladministration. It was to be recollected, moreover, that the Clarendon Press was divided into two parts, one of which certainly was a trading concern, and the managers had their capital embarked in it; therefore the public had no right to inquire into it.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday next.

House resumed.

FURTHER PROCEEDING RESUMED.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he was about to propose that the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Dease), and the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Clare Read) be Members of the Committee. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) had already placed the name of Mr. Dease on the Paper, and he (Viscount Sandon) was informed that it would be acceptable to hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side. On further communication with the hon. Member for South Norfolk, he found that the hon. Member was still very much disinclined to serve on the Committee. All must regret if the hon. Member for South Norfolk persisted in his refusal. If the hon. Member for South Norfolk should be still unable to give the benefit of his services, he would then propose the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan), who, he believed, would be acceptable to the House. He begged, in the first place, to propose that the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Dease) be a Member of the Committee.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

MR. BUTT seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Dease be one other Member of the Select Committee."—(Viscount Sandon.)

MR. J. W. BARCLAY would like to hear something more about the representation of Scotland on the Committee. It was right that the various parts of the United Kingdom should be all fairly represented. He should be unwilling to put up anybody in opposition to the hon. Member for South Norfolk, but he approved the nomination of the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan).

MR. CALLAN said, that he had proposed the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), but since then the hon. and learned Gentleman whom he considered his Leader had proposed Mr. Dease; he would not therefore persevere. At the same time, he must state that the hon. Member for Meath had intimated, on seeing the name of Mr. Dease proposed, that he should decline to serve on the Committee.

MR. E. NOEL said, that he thought that the Scotch Members should be represented. He would not, however, press his Amendment.

MR. MARK STEWART said, that Scotland would be fairly represented.

MR. CLARE READ said, if he wanted an additional excuse for not serving on the Committee, this short debate had furnished him with one. He was extremely indebted to the noble Lord for his courtesy in placing his name on the Paper, and he felt also the compliment which had been paid to him by Members on both sides of the House who had desired that he should be one of the Committee. He had, however, objected to serve from the first. He had told everybody so, and he still adhered to his determination. In the first place, he believed that this Committee was not wanted. In his judgment, a good debate in that House would be much more serviceable than a Committee. What was wanted was not inquiry, but action—short, sharp, and decisive. He also objected to the scope of the Committee.

If it were simply to inquire into any circumstances which might have occurred since the last Cattle Plague Committee, such as the imports of American meat, he should have been willing to serve upon it; but, having had the honour of serving on the Cattle Plague Commission, and on most of the Committees appointed to consider the subject since 1865, he had no wish to go over the whole of that evidence again, as he was quite sure would be the fate of these 27 hon. Gentlemen who would have that great pleasure during the next three months in the very warm rooms upstairs. If his opinion were of any use to the Committee, they had nothing to do but to summon him to give evidence. He was happy that his declining to serve would enable the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgowshire to be added to the Committee, on which he trusted England, Ireland, and Scotland would now be fairly represented.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER declined to enter into any discussion with his hon. Friend as to the scope of the Committee; but he thought he expressed the general feeling of both sides of the House when he said that they all deeply regretted his hon. Friend's refusal to serve on the Committee. In so refusing they were sure he was guided by no other than the motives which always actuated him—public spirit and a desire to do what he believed to be right.

MR. PARNELL regretted that the same spirit which animated the Government to-night had not been displayed the other night, when the nomination of the Committee occupied six hours of the time of the House. He begged to say that he had no intention of serving on the Committee. He had no wish to serve on any Committee of that House, much less on a Committee the appointment of which was marked by such a scene as that witnessed the other night. If he had been appointed he might have had his opportunities of doing good in that House late at night diminished.

Question put, and agreed to.

VISCOUNT SANDON next proposed the name of the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan), and though he regretted the refusal of the hon. Member for South Norfolk to serve, he congratulated the House on having reached the last name upon the Committee.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD complained that in studying national interests nothing had been said of those of the Principality of Wales, which produced a large number of cattle. Flintshire and Denbighshire had suffered from the cattle plague, and it was quite necessary that Wales should be represented on the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Power to send for persons, papers' and records; Five to be the quorum.

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. COURTNEY wished to make some observations on the proposals made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech with regard to Savings Banks. There was a deficiency of £3,250,000 upon the Savings Banks account, and the object which the right hon. Gentleman said he had in view was to stop that leak. His proposals, however, when examined, would not really stop the present leak, but would have the effect of starting a new one. The Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt received large sums from the trustees of the old Savings Banks established about 60 years ago, and those sums were invested in the public funds. The Commissioners allowed the trustees 3½ per cent interest, and upon those transactions the deficiency he had referred to had arisen. The Commissioners also received the monies deposited in the Post Office Savings Banks, allowing 2½ per cent interest upon them; those deposits they likewise invested in the public funds; and upon them they had obtained a certain surplus. On account of the Friendly Societies' Funds there was also a serious deficiency. The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to place to the credit of revenue the amount of the surplus obtained from the Post Office Savings Banks. Now, suppose, by way of illustration, that £94 was received from a depositor and invested in the purchase of £100 of Consols, the Commissioners would receive 3 per cent interest for the investment, and they would pay the depositor 47s., leaving an apparent annual profit of 13s., which they would be bound to pay into the Exchequer. But if the depositor wished to draw out his money when Consols fell below 94, say to 89 or 90, and the Commissioners had then to sell out, they would be landed in a deficiency. How did the deficiency of £3,250,000 arise? Not because the National Debt Commissioners paid more interest than they received, but because they bought stock in times of prosperity and sold it in times of depression. The gross amount of interest or dividend received by the National Debt Commissioners in respect of ordinary Savings Banks since the year 1817 was £62,112,000, while the total amount of interest paid and credited to Savings Banks by them during the same period amounted only to £54,339,000. So far as interest was concerned, therefore, they had been gainers by nearly £8,000,000. Their losses really occurred in the depreciation of Stock; and, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer made no provision for that, he would inevitably land himself in a deficiency. He contended that one-fifth of the interest received ought to be allowed as a depreciation fund. The plan he would recommend was this. There was a deficiency of £3,250,000. That was part of the National Debt; therefore, they might as well, first as well as last, hand over to the Commissioners another book-debt, to add to the National Debt, in order to make things square. That would involve no change in the finance accounts of the year; and having thus balanced the accounts, the only rational way of proceeding was to reduce the interest in order to keep the account solvent. He thought 2½ instead of 3½ per cent, as at the present, would be the proper rate to pay. That was the honest course, and he did not think that would be at all an unpopular proceeding.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed that this subject had only a year or two ago excited considerable discussion, and therefore it was not necessary for him to go into it at any great length. He quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the proposal in the

Viscount Sandon

Bill did not completely deal with the whole question of the Savings Banks accounts. They had not attempted to touch the question of the accumulated deficiency. That was rather a complicated question, with which it would be necessary one of these days to deal. They had also avoided raising the question of an alteration in the rate of interest allowed. If they were to go into the question of the rate allowed for Savings Banks' deposits, they ought to look into the whole arrangements, and consider whether any alteration should be made in the limits of deposits allowed, which was an interesting but hardly a pressing subject. There was, however, this matter of the deficiency, which year by year was continually increasing, and which it was undesirable to allow to increase. But, then, there was one kind of increase which was real, and another which was a matter of account. Suppose the Funds one day this year were 94, you made the assets of the Commissioners so much. Next year the Funds might be 96, and then the assets would be a great deal more. That was a sort of variation which was a matter of account. It should be always borne in mind that the whole national income was security for the deposits, and there was no danger to the depositors. But then there was this continually going on, there was a larger amount credited to Savings Bank depositors year by year than was earned on the amount deposited to their account. For instance, as he had shown in his Budget Statement, the income which accrued to the Savings Banks for the year ending November, 1876, amounted to £1,307,000, whereas the interest credited to the trustees was £1,380,000, showing a deficiency of £73,000. In the same way, on the Friendly Societies' account there was a deficiency of, he thought, £49,000. The rate of interest was fixed by Act of Parliament, and it was really desirable that Parliament should know that it was giving year by year, in the shape of interest, more than it was earning, and then the country would see what the cost of this system was. The deficiency was, no doubt, at present a part of the National Debt. With regard to the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish), to the effect that the Government should make some allowance for the depreciation in the value of the securities, he was prepared to accept it.

Mr. DODSON thought that a good deal might be said in favour of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the Savings Banks funds. It would, to use the words of the right hon. Gentleman, "stop the leak," and prevent the deficiency from growing larger. The proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would, at any rate, bring under the eyes of the public the annual loss, and pave the way for the proposal to reduce the rate of interest to the sum which was properly earned. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman intended to accept the Amendment about to be proposed by the noble Lord the Member for the West Riding.

Mr. MUNDELLA suggested that the morning after the Budget Statement Members should be supplied with a printed balance-sheet, showing the estimates of receipt and expenditure of the current year, in order that they might be able to discuss the Budget proposals with advantage.

Mr. W. H. SMITH said, that the suggestion had already been considered, and arrangements would be made for the future to supply the House with the information suggested by the hon. Gentleman.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 6, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 7 (Provisions of Income Tax Acts to apply to duties hereby granted).

Mr. HIBBERT moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 35, at end to add the words—

"Provided, That in estimating the balance of the profits and gains of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade chargeable under Schedule (D) of the said Act, or for the purpose of assessing the duty thereon, in addition to the deduction allowed from such profits or gains for the supply of repairs or alterations of any implements, utensils, or articles employed for the purpose of such trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern, a reasonable sum shall be allowed to be deducted from such profits or gains to set against the depreciation arising from the wear and tear of such implements, utensils, or articles."

He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider the injustice done to manufacturers under the existing law, by not allowing them to take into account the depreciation of machinery when they made their returns of profits.

MR. ORR EWING said, he cordially supported the Amendment. When the income tax was introduced by Sir Robert Peel, he was sure it was his intention that the manufacturer or mine-owner, or any person who carried on large works, should only pay upon the balance which he could divide amongst his partners; and he was also sure that if the return was made honestly the Government would not lose by agreeing to the Amendment. An honest man must keep books, and therefore must know the amount deducted for depreciation. What was done in Scotland? He did not know what was done in England, but in Scotland, if any person was doubted as having made an honest return, he was obliged to exhibit his books to the Inland Revenue authorities, who would make him add to his income tax the amount of depreciation which he honestly believed he ought to deduct before he divided his profits among his partners. He could not believe that so unjust a principle was intended ever to have been adopted. Under a Treasury Minute, issued many years ago, those who had property in ships were allowed to deduct depreciation of 10 or 15 per cent; but any person being a printer, spinner, weaver, or any other trade, was obliged to add it to the balance which he had to divide. He could not conceive a greater injustice to trade, and he did hope the Government would see their way to remedy the injustice. At the same time, he did not think these words would exactly carry out the views which he held upon the subject, but he could not see how the Government could contest the principle, and more especially when this right was granted to shipping, how they could refuse to grant it to other kinds of manufactures. There never was a time when there was a greater need for the Government to remedy this injustice to the manufacturers of Great Britain.

MR. HERMON also supported the Amendment.

MR. ANDERSON said, there was no Member of the House who had ever been connected with the manufacturing interest but had felt the injustice of the mode in which the income tax was levied. He had himself known many cases of great hardship, and it was only surprising the country had submitted to it so long. He could only account for it on the supposition that the income tax had always been deemed a sort of temporary measure that we were to get rid of some day, and in that hope people had submitted to it. The case of the mine owner was even worse than that of the manufacturer, because everything a man took out of a mine he was absolutely taking out of capital, and, therefore, to make him pay on it as profits was most unfair, for it was making him pay, not on profit, but on capital. He hoped the Amendment would be adopted.

MR. WHITWELL urged that the change proposed in the Amendment should be made as an act of justice, and not on account of the depression of trade.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that an allowance was at present made which substantially came to the same thing as was now asked—namely, the deduction allowed for repairs and other fixed charges over a period of three years; but when the hon. Member asked them to go further, and allow for depreciation, he thought the proposal was an unreasonable one; for it would, in fact, be allowing the deduction twice over. There was no standard by which depreciation could be tested; but the Government were most anxious to deal with each case that was brought before the Exchequer, and deal fairly with it. As an instance of the difficulty to be dealt with, it had been shown that in one case £20,000 had been charged for depreciation on a plant that originally cost only £10,000. At the same time, the Inland Revenue Department were quite willing to deal liberally, and even generously, with those who came under the Schedule in the matter referred to.

MR. HIBBERT, in reply, could not consider that his Amendment had so wide a scope.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 4th May 1877.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—First Reading—
Law of Evidence Amendment * (63).RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—NEUTRALITY OF THE SUEZ CANAL.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR: My Lords, in putting the Question to Her Majesty's Government of which I have given Notice, I wish to ask for such information as it may be convenient for the Government to give with regard to the neutrality of the Suez Canal, with special reference to its free navigation for vessels of commerce. At the time of the opening of the Canal it was declared by the 14th Article of the Concession that it should be neutral and open to ships of commerce of all countries. The Article runs—

The intention here expressed is evident—it is that the ports connected with the Canal, as well as the Canal itself, should be neutral and open alike to vessels of commerce of all countries. But it is obvious that this declaration alone is not a sufficient security, and that circumstances might arise which would cause complications, and possibly result, if not permanently, yet for a time, in obstructing the free navigation of commerce through the Canal. I might, perhaps, illustrate what I mean by referring to existing circumstances. Port Said, the entrance to the Suez Canal, is a port belonging to a country which at the present moment is at war with another maritime Power. For the purposes of war it might be necessary on the one side to close the port, or on the other to blockade it; and in either case the navigation of the Canal would be stopped. What now exists on the Danube might at any time occur at Port Said. I do not mean to say it is a probable event, but it is obvious that under certain circumstances it is a possible event; and I would put it to Her Majesty's Government as a question not undeserving of notice whether some security might not be provided against possible commercial difficulties by a joint guarantee of the Maritime Powers of Europe—if such does not already exist—or in some other way that the Canal should be open at all times and under all circumstances for the purposes of commerce. I wish to offer this explanation of the sense in which I have used the word “neutrality”—namely, as in the Article of Concession to which I have referred, and not as in any way applying to ships of war. My Question is—to what extent the neutrality of the Suez Canal is secured, and whether there is any guarantee of such neutrality by the Maritime Powers of Europe? I have further to ask, if there is any objection to laying upon the Table of the House Papers or Correspondence relative to the Suez Canal bearing date since June, 1876, to the present time?

LORD HOUGHTON hoped that in his reply the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs would not limit his Answer to the free navigation of the Canal to vessels of commerce, but would state how the case stood with respect to vessels of war, which appeared to him to be, under existing circumstances, the most important point with which we had to deal. He believed the Russian Government had ships of war in the Chinese Seas and other parts of the world which they might wish to bring into the Mediterranean for warlike purposes. It was therefore a matter of great consideration whether those ships would be allowed to pass through the Suez Canal and consequently through territory belonging to the enemy of Russia. As the Suez Canal passed through the territory of the Porte it was not improbable that the Porte might think it right to stop the passage of Russian ships or of munitions of war through that Canal.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, my answer to the Question which my noble Friend (Lord Waveney) has put to me shall be a very short and a very simple one. No Treaty and no international act of any kind exists by which the neutrality of the Suez Canal is secured. By the Firman and the Concession to the Company from which my noble Friend has quoted in putting his Question the Canal is to be open “for ever”—that is the literal translation of the French word—as a neutral passage for ships of commerce. The Firman, however, I ought to observe, is not in the nature of an international agreement, but is only in the nature of a concession to the Company. Moreover, the language employed in it does not imply neutralization in the ordinary sense in which the word is understood. Neutralization, as I take it, understanding the word as it is commonly employed in international documents, would mean that the Canal should not be used at all in time of war for the passage of ships of war of any belligerent; and I need not point out to your Lordships that under certain circumstances that so far from being an advantage to this country might lead to very serious inconveniences. My noble Friend will therefore see that there is no such guarantee of the neutrality of the Suez Canal by the Maritime Powers as that which he refers to in his Question. I do not think it would be convenient or desirable in reply to a Question such as that put by my noble Friend (Lord Houghton), and there being no matter of discussion before the House, that I should enter into a consideration of all the hypothetical circumstances under which the traffic of the Canal might be interfered with. Probably it will be enough if I repeat what has been said by a representative of the Government in "another place"—namely, that the maintenance of the uninterrupted communication of the Canal is in our view an English interest, one of the highest importance, and one which certainly we shall feel it our duty not to neglect. As regards the Papers asked for by my noble Friend, they are in preparation, and very shortly will be laid upon the Table.

House adjourned at half-past Five o'clock, to Monday next,

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 4th May, 1877.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For Montgomery Borough, v. the Honble. Charles Douglas Richard Hanbury-Tracy, now Lord Sudeley.

The Earl of Derby

ARMY SURGEONS—THE ROYAL WARRANT, 1877.—QUESTION.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Secretary of State for War, If he would state why the Commissions of the gentlemen who were gazetted as Surgeons under the Royal Warrant of April 28th 1877, were not ante-dated as was heretofore the case; and, in the event of their not being ante-dated, will the time spent at the Army Medical School, Netley, count towards promotion for those who may be continued in the Department after ten years?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that previous to the year 1876 the time of instruction at Netley was allowed to count as a period of service. When, however, the 10 years' system of short service was adopted, it appeared undesirable to cut off the period during which they were under instruction. It was not desirable to make a distinction between those who left at the end of 10 years and those who did not.

IMPORTATION OF AMERICAN MEAT. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the President of the Board of Trade, If the cost of freight of fresh meat from America to this Country ($\frac{3}{4}$ d. per pound as stated in Return 151) includes the cost of keeping the meat fresh by ice; and, if not, could he state approximately the cost per pound, in addition to freight, of keeping meat imported from America fresh during its voyage to this Country?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the rate of freight for conveyance of fresh meat to Great Britain from America is stated in the Return named at 27s. 6d. to 30s. per ton measurement of the space occupied by refrigerators, together with 5 per cent primage, equivalent to $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per lb of meat. I am informed this does not include the cost of ice furnished by the shippers. I have no means of stating what this additional cost may be.

ST. CATHERINE'S HOSPITAL.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer,

Whether it is intended to advise Her Majesty to fill up the sinecure office of Master of Saint Catherine's Hospital now vacant?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that some time ago a Commission was appointed, with Lord Hatherley at its head, to inquire into the position of this institution. That Commission had made a Report containing separate recommendations on the subject of increasing the utility of the institution, as the funds had increased, and that Report was now under consideration.

MERCANTILE MARINE—NORTH SEA HARBOUR AND CANAL.—QUESTION.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he will obtain and lay upon the Table of the House the official papers containing the tables of rates and charges of various kinds leviable on the trade and shipping entering and leaving the Great North Sea Harbour of Holland, passing up and down the new Canal, and for loading and discharging at the quays of Amsterdam; and also such other statistics of trade, &c. as will show the progress since this great work was opened?

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: Sir, the tariff of tolls and rates leviable for the use of the new canal from the North Sea to Amsterdam was, on the 30th of March last, published in extenso in The Shipping and Mercantile Gazette, which is much more accessible to the British trade that use the canal and harbour than any Parliamentary Paper can be. The ordinance of the Dutch Government for the general regulation of the navigation of the canal, containing upwards of 70 Articles, was also published in extenso in the same paper on the 25th of December last. As the canal was only opened in November last, statistics of trade, &c., for so short a time would not be of much value.

ARMY—"GENERAL MONTHLY RETURN."—QUESTION.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, for the use of Members in the Library, a Copy of the "General Monthly Return of the British Army," which is printed every month at the War Office for the use of Government?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, he would remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the Return referred to had always been regarded as a Departmental document. There was, however, nothing secret in it, and he saw no objection to a copy being left in the Library for the use of Members.

GIBRALTAR—PROPOSED TRADE REGULATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITWELL asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, What steps the Colonial Department is proposing to take with reference to trade at Gibraltar and the neighbourhood calculated to affect British commerce on that coast; and, whether, before any instructions are issued on the subject, they will be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, the intention is to frame regulations which, while in no way interposing obstacles in the way of legitimate commerce, shall prevent the port of Gibraltar from continuing to be a smuggling depôt. I am afraid I can add nothing to what I said the other day—namely, that the Manchester Chamber of Commerce have been informed that no final action will be taken until they have been again communicated with, and that a copy of the regulations will be laid upon the Table before they are brought into operation.

NAVY—ROYAL MARINES—PROMOTION AND RETIREMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Committee appointed to consider a Scheme of Promotion and Retirement in reference to the Royal Marines has made its Report; if it has not reported, whether he can state when it is expected that it will do so; and, if it has reported, whether he has any objection to lay the Report upon the Table of the House?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, that the Committee referred to had not yet made their Report. He was unable to say when it would be ready; but he would take care it should be laid on the Table as soon as possible.

COAL MINES—TYNEWYDD COLLIERY.
QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked why it was—as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department promised—that counsel did not attend the investigation into the mine explosion at Tynewydd?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that he was glad the hon. Gentleman had called his attention to the subject. He had given orders more than a week ago, through the Secretary of the Treasury, that counsel were to attend the inquest, and he had sent a message to ascertain why counsel had not attended. He could not imagine the slightest reason why his instructions had not been carried out. He would, however, make inquiries.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—PRINCE GORTCHAKOFF'S CIRCULAR.
QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question of which I have given him private Notice, If he can inform the House whether an answer has been sent to Prince Gortchakoff's Circular to the different Powers at the time of the declaration of war; and, if so, whether he can lay it on the Table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, an answer has been sent to Prince Gortchakoff's Circular, and it will be laid on the Table. I believe that it is not in accordance with the usages of diplomacy to lay a communication of that kind before Parliament or the public until it has been received by the Power to which it has been addressed. We shall know by telegram when it has been received, and then it will be laid on the Table of the House without delay. I presume it will be at the beginning of the week.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE EASTERN
LUTIONS.—QUESTIONS.

SIR HARCOURT JOHNSTONE asked the hon. Gentleman the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) and his hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), Whether, seeing that Amendments to the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Gladstone's) Resolutions had now been placed upon the Paper, and that as, according to the Forms of the House, no Amendment could be proposed after a decision on the Previous Question—whatever that decision might be—had been arrived at, it was their intention to persevere in the Motion of which they had given Notice to move the Previous Question?

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I gave my Notice of moving the Previous Question, Sir, because I thought that in the present state of Europe it would be wrong to embarrass Her Majesty's Government in their foreign policy, and that it was therefore undesirable that Parliament should even entertain such a question as that raised by the right hon. Member for Greenwich. I am still of that opinion; but, as I gave my Notice on national and not on Party grounds, I am indifferent whether the Previous Question is moved by the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone or myself. If, therefore, the hon. Baronet adheres to his intention, I will readily give way to him, so that the Motion may not appear to have a Party character. But if the hon. Baronet does not intend to adhere to his Notice, then I will move the Previous Question myself.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: As my hon. Friend appeals to me, I may be allowed to say that I am of opinion the Resolutions to be moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich cannot be satisfactorily met either by a distinct negative or by an affirmative, and it is therefore my intention to persevere with the Amendment of which I have given Notice. At the same time, if the Government should desire to support the Amendment of which Notice has been given by the noble Lord the Member for Haddington (Lord Elcho), or any other Amendment implying confidence in Her Majesty's Government, I should feel it impossible to stand in the way of the issue to be raised on such a question.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, bearing in mind the various speeches and declarations which have been made from the other side of the House, and especially by the Leader of the House, in expressing the anxiety of the Government to have a declaration of policy stated from this side, I am justified, I think, in asking Her Majesty's Government, whether it is their intention to use any influence they possess with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Christchurch for the purpose of enabling us in the face of the country to take issue on this question, or whether they are content that the vote should be taken on the Previous Question?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, that the question of the right hon. Gentleman is one of a very unusual character, and one to which it is hardly necessary the Government should give any answer. The Motion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich does not raise any direct issue of want of confidence in Her Majesty's Government; but it sets forth a series of propositions which, as I understand, my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch and the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone are of opinion ought not to be entertained by the House. In these circumstances, it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to interfere either with the hon. Baronet opposite or with my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, as it is a matter of indifference to us who moves the Previous Question.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—CASE OF MR. ANCKETELL, J.P.

RESOLUTION.

MR. SULLIVAN, in rising, according to Notice, to call attention to the conduct of Mr. William Ancketell, a Justice of the Peace and Deputy Lieutenant of the county Monaghan, in reference to his public conviction of having cut the throats of two dogs belonging to humble people in the village of Emyvale, on suspicion that the dogs had an hour previously barked at and frightened his horse; also to call attention to the conduct of the magistrates sitting at Emyvale Petty Sessions on the 21st September last, and to the circumstances whereby a failure of justice ensued in respect of the prosecutions instituted against Mr. Ancketell by the police, and by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals; and to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the retention of Mr. Ancketell's name on the Commission of the Peace for the county of Monaghan is not calculated to inspire the humbler classes of the people with respect for the administration of the Law, or with confidence in the impartiality of its application to rich and poor in that locality," said, the conduct to which he wished to call the attention of the House was so lawless and brutal, that if Mr. Ancketell had been a humbler individual he would instantly have been punished by the criminal law of the country; and he contended that such a man was not a fit person to be retained upon the Petty Sessions bench to administer the law which he had so grossly violated. In bringing this matter forward, he entirely disclaimed making any imputation upon the character of the magistracy in Ulster or any other Province of Ireland, who, he believed, heartily condemned this transaction. They had often heard of what was called Justices' justice; but he was happy to say that there were few magistrates in Ulster against whom a similar complaint to that he had to refer to could be made. It was an exceptional case; but he would ask the House to say what would be thought if a humble peasant had forced his way into the magistrate's house and cut the throats of two of his dogs? That, however, was the offence which this magistrate had committed. On the night of the 13th August last Mr. Ancketell and a groom were driving through the street of the little village of Emyvale at one o'clock, and the noise of the wheels set the village dogs barking. Had they barked at a commercial traveller with his baggage they would have been safe; but they dared to bark at the gig-wheels of the local Bashaw, and they forfeited their lives for the offence. There was no doubt Mr. Ancketell had some cause for irritation, as the mare he was driving got restive and did some damage; and, in the heat of the moment, if he had shot the dog the case would never have been brought forward. But what did he do? He drove to the police barrack, took his horse from the trap, put it in the stable, and called upon the police to go with him to search for the dogs and take their lives; but this was an hour after the occurrence. Being a magistrate, the police, who were bound to prevent such an outrage, accompanied him upon his bloody errand, and stood by while he surgically operated upon the dogs. The party went to the house of the widow Armstrong, who, with her household, was asleep. They broke into her yard, and found that there was a dog in one of the out-houses. Her son, a youth, came down to the door in his night-shirt, and in answer to their inquiries said there was a dog in the out-house, and at their bidding unsuspectingly went down the yard and brought out his pet. Mr. Ancketell immediately cut the dog's throat, and, according to the sworn evidence of the boy, the poor animal ran across the road with the blood spurting from its throat, and he followed and took it in his arms until it died. The magistrate crossed the street and found another dog, the throat of which he also cut. He then returned to the police barracks and washed his hands. Was this a gentleman who ought to sit upon the bench at Emyvale to administer the law? Supposing the dogs had even violated a statute in barking at a magistrate's car, was he justified in taking the law into his own hands? Now, he would call the attention of the Government and the House to the manner in which this conduct on the part of a magistrate had been dealt with, notwithstanding every effort that had been made to bring him to justice. If it had been the conduct of a humble individual the police would have left a summons the next morning; but here they did nothing whatever until the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals took up the prosecution. To show there was nothing of political animus, he might mention that the person who invoked the action of the Society was a strong Conservative gentleman—though he was a dog-fancier it was true. No sooner did the Society take action, and open the prosecution, than the police intervened, bringing a friendly prosecution at the instance of the very policeman who had accompanied Mr. Ancketell in the butchering of the dogs. So little confidence did the people have in their magistracy that application was made that a stipendiary magistrate should be sent down from Dublin to hear the case, but this was refused. Well, the result of the friendly police prosecution was that the mode of death inflicted on the dogs had so little of cruelty in it, and so much of surgical skill, that the case did not come within the words of the statute, "torture of animals," and upon that miserable pretext the case was dismissed. Upon this the Secretary of the Society retired, declaring he would take no further part in a farce. But other gentlemen in the county, and those, too, of the same religion and political opinion as Mr. Ancketell, thought the matter should not rest, and another summons was taken out for the breaking into the premises and the merciless killing of the dogs, and Mrs. Armstrong took out a process for the recovery of the value of the dog—£20. When the second summons was called on, Mr. Ancketell's brother magistrates postponed the case, on the ground that a civil action was pending. He (Mr. Sullivan) complained not only of the conduct of Mr. Ancketell, but also of his brother magistrates, for the part they took in baffling justice, and not exercising the powers of an Act of Parliament. At length the case came before the assistant-barrister of the County Court, who in indignant terms, which ought to suggest the impropriety of Mr. Ancketell holding Her Majesty's commission, condemned his conduct, declaring it to be grossly and abominably bad, and decided against him to the fullest extent. Mr. Ancketell appealed to the going Judge of assize (Mr. Justice Barry), and carried that appeal. He (Mr. Sullivan) did not know who had the selection of foremen; but it was a singular circumstance that when the case was being called Mr. Ancketell was taking his seat as chairman of the Grand Jury upstairs. He had been fined a sum representing the value of the dog, and the amount was reduced on appeal from £10 to £5. At the same time, the Judge asked where was the policeman who stood by when the brutal act was done; and being told that he had left the Force, replied that the Force would be the better for it. Thanks to the action of the Superior Courts, widow Armstrong had received at least some satisfaction; but what satisfaction had been given to the outraged humanity of the country? Mr. Ancketell had accused him (Mr. Sullivan) of having brought this question forward from political motives, and because of his (Mr. Ancketell's) high social position and political opinions; but the fact was that when he (Mr. Sullivan) put his Question to the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary on the subject, he had not the remotest notion of what Mr. Ancketell's political opinions were, nor that he considered himself of such lofty social position. It so happened that Mrs. Armstrong, whose dog he had butchered, was of the same political opinions as himself; and it had been asserted that, although representing himself as a Constitutional Tory, this gentleman was, under the rose, a Home Ruler, having been present at a Home Rule banquet held in Dublin. The question before the House, however, was not one of Party politics, but whether the conduct complained of was of a nature that was calculated to inspire the people of Ireland with confidence in the administration of justice by the magistrates of the country. He would conclude by moving the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

MR. ANDERSON said, he had great pleasure in seconding the Motion. Even if Irishmen could be accused of party bias in the matter, he as a Scotchman could not. He knew nothing otherwise of Mr. Ancketell, either of his social position, or of his political views. All he knew was that he had read all the evidence in this case carefully. He saw that Mr. Ancketell was a magistrate, a justice of the peace, and a deputy-lieutenant of the county, and he must say that he was perfectly horrified with the evidence he read. Not only were the dogs not identified as those which frightened the horse, but the act was one of utter brutality. It was the case of a man of social position, a magistrate, a gentleman, going deliberately out into a village to cut the throats of two dogs which were not in any way injuring him at the time, the only excuse being that an hour before he supposed that these dogs had annoyed him. How could the people of Ireland place any confidence in the magistracy of Ireland, or in the administration of the law, when a magistrate like that could retain his position on the Bench? The man should have been kicked off the Bench immediately by an indignant Government; and he had greatly regretted to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland endeavour to palliate the offence when it was brought on some time ago.

He hoped that right hon. Gentleman, now that he had read the evidence, would no longer attempt to palliate it, but would visit it with the righteous indignation it deserved.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the retention of Mr. Ancketell's name on the Commission of the Peace for the county of Monaghan is not calculated to inspire the humbler classes of the people with respect for the administration of the Law, or with confidence in the impartiality of its application to rich and poor in that locality,"—(Mr. Sullivan,)

—instead thereof.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH deprecated discussion on this matter at the present time. The Motion of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) was practically that Mr. Ancketell should be dismissed from the commission of the peace for his conduct. He could not reply to the Motion in so far as it merely referred to Mr. Ancketell, as proceedings in that respect were still pending. In the month of March the hon. Member for Louth brought this matter forward in the shape of a Question, to which he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) replied that he would forward such information on the subject as he possessed to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, with whom the decision of such matters rested. He accordingly handed papers to the Lord Chancellor next day; and the Lord Chancellor required from Mr. Ancketell an explanation of his conduct. Mr. Ancketell furnished an explanation, with which the Lord Chancellor was not satisfied, and the latter deemed it necessary to advise the Irish Government to issue a Commission to inquire into the circumstances of the case. The special Commissioner appointed was a very eminent lawyer, who had, on many occasions, held an important position as going Judge of Assize—namely, Dr. Battersby—whose other engagements prevented him from holding the inquiry so soon as he would otherwise have done. The inquiry had been made, but the Report had only come into his hands a few days ago, and it had to be sent to the Lord Chancellor for Ireland before anything further could be done. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) informed the hon. Member for Louth of these facts yesterday, and had suggested to him to consider whether it would not be better that the Motion should not be discussed that evening; and he was bound to say, although their conversation was private, that the hon. Member appeared to regard the matter in the same light. The House would feel that, in this state of things, he was precluded from saying one word on the merits of Mr. Ancketell's case; because the matter was one which was for the decision, not of himself, but of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and he had no doubt that his decision would be consistent with justice and with the facts of the case. He, however, wished to say that the charges which the hon. Member for Louth had brought against the magistrates on the local Bench were entirely without foundation. The circumstances were these—Summonses against Mr. Ancketell were issued at the instance of the police and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. These summonses were wrongly taken out under the Cruelty to Animals Act; and the magistrates, acting as they were bound to do, held that they were unable to convict under the provisions of that statute—that there was not in the mere killing of the dogs a statutable case of cruelty proved on which they could convict. The hon. Member for Louth had looked upon this as a mere technical objection; but he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) should be sorry to blame the magistrates for declining to go beyond the letter of the law. Those summonses were dismissed after full hearing. Subsequently, a fresh summons was issued at the instance of Mrs. Armstrong against Mr. Ancketell, under the proper statute, for malicious killing; but the hearing of that summons was adjourned in consequence of civil proceedings being commenced by both sides, Mrs. Armstrong claiming damages for the loss of her dog, and Mr. Ancketell claiming damages for the injury to his horse and carriage. These actions were tried at the quarter sessions, and from the best information he could obtain he did not believe that the Chairman made the remarks which the hon. Member for Louth had been informed that he had used. He believed further, that the decision of Judge Barry was arrived at not only without influence being brought to bear on the learned Judge, but absolutely without Mr. Ancketell giving evidence on being represented in any way at the hearing of his case. That was all that he had to state to the House upon this subject that evening, except to say that, looking at the position in which the matter stood, he regretted that the hon. Member for Louth should have brought it forward on this occasion, and that he trusted, after the statement he had made, the hon. Member would withdraw his Motion; or that, if pressed, the House would decline to assent to it.

MR. SULLIVAN wished to say that he had twice offered in conversation with the right hon. Gentleman to postpone the Motion, if his doing so would have been a convenience to the right hon. Gentleman; but that he had understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that there was a portion of the Motion to which his objections did not apply.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH explained that the hon. Member had certainly offered to postpone his Motion as a matter of favour to himself; but, of course, he could not ask him to postpone it upon such a ground as that.

SIR JOHN LESLIE, as one of the magistrates who sometimes presided at the petty sessions of Emyvale, and one of the Representatives of the county in which this affair occurred, was anxious to refute and repel the charges and the insinuations which the hon. Member for Louth had made against that Bench. When reduced to the proportions of truth the circumstances were utterly insignificant, and it must be regarded as a favourable sign of the calmness and of the happy condition of Ireland that the hon. Member for Louth could waste his time and his eloquence on a matter so utterly insignificant as that now before the House. He thought the hon. Member must be at a loss for employment—at all events, for a legitimate grievance on which to exercise his talents. Aquila non capit muscas—the eagle did not usually condescend to swoop at a fly. As far as concerned Mr. Ancketell, he was entitled to say that this Motion ought never to have been made, because the whole subject had been fully gone into by the hon. Member on the 15th of March in putting his Question to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The Answer to that Question was, that the facts stated in the hon. Member's Question were in many parts inaccurate, and in others very much exaggerated. That he conceived to be an almost complete answer to the Motion of the hon. Member. With regard to the magistrates, the hon. Member for Louth had allowed their names to remain on the Paper for five or six weeks in connection with imputations highly dishonourable to them, which had been already fully and entirely answered by the Report of Dr. Battersby, who had exonerated them from all reproach in the matter, and had expressed his opinion that they had conducted themselves throughout the whole business with the greatest possible propriety. The House would probably be curious to know how this small village scandal came into such remarkable prominence. There were three causes for it. In the first place, he attributed it to the machinations of an unprincipled attorney living in the neighbourhood; secondly, to the injudicious and intemperate conduct of the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions; and, thirdly, to the unmistakable desire on the part of the hon. Member for Louth, as well as of other hon. Members who had equally attacked the magistrates in different counties, to bring into disrepute the Protestant magistrates of Ulster. With regard to the first cause—the machinations of the unprincipled attorney—[Laughter]*—*probably hon. Members did not believe that there was in existence such a thing as an unprincipled attorney; but, for his own part, he believed that that there was one. Mr. Ancketell was allowed to repose for a fortnight after committing these indiscretions. [Laughter.] Well, they were merely indiscretions. Mr. Ancketell was young, and, like others who were young, indiscreet. For his own part he (Sir John Leslie) did not defend the act, but it was an indiscretion. A fortnight after that act had been committed, Mr. Ancketell did what everybody of proper feeling would, under the circumstances, do. He expressed his great regret for what he had done in the public newspapers, and offered to compensate the owners of the dogs—an offer which the owners would have been only too happy to accept had the unprincipled attorney not appeared upon the scene. The unprincipled attorney had addressed the following letter to a friend of Mr. Ancketell—

“Omagh, Sept. 10, 1876.

“My dear —,—You have taken such an interest in this horrible case of Ancketell's, I do not hesitate to tell you all the facts, as on his father's account I don't want to bring unnecessary disgrace upon him; but he must pay handsomely for such an outrage. You say you wonder who has put the Humane Society in motion.

I reply, it is done under my advice, so that we may be fully prepared with the evidence on the trial of the record in Dublin, in November. The summons and plaint are ordered in both cases by my son, and I fancy a Dublin jury will give sweeping damages in a case of the kind. You say you would wish the case hushed up. If so, let Mr. Ancketell send you down £50, and on receipt of it, I shall do all I can to withdraw all actions, and shall try and get the Society to forego further proceedings, on the ground of Mr. Ancketell having compensated the parties fully; and if they do not withdraw, I will, or my son will attend the Bench and state Mr. A. has fully compensated and made amends, and thus get a nominal fine. If Mr. Ancketell does not at once adopt this course, he need not expect any favour from the hands of yours faithfully,

So much for an unprincipled attorney. Mr. Ancketell had been prosecuted no less than five times. He had been followed about by attorneys and lawyers. Mr. Ancketell was at last brought to bay before the Chairman of the Quarter Session in a civil action for damages—the value of these wild beasts. The Chairman of the Quarter Sessions showed a decided bias against Mr. Ancketell. That the Chairman was wrong was proved by the fact that the Judge of Assize, on an appeal from the decision of the Chairman, reduced by one half the amount which the Court of Quarter Sessions ordered Mr. Ancketell to pay. Tact, temper, and discretion were qualities which were requisite in a Chairman of Quarter Sessions, and he was bound to say that the county of Monaghan was most unfortunate with regard to the qualities displayed by their Chairman of Quarter Sessions. Almost simultaneously with the bringing of this charge against Mr. Ancketell, three other charges were brought against different magistrates. Those charges had been disposed of. They seemed to owe their origin to a desire to attack the Protestant magistrates of Ulster. Admitting that Mr. Ancketell had committed a fault, he did not see why that gentleman should be made a scapegoat of in order to bring odium upon the county magistracy in Ireland. He would ask the House to contrast the tender emotion—the more than feminine sensibility—that the hon. Member for Louth had shown for the possible physical suffering of two cur dogs, with the pain, the moral pain he was inflicting on those of his own species. Mr. Ancketell had a wife, a mother, a sister. Had they no hearts to feel, no human sympathies to be wounded when they had to witness their husband, son, brother dragged through the mire of calumny, held up to public infamy and disgrace? But it was well for Mr. Ancketell as for those he held dear, that there was a tribunal such as this, which was guided by truth, and which administered impartial justice; and, therefore, he (Sir John Leslie) appealed to the House to declare that the magistrates were free from even the slightest suspicion of reproach, and to restore Mr. Ancketell to the good opinion of all honest men, as also to the enjoyment of an unsullied reputation.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that the Question of his hon. Friend (Mr. Sullivan) first appeared on the Notice Paper on the 4th of March, and on the 15th of March the Chief Secretary promised to refer the matter to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland for investigation. It was extraordinary that it should take two months to discover whether or not a magistrate had acted improperly, and that the Report of that investigation had only been communicated to the Chief Secretary on the day before this Motion was made. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth had acted without communication with him; but in October last he (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) happened to read a report of the case, and he was so shocked at it that he immediately addressed a letter to the Lord Chancellor, stating that he knew nothing of the case, except what appeared in The Irish Times; that by a reference to the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, the Lord Chancellor could ascertain whether the strong statements were true; and that if they should be found true, Mr. Ancketell was, in his opinion, unfit to hold the commission of the peace. Mr. Ancketell had a good and earnest advocate in the hon. Member for Monaghan (Sir John Leslie); but he must complain of the observations he had used. He had spoken of a solicitor, Mr. Cecil Moore, in unjustifiable terms, seeing that he was not there personally to defend himself. The language "unprincipled attorney" was, he thought, language unfit to be used by a Gentleman in that House. He had also attacked the Chairman who had tried the case, and stigmatized his conduct as most partial and unfair. [SIR JOHN LESLIE: No, Sir; I said most injudicious.] He had understood the hon. Baronet to say "that the Chairman had shown a decided bias." If he was wrong, he apologized. Having the honour of the acquaintance of the Chairman attacked, he would appeal to everyone who knew him, and in particular to the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, whether he was not the last person against whom such an imputation could be made. The decision was that of a jury, and the Chairman's language was not stronger than was justified, and he believed that if Mr. Justice Barry had been aware that Mr. Ancketell had been examined before the jury and the Chairman, he would not have altered the decision of the Court of Quarter Sessions. He did not know whether his hon. Friend would divide the House on the question, but he thought it was quite proper to bring it forward. The Lord Chancellor ought to have investigated it much earlier than he did.

MR. CALLAN said, he had had the privilege of knowing the gentleman who had been spoken of as the "unprincipled attorney" for the last 12 years. Differing as he did, both in politics and in religion from Mr. Cecil Moore, the gentleman referred to, he wished to say there was not any professional gentleman in the North of Ireland who was more highly respected. As a proof of the high estimation in which he was held, he might mention that the Government had lately appointed him to the responsible office of Clerk of the Rules in the Common Pleas, and the appointment had been unanimously approved by the Profession. He therefore felt pained, and he must be allowed to tell the hon. Baronet that the expression he had used was an infringement of the privileges of the House, and he was confident that he would not use that language outside of the House. [SIR JOHN LESLIE: I read a letter in support of my statement.] He had taken down the words, and he appealed to hon. Members whether the hon. Baronet was reading from a letter at the time. Perhaps he would avail himself of the opportunity to withdraw the expression, which he (Mr. Callan) was sure the hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had been pained to hear. In that case he (Mr. Callan) would be satisfied. When the hon. Baronet spoke of the cruelty to the ladies of Mr. Ancketell's family which this Motion would inflict, he should have thought of the pain which his own remarks were sure to inflict upon the female members of Mr. Moore's family.

MR. LAW said, he agreed with the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Leslie) that gentlemen in a judicial position ought to be possessed of tact, temper, and discretion. And the question which had now to be decided by the authorities in Ireland appeared to him to be whether in this unhappy matter Mr. Ancketell had conducted himself with such tact, temper, and discretion as that he could with advantage to the public interest any longer remain in the commission of the peace. The House was not in a position at the present moment to deal with the subject; and when the Government had had time to consider the Report that had been made by Dr. Battersby, it was not to be assumed that they would adopt any course of which the House would have reason to complain. The hon. Baronet must surely regret having in such sweeping terms brought under the very unpleasant notice of the House persons who could have had no idea that they would be thus attacked. They had had the phrase—"the machinations of an unprincipled attorney" applied to Mr. Cecil Moore over and over again. Now, Mr. Cecil Moore had lately been selected by the present Government for a most responsible and important office in one of the Superior Courts of Ireland, having been promoted to it from one which he previously held in the county of Tyrone. The House, he hoped, would do the Government, as well as Mr. Moore, the justice of believing that they would not have placed Mr. Moore in that position, if he had really been a person who deserved the epithets which had been applied to him that evening. It was, too, in his (Mr. Law's) opinion, unfortunate that language had been used as to Mr. Barron, the Chairman of the County Monaghan, accusing him of showing a decided bias in dealing with this case. A Judge must, of course, form a decided opinion, or he would probably not come to a decision at all. But was not such language as had been used calculated to shake the confidence felt by the people of the county in their Chairman? Having, he (Mr. Law) presumed, arrived at the conclusion that he ought to give a decision adverse to Mr. Ancketell, Mr. Barron pronounced his judgment against him accordingly; but it must in all fairness be believed that, in so doing, he proceeded on the sworn evidence in the case, and not on any prejudice or prepossession against Mr. Ancketell. He concurred with the hon. Baronet's observation that consideration should be had for the feelings of relatives; but that principle must not be pressed very far, or it might be used to screen any official from having his conduct brought into question. He would, however, ask the hon. Baronet whether he thought that Mr. Cecil Moore or Mr. Barron had no near relatives whose feelings were entitled to consideration? There was, as it seemed to him (Mr. Law), some justice in the complaint that a stipendiary magistrate, unconnected with the district, had not been sent to preside at the Petty Sessions, having regard to the existence of so much local feeling. In conclusion, he would suggest that the hon. Member for Louth should withdraw his present Motion.

MR. BUTT said, that he entertained the highest respect for the privilege of Members of the House to speak freely and openly their opinions. But if a gentleman was unfairly attacked, as in this case, he thought it equally right that those who knew him should testify what they knew in his favour. Now, it was the simple truth that there was no man who occupied a higher position in his Profession than Mr. Cecil Moore. He could not understand that any letter in the least degree justified the epithet of "unprincipled," which the hon. Baronet (Sir John Leslie) had applied to Mr. Cecil Moore, or the statement that the beginning of this business was the machination of an unprincipled attorney.

SIR JOHN LESLIE: My words—"unprincipled attorney" had reference entirely to the proposal for the payment of £50.

MR. BUTT said, he did not think that that proposal in any way justified the hon. Member's expression. There was nothing discreditable to Mr. Moore in the letter, and the hon. Baronet must have known that no man in the North of Ireland stood so high in his Profession. Mr. Moore had been selected to take one of the most important offices connected with the administration of justice in the Irish Courts. He thought it was his duty to say that the expression "unprincipled attorney," as applied to Mr. Cecil Moore, would be simply looked upon as an outrage in Ireland.

MR. SHARMAN CRAWFORD believed Mr. Barron to be most careful and painstaking, both as a magistrate and an assistant barrister.

MR. W. JOHNSTON declared that in professional as well as in private life Mr. Moore, who had been a personal friend of his for many years, occupied the highest rank.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON likewise bore testimony to the high character of Mr. Moore, and suggested that the hon. Member for Monaghan should withdraw the offensive expressions he had used. For his own part, he did not altogether defend the letter, but he did not think it ought to be pitted against Mr. Moore's long honourable and straightforward professional career.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING concurred in the good opinion which had been expressed of Mr. Moore's professional and private character. With reference to the main question before the House, he stated that some years ago an Irish magistrate named O'Driscoll struck a boy with a whip for not telling him which way a hare had run, and that the Lord Chancellor of the day decided in consequence that Mr. O'Driscoll was unfit to hold his position on the Bench.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) observed that the Motion had been brought forward at a most unfortunate time, and that the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) ought in fairness to have postponed it in accordance with the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. [MR. SULLIVAN: No such suggestion was made.] Well, as the hon. Member was no doubt aware that an inquiry was being made into the circumstances of the case by direction of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, his own judgment ought to have led him to take that course. He was the only Member who had directly referred to the transactions connected with the case, for nearly all the other hon. Gentlemen who had spoken had alluded to other matters, and he (Mr. Gibson) thought it would have been better if the hon. Member had waited until that decision had been announced. He believed the Lord Chancellor of Ireland could not have taken any earlier action than he did, as the matter was still sub judice until very recently. On October, when the representation was made that had been referred to by the right hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir COLMAN O'Loughlen), an appeal was actually pending which could not be heard before the Judge of Assize until the recent Spring Assizes. Therefore, it would have been both unreasonable and unjust for the Lord Chancellor to have prejudiced the case. Whatever offence Mr. Ancketell might have been guilty of, it would have been unjust and unreasonable on the part of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to have taken action in respect to it until all the facts of the case had been fully ascertained, and for that purpose, he sent down one of the most experienced and able Queen's Counsel at the Irish Bar to make a full investigation in open Court at the very scene of the occurrence. He ventured to think that his right hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. LAW) had not rightly gathered the facts of the case. He understood the hon. Member for Louth to concede that Mr. Ancketell took no part in the decision of any of the cases at the petty sessions. [MR. LAW said he merely alluded to the constitution of the Bench.] He came to the conclusion that it was suggested that Mr. Ancketell was sitting on the Bench and taking part in the cases; but after the explanation no more need be said on that subject. It was said to be unfortunate that, under the circumstances of the case, a resident magistrate was not present; but when the second summons was brought forward, of unlawful killing, a resident magistrate (Mr. White) of very great experience, was in attendance, and the Bench was unusually strong. On that occasion it was decided, as was not unusual, to postpone the criminal proceedings till the civil action had been tried. The matter was not in position for decision. He did not think the Papers were yet before the Lord Chancellor, but he had no doubt—and no one in that House could doubt—that the Lord Chancellor of Ireland would mete out justice to all parties, whether it might result in the vindication or punishment of Mr. Ancketell. Under these circumstances, he thought the hon. Member for Louth ought to withdraw his Motion.

MAJOR O'GORMAN said; Mr. Ancketell certainly appeared to him a most fortunate individual, for there had been a Commission sent down to inquire into the circumstances of his case; and no end of magistrates were present when the inquiry was gone into. When he (Major O'Gorman) was deprived of the commission of the peace no Commission was sent down at all to inquire into his case. But then it was not a gentleman of the name of Ball, but one of the name of O'Hagan, who was Lord Chancellor. He had since been ennobled with the title of Baron O'Hagan. He sent down no Commission; he simply wrote him (Major O'Gorman) a letter something like this—or, rather, Mr. Uppington, his secretary, wrote—"Sir, I wish to know if you wrote a letter which appeared in The Freeman's Journal on such a day, and if it was published by your authority." He took up his pen and wrote back—"Sir, I beg to acquaint you, for the information of the Lord Chancellor, that the letter in question was written by me, and published by my authority." And then he was deprived of the commission of the peace, without receiving the common rights which a convicted felon should receive. A man convicted of a capital crime was usually asked by some official whether he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, but he had not been asked a single question at all. Now, he thought it a very admirable thing to have such a Chancellor as Lord Chancellor Ball, who took time to consider the circumstances of every case. He was not so very rapid in his decisions, but he was principled in fact. He (Major O'Gorman) remembered that one day he was standing in Sackville Street, when he met a friend. His friend said to him—"Do you know whose carriage that is passing by?" He replied—"No, I don't." His friend said—"That is Lord Chancellor O'Hagan's carriage." "Well," said he, "what do I care?" His friend rejoined—"He is going to learn the art of equitation." Just at that minute, a third party came up, an ill-natured man, very. He (Major O'Gorman) said—"That is Lord Chancellor O'Hagan, and he is going to learn the art of equitation." "Well," the ill-natured man replied—"It would be a very fortunate thing for the miserable suitors attending his Court if, in addition to learning equitation, he would try and teach himself a little equity."

MR. SULLIVAN said, he would not press his Motion to a division. In deference to what he took to be the feeling of the House he would withdraw it until they had the decision of the Lord Chancellor before them. ["No, no!"]

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS—THE LAWS AND JUDICATURE—CASE OF COLONEL DE FABY.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. J. COWEN, in rising to call attention to the case of Colonel De Faby, said, the House had been for the last hour-and-a-half engaged in commenting on the proceedings of the Irish magistracy. He would invite them for a short time to turn their minds to the magistracy in the Channel Islands. He wished to call attention to a case of singular severity and oppression that had recently occurred in Guernsey. His object in doing this was two-fold. He was desirous of securing some consideration or compensation for an unfortunate gentleman who had suffered great harshness at the hands of the authorities in that island. In the second place, he was anxious to use the incidents of the case for showing the necessity there was for a complete and radical reform in the administration of justice in these small dependencies. The Constitution existing in the Channel Isles was substantially the same as was in operation in the 12th century. The administrative and fiscal departments had not been materially altered since the time of the Norman Conquest. There had been no attempt to adapt their laws to the altered circumstances and the new conditions of modern life. While every other portion of the United Kingdom had had its institutions re-cast, those in the Channel Islands had remained stationary and stereotyped. They were a sort of constitutional or local Rip Van Winkles. While the other parts of the Kingdom had been progressing they had been asleep—only their sleep, instead of being of 20 years' duration, like that of Washington Irving's hero, had extended over 20 times 20 years. The facts of the case he wished the House to consider were briefly these:—Colonel de Faby was a French officer. When a young man he served with the French Army in Algiers. Afterwards he held a situation of responsibility and trust in the Civil Service. At the commencement of the war with Germany he resumed his military profession at the wish of the Government, and was given the command of a regiment. He went through all the disastrous campaign on the Rhine—at Woerth, Metz, and afterwards at Sedan. When peace was concluded, along with many other partizans of the Empire, he returned to the Channel Isles. Messrs. Rouher, Baroche, and others went to Jersey. Colonel de Faby, his wife, his father, and mother, went to Alderney. His father had been connected with the Consular Service, and was at that time in receipt of a pension. This was in 1871. In 1872, M. de Faby, sen., died, and shortly after his wife also died. A dispute arose as to the disposition of some property that M. de Faby left. Mr. Clucas, the Judge in Alderney, and his wife, had made the acquaintance of Messrs. de Faby, and when the old gentleman and his wife died Mrs. Clucas alleged that they had left her some jewellery and other property. This statement might be correct, or it might be incorrect—he was not in a position to offer an opinion. Colonel de Faby alleged that Mrs. Clucas had got possession of the property of his father and mother fraudulently, and he brought an action against her in the Alderney Court; but, strange to say, Mrs. Clucas's husband was the Judge, and he actually presided on the case when the charge against his wife was preferred. Such a proceeding might be legal, but he thought the House would admit that it was not altogether decent. When the case was considered the Judge charged Colonel de Faby openly in the Court with being a liar—adding to the phrase a somewhat offensive adjective which he, however, did not care to repeat. The case was removed from Alderney to the Royal Court at Guernsey, and was yet unsettled. The law in those islands was sometimes very prompt, and at other times it was as slow as in the old Chancery Court in this country. Shortly after the death of his parents, Colonel de Faby settled in Guernsey, and with the assistance of some of his friends, commenced a newspaper. The paper was established in 1873, and had a fair measure of success. In 1876 Mr. Clucas, the Alderney Judge, died. Colonel de Faby, in his paper, gave a sketch of his life, and commented upon his career as a Judge and a public man. In this he followed the example of other and more influential papers on the death of any local or national celebrity. It was out of this article that the unhappy dispute had arisen. He (Mr. Cowen) was willing to admit at once that the article was a very severe one. It was written with great smartness and sarcasm. It set forth the career of Judge Clucas in not a very attractive light. He did not defend the article, nor did he apologize for it; but he thought it was only fair to the writer to state that he had had great provocation. It should also be stated that Mr. Clucas himself had either published or caused to be published a pamphlet reflecting on the life and character of Colonel de Faby which was quite as severe, if not more objectionable, than the offending article. Mrs. Clucas commenced an action for libel in the Royal Court at Guernsey. When Colonel de Faby was summoned to appear before the tribunal he found to his astonishment that Mr. Utermarck, the Attorney General had been retained for the prosecution. This gentleman had been retained previously by Colonel de Faby to prosecute Mrs. Clucas for fraudulently getting possession of his mother's property; and yet, notwithstanding this, the gentleman considered there was no breach of legal etiquette or custom for him to turn right round and offer his services to his former client's opponent. English barristers would consider such procedure utterly indefensible. Mr. Utermarck had become possessed of a full knowledge of Colonel de Faby's case from that gentleman's self, and yet he transferred his services to Colonel de Faby's opponent in a case arising out of the same dispute. The simple statement of the fact would in the estimation of all the lawyers in this country be sufficient to condemn the procedure. There was another point in which the case against Colonel de Faby was conducted in an irregular, if not in an illegal manner. It was the custom in the Channel Isles to associate the officers of the Crown with both the plaintiff and defendant in certain cases. The Attorney General was joined to the plaintiff, and the Controller was joined to the defendant. These officers were not to act as advocates, but to use their supposed superior knowledge in guiding the Court when settling all difficult legal points. Probably no one in the House would contest this statement; but he would refer hon. Members to the Report of the Royal Commission appointed in 1846 to inquire into the Criminal Law of the Channel Islands, and which would fully bear out what he had just said—that the Law Officers of the Crown ought to be associated in such cases with both parties to the trial; and that therefore legally Colonel de Faby should have had associated with him the Controller of the Guernsey Court. The Attorney General was with his opponent; but Colonel de Faby had no one associated with his advocate. He stood, therefore, at a great disadvantage in not having his case fairly put before the Court. The House would know that the Court in Guernsey consisted of the Bailiff, who presided, but took no part in arriving at any decision—he simply explained points of difficulty and legal doubt. The Jurats or judges were the parties who were supposed to try the case. The two Law Officers, the Attorney General and Controller, constituted really part of the tribunal, and no Court for trying a case of criminal libel was fairly or legally constituted without the Crown officers were adjoined to both the prosecution and the defence. That was the first disadvantage under which Colonel de Faby laboured, and it was not only an irregular, but, as he contended, an illegal procedure. In the second place, the law in Jersey required that all the witnesses, both for the plaintiff and defendant, should be summoned by the Attorney General, and their expenses paid by the Crown. He did not think the Home Secretary would contest that point either; but if he did, he would refer again to the Report of the Royal Commission. Colonel de Faby, it would be seen, when he went to the Court, was placed in a very adverse position. He found that the lawyer who had been his advocate against Mrs. Clucas had turned round and had become his prosecutor; that the Court was not legally constituted and he was deprived of the assistance that ought to have been extended to him by the Controller being associated with his advocate; and, in the third case, none of his witnesses were in attendance. His case was, therefore, practically undefended. His advocate, Mr. Falla, had given a list of these witnesses to the Attorney General, and according to the law of Guernsey, that official ought to have summoned the witnesses. He failed to do so; and, therefore, placed Colonel de Faby at very serious disadvantage. When the case was heard, the Attorney General Utermarck made a very violent speech against Colonel de Faby. Instead of contenting himself with a calm and judicial exposition of the law, he entered into a virulent personal attack upon the defendant, and declared in conclusion that he wished the Court had the power of realizing in practice the well-known couplet—

To lash the rascal naked through the world.”

The Attorney General was required in Guernsey to demand the amount of punishment that should be inflicted. He demanded a fine of £400 upon Colonel de Faby—£200 to go to Mrs. Clucas and £200 to the Crown. It was usual for the Court to halve the demand of the officer; but, in this instance, no opinion was offered by the Court at all. The Bailiff was an old man, 75 years of age, did not hear well, and consequently was not thoroughly acquainted with what took place before him. All that he said on the occasion was, that it was to be regretted that the witnesses for Colonel de Faby had not been called. The Jurats made no comment, and the result was that, without any formal judgment being pronounced, Colonel de Faby was practically sentenced at the demand of his opponent's lawyer, to the very heavy fine that he (Mr. Cowen) had just mentioned. No sooner had the Jurats bowed their acquiescence to the decision, than the Attorney General cried out in Court to the Sheriff to “collar” Colonel de Faby, who was thereupon taken to the Sheriff's office, and a demand made that he should pay the £400, or go to prison as a debtor for the sum. Colonel de Faby was quite unable to meet such an extortionate claim, and he went to gaol. For 10 weeks he was treated as an ordinary debtor, had his victuals supplied, edited his newspaper, and was allowed to conduct his business. During this time the arbitrary procedure of the Attorney General had been the subject of comment in the island, and had been discussed with some warmth in the newspapers. The authorities then adopted a very extraordinary mode of curtailing the sale of Colonel de Faby's journal. The Attorney General, or some of the officials in the island, sent the constables to the different agents and urged them not to sell Colonel de Faby's paper, intimating to them, at the same time, that if they did so they would be liable to the same or nearly similar punishment as had been meted out to Colonel de Faby. This very extraordinary procedure seriously injured the sale of the journal, and no doubt the interference of an officer so powerful as the Attorney General would have an effect in a small island with a population of 30,000 or 40,000, which would fail if in a large community. Soon after, without any notice, a most extraordinary change in the treatment of Colonel de Faby was made. Up to that time he had been treated as he (Mr. Cowen) had said, as a debtor, but afterwards he was treated as a criminal, and transferred from one side of the gaol to the other. It would appear that the Court, for some reason or other, held a private sitting, and a sort of Guernsey Star Chamber declared that this change should take place. Colonel de Faby was not summoned before the Court, had no notice that his case was to be re-considered, nor had his advocate any intimation that anything was to be done; but in his absence, privately and secretly, the change in his treatment was effected. Anything more unjustifiable and more out of accord with an Englishman's notion of justice he could scarcely conceive. Colonel de Faby was in extremely bad health when he was sent to prison. He was suffering from such an accumulation of complaints as any man that had been through the terrible campaign of 1871 could be well supposed to suffer from. The medical officer of the gaol, with much more humanity and good feeling than the lawyers, declared that if the treatment of Colonel de Faby as a criminal was persevered in he would certainly die. Indeed, he believed this benevolent official gave notice to the governor of the gaol that if he transferred the debtor to the criminal side of the prison, that it would be nothing less than assassination, and he declared that he would take the consequences of the gaoler refusing to comply with the arbitrary order of the Court. Colonel de Faby, although was still kept in close confinement 22 hours out of the 24. The doctor again interfered, and declared that unless a larger amount of fresh air was given and the door of his cell was opened, his state of health was such that he would certainly die. This humane recommendation of the doctor was again complied with; but the case, meanwhile, had excited a large amount of sympathy and attracted great interest in the island. The Lieutenant Governor, the Home Secretary, and the Queen had all been communicated with, and the case of Colonel de Faby had been brought before them all individually. In December last the Lieutenant Governor wrote to Colonel de Faby intimating to him that his imprisonment should terminate in a month—that was to say, six months after the trial—that on January 15th he would be released; but that he would be required to leave the island. On the day mentioned, Colonel de Faby was taken out of prison, and though in a very bad state of health and unable to make much exertion, he was taken to the steamboat in charge of the constable and banished to Jersey. He was not informed why he was sent away—no charge was made against him warranting such banishment—he was simply deported in accordance with the order of the Governor. He (Mr. Cowen) made no charge against the Governor of acting illegally, as he believed the law permitted the Governor to transport an alien without trial under certain circumstances. The custom was a very old one; but it had been acted upon repeatedly even at comparatively modern times. In 1856, Victor Hugo, Piancini, and nearly a score of French, Polish, and Italian exiles were banished from Jersey by the edict of the Governor. These gentlemen had written severe articles respecting the Emperor of the French. The Governor, in consequence, sent them out of the island without accusation or trial. There was, however, usually some reason, good or bad, for laws of this kind, which, as in this case, gave the Governor of the Channel Islands the power of deportation. The islands were within sight of the French coast, and in time of war it was feared that foreigners in small numbers might land on the shores, promote insurrection, and lead to their domination by the would pretend to say that Colonel de Faby was acting in this manner. He was pre-eminently loyal, and there was no one in the island a stouter defender of the Monarchy. He was neither a Republican nor Revolutionist. There had been no political charge preferred against him. The whole dispute arose out of a purely private quarrel. It was simply a contention about the disposition of certain property, and no one could maintain that such a dispute would endanger the safety of the islands or shake the allegiance of some 30,000 of the most loyal subjects in the United Kingdom. Colonel de Faby was sent to Jersey. His permanent removal would have been absolute ruin, as it would have prevented him conducting his newspaper and carrying on his business. The Home Secretary, however, removed the interdiction upon him after a few weeks, and allowed him to return to the Island of Guernsey, where he now was. These were substantially the facts that he wished to submit to the House. What he contended was, that in the first instance Colonel de Faby had been treated with great severity. Even admitting that he had libelled Mr. Clucas, the punishment was quite out of proportion to the offence. The trial for libel was irregular and informal, and placed Colonel de Faby at great disadvantage. His imprisonment was attended with unnecessary and uncalled-for severity, and the property that had been seized, and would have been sold, if it had not been for the kind intercession of friends—was really not his own. He had lost everything he possessed in France, was ruined both in health and in purse, and the modest establishment he had in Guernsey had been found by his wife's friends. It had not been sold; but at the present time it was in charge of the Sheriff, and if the security was withdrawn the whole of the effects would be at the mercy of the authorities. He thought the case was one for the generous consideration of the Government, and that some restitution should be made to Colonel de Faby. He (Mr. Cowen) had listened to his tale of sorrow and misfortune with very great concern. It was well calculated to excite the commiseration of all humane persons. Colonel de Faby's family had been, and he himself had been ruined by the disasters in France. He was a partizan of the Empire. He (Mr. Cowen) was not a sympathizer with, and had very little respect for the Government of Louis Napoleon; but it was only fair to recollect that he ruled France for the better part of 20 years, that he was the Ally and friend of this country, and there was no more discredit to Colonel de Faby for having been an official of the Emperor Napoleon, than there was in this country having been his Ally. His wife, Mrs. de Faby, was an English lady. Her father was an officer in our Army, four of her brothers had been officers, her brother-in-law was an English General, and another brother was a clergyman of the Church of England. She had a modest but competent fortune, which was lost in the failure of one of the rascally joint-stock banks which scattered such widespread ruin a few years ago. He put their case before hon. Gentlemen, and asked them to consider what they would have said if an English subject living in the Island of Corsica had been treated as harshly and arbitrarily as Colonel de Faby had been in Guernsey? If such had been the case this country would have rung with condemnation of the French Government, whether it had been Imperial, Monarchical, or Republican. He asked them—as they would have sympathized with their own countrymen under such circumstances—to extend the same consideration for this unfortunate Frenchman and his wife in the distressing position in which they had been placed by the illegal exercise of arbitrary power in a portion of the United Kingdom. He hoped the exposure of this case would be a means of moving the Government to take some steps to reform the administration of the Channel Islands. This was only one case. There was constantly occurring cases—not so serious, perhaps, but still very hard cases—where the authorities used their power with great injustice.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would admit that the hon. Member had done good service, in a Constitutional way, by bringing this case under the notice of the House, and thus strengthening the hands of the Government in their endeavours to reform the laws of the Channel Islands. He was not there either to defend those laws or the practical manner in which they were administered—nor did he wish to make any imputation against any officers; but he must say the laws were so peculiar and so repugnant to our feelings that nothing would satisfy him better than to be the humble instrument in working some change. There was, however, he was bound to say, a very great practical difficulty in the way. He believed no subjects of the Queen were more loyal or more devoted to the Crown than the inhabitants of the Channel Islands. They possessed enormous privileges, which they thoroughly appreciated, and they were as loyal as they could be. If hon. Members wanted a specimen of Home Rule they had it in the Channel Islands. This question of the state of the law of the Channel Islands was no new matter to either the Government or that House. As far back as 1846 and 1847 a Royal Commission made an inquiry respecting the Channel Islands, especially with regard to the criminal law, and for 30 years their Report had been before the House. The difficulty was that the people themselves did not wish to change their laws, some of which were most extraordinary. For instance, all the jurats were elected by the people. He had a case before him the other day when one of these jurats became bankrupt under circumstances by no means creditable, but quite the reverse. He was asked to interfere and dismiss him, and put some one else in his place; but he found he had not the slightest power to do so. There was a great difficulty in reforming the laws of the Channel Islands, because the people would not attempt to reform them themselves. There was likewise this peculiarity in the Channel Islands. Although we might pass an Act of the Imperial Legislature to govern these Islands, yet until that Act was registered in the Royal Courts in the Islands it had not any effect there at all. It was true that the Secretary of State was invested with certain arbitrary powers, but he would never think of resorting to them. He had, however, done his best to induce the people to have the laws changed, and he was still continuing those endeavours. When there was a vacant position in the Island of Jersey last year he appointed a man on the express understanding that he was to assist him (Mr. Cross) to the best of his power in endeavouring to bring about a reform. Therefore, so far as that part of the case was concerned, the hon. Member might rest assured that it was not one which he could possibly advance at all. He would not lose sight of the subject, because he would very much like to see a reform established. To come to the individual case which the hon. Member had brought forward, he had not a word to say against the manner in which it had been stated; and if he made one or two remarks he trusted the hon. Member would not think he was doing so in order to prejudice this particular case. In discussing this case he thought he was discussing the conduct of the Law Officers and other officers of the Island; and the hon. Member must admit that whatever might have been the provocation in the first instance, the libel at all events was gross. He believed it was true that, although Colonel de Faby had served very gallantly in the Army, yet matters had been brought against him before he left France of a somewhat serious character. When, however, he went to live in Guernsey he (Mr. Cross), had no reason to suppose that he conducted himself in any other way than as an ordinary citizen, except that in the newspapers the libels which he published were very gross. On the part of the Lieutenant Governor he must say that the articles which Colonel de Faby had written in this newspaper since the charge was made against him were such as the hon. Member for Newcastle would be the last to defend. The hon. Member complained of the husband of the party acting as a Judge. He (Mr. Cross) had nothing to say in defence of that. He would not now go into the case of the Attorney General, because it was Colonel de Faby's intention to prosecute him in the Courts of Law, and it would be wrong for the Secretary of State to say anything that would prejudice the trial. As to the summoning of the witnesses, he was informed that the case of libel was one in which the ordinary practice in this respect was not followed. With reference to the place in which Colonel de Faby was imprisoned, he had letters in his possession from the Lieutenant Governor, which he should be happy to show to the hon. Member privately, which showed that every consideration had been paid to him. He ought to have been placed on the criminal side, but he was placed on the civil side and treated as a debtor. He (Mr. Cross)

knew that in the Island a great deal had been said against the Lieutenant Governor; but he did not believe that that official ever had one thought across his mind, except to do what was right. As to the question of deportation, he believed it was perfectly true that the Lieutenant Governor had power to deport persons from the Island. Such a law was recognized by an Order in Council so late as 1846. He was bound to say that, considering the peculiar situation of the Islands, it was a law which it might become very necessary to put into force; but he did not think he should allow it to be put in force, except in very special cases. But in Colonel de Faby's case, he was liable, under the existing law, to have remained in prison for the rest of his life. In the course of the correspondence which passed, the Lieutenant Governor recommended that in default of paying the fine he should be kept in prison for the space of nine months; but on the facts of the case coming before him (Mr. Cross), he thought that, under the circumstances, the man might be liberated at the expiration of six months. He knew perfectly well that there was a great feeling in the Island among his friends, and the Lieutenant Governor suggested that when he came out of prison he should leave the Island. To that he (Mr. Cross) assented; and Colonel de Faby was let out of prison and deported. As soon as the matter came under his notice, he telegraphed to the Governor that deportation was not intended—but he did not know of it until after Colonel de Faby had left the Island. It should be borne in mind that he did not suffer in consequence, as he would not have been permitted to leave after so short a space of imprisonment, unless he had promised to leave the Island. He could not allow any imputation to rest on the Lieutenant Governor with reference to this subject, and he hoped the House would consider that the Lieutenant Governor was not in any way to blame.

Mr. WHITBREAD reminded hon. Members of the powers of a journal in a small community like Guernsey, and that the libel, which was very gross, would be read from one end of the Island to the other. He thought it was clear that Colonel de Faby had been allowed great privileges during the time that he spent in prison, the offence with which he was charged being one of a very grave character, inasmuch as he had assailed not only the character of a man, but his relations also. He thought that the Home Secretary had done full justice, but still no more that he deserved, to the Lieutenant Governor, under the trying circumstances in which he was placed.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, that the authorities in the Islands claimed to be independent not only of the Privy Council, but of Parliament. No Englishman who went to the Channel Islands could go there without risk of his personal liberty and loss of his property. No Englishman was safe from being put into prison for imaginary claims of debt. No one could rely on the security of property, so complicated were the conditions on which rights in land were held. The real Judges of the Courts of Law were elected, in a form and out of a class, totally opposed to all the arrangements existing in Europe. The reforms were urgently needed, but so great were the difficulties in overcoming the home rule prejudices of the clique interested in the present bad system, that he could only say that he wished the Home Secretary God speed should he make an attempt to carry out the reforms to which reference had been made.

Mr. J. COWEN explained that he had said nothing at all reflecting on the conduct of the Lieutenant Governor.

PARLIAMENT—DESPATCH OF PUBLIC BUSINESS—RULES OF DEBATE.

OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. GOLDNEY rose to call attention to the present Rules of Debate. The hon. Member said, he had placed on the Paper a Notice of Motion for a Select Committee

“to consider and report on the best means for facilitating the despatch of Public Business, and, especially, to inquire whether some limit might not be advantageously placed on Motions for Adjournment.”

The Rules of the House, however, precluded him from submitting any such Resolution. He observed that the necessity for doing something to facilitate the transaction of Public Business was felt by many hon. Members. Attention had been called to the subject in 1848, 1861, and again in 1871. It had also been considered by Select Committees, and certain changes had been recommended, but the fear that the rights of private Members might be infringed stood always in the way. Being himself a private Member and one of some years' standing, he ventured to come forward to propose a moderate change, which would not have the effect of placing a minority at the mercy of an overbearing majority. He would, in the first place, point out that the number of hours which they sat was on the increase. During an ordinary Session they sat altogether some 1,400 hours, of which, at least, 150 were after 12 at night. The number of Motions that were recorded on the Order Book exceeded 10,000 in the Session. It seemed to him that some parts of the Rules and Orders were to a certain extent detrimental to the progress of business and to the convenience of the House. First there was the Rule that no Opposed Business should be brought forward after half-past 12. That Rule, which might be a very good one, applied even in cases where the Member who had given Notice of Opposition was not present, and he thought it might with advantage be altered to the extent of requiring that the opposing Member should be in his place when the Order was called. Another matter to which he wished to call attention was the frequency of Motions for reporting Progress or for the Adjournment of the Debate or of the House. For over a century—perhaps a century and a-half—it had been held in that House that it was necessary 40 Members should be present.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. GOLDNEY continued, by saying that so jealous were Members of Business being transacted by an inadequate number, that they allowed any Member to interpose and call attention to the fact that a quorum was not present. The point he desired to have specially considered was that, if it required 40 Members to carry on legislation, it ought to require a majority of 40 to say that it should be stopped, by adjourning the House or the Debate, or by reporting Progress, subject to the exercise of a discretion on the part of the Chair, dependent in part upon the period of the evening at which the Motion was made. Early in the evening he might rule that the Business should proceed; later, that it should stop. In this way the rights of the minority might be fairly protected, and at the same time the Business of the House saved from undue interruption. Evidence had been given before former Committees by distinguished persons, including Speakers of the House, which was well worthy of consideration. After two or three Motions for the Adjournment of the House or of the Debate had been made, it might be rendered competent for any Member to move that the question in debate should be put, and the decision of the House taken. The practice of moving alternately the Adjournment of the House and of the Debate was one of very modern origin. It used at one time to be a Standing Order that, after a Motion for the Adjournment of the House had been negatived, another Motion for Adjournment should not be made until a new Motion had intervened, and it was contemplated that a substantial Motion should have been made; but in 1819, on the East India Bill, when a Motion for the Adjournment of the House had been negatived, Mr. Hume moved the Adjournment of the Debate, and the Motion not being questioned as to correctness, that seemed to have been accepted as a substantial Motion ever since. A rule, indeed, was made by the last Speaker that succeeding Motions for the Adjournment of the House should be made by separate Members and not by the same; but in Committee it was competent for any two Members to move and second the Motion alternately, though they could not do so in the "House" when the Speaker was in the Chair. When a Motion for Adjournment had been made, Members speaking thereupon ought to be confined by the Chair to the subject of Adjournment, and ought not to be allowed to speak on the Main Question. In past time the Speaker exercised more power than now, having since been controlled by precedents and Sessional Orders. These matters had been considered by Committees in 1820, in 1848, and in 1861, and might now fairly be considered again; for, while taking the greatest care not to interfere with the Rules which had grown up in the course of time, their operation ought to be carefully watched to see that they did not conflict with changing requirements. Members were now occupied in attending the House for an average of nine hours a-day, in addition to which 250 were sitting on Select Committees and others on Private Bills; and having regard to the pressure of their duties, no duty could be more incumbent on them than to adopt any measures they could to lighten the burden of their labours and to expedite the transaction of the business of the country. These were some of the matters for consideration with a view to amendment, and on their account he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able on a future day to assent to the appointment of a Select Committee.

MR. NEWDEGATE rejoiced that this subject was brought forward by his hon. Friend, for it involved a question of some importance. The hon. Member was proceeding, when—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,

House adjourned at Eight o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 7th May, 1877.

SOUTH AFRICA—ANNEXATION OF THE TRANSVAAL.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY asked the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies, Whether he has any information to communicate to the House as to the reported annexation of the Transvaal Territory by Sir Theophilus Shepstone?

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, I am not surprised the noble Earl should have asked for some information on this subject. So far as my official information or any official announcement is concerned, I have no information to give your to Lordships; but I have received a telegram from Sir Bartle Frere at Kimberley, which leaves no doubt whatever that the Transvaal has passed under British protection. The telegram states that news arrived there on the 16th instant to the effect that on the 22nd of March Sir Theophilus Shepstone annexed the Transvaal territory to the British dominions, and that he had abolished the war tax, and that no opposition was expected to the measure. According to the Press telegrams the news had been received with general satisfaction from Kimberley to Victoria. This is not the time to go into explanations; but I may say this—that in consequence of what the Correspondence showed to be occurring I had for some time feared that this event would come to pass. I have repeatedly during the last 12 months given most serious warnings, if you will; encouragement, if you will; and promise of support, if you will—but all in vain. Recently the situation became, I may say, perfectly deplorable. Not only had the Transvaal country lapsed into a chronic state of anarchy in which its Government was incapable of fulfilling the duties of the government of a civilized country, either to its own subjects or its neighbours, but the country itself was split up in factions: the peace patched up with the Native Chiefs turned out to be a delusion, and—what constitutes the greatest danger—the Zulu King, who can command an army of 20,000 or 30,000 Kaffirs, has shown undoubted signs of hostility, and made a movement on the borders. I can only say that in those circumstances the danger seemed to be—and is now, perhaps—very serious for all parties. I am satisfied that it has been owing to the great influence of Sir Theophilus Shepstone that peace has been preserved up to this time. If this news be true—if annexation has been resorted to—I have little doubt it has been as a measure of self-preservation, so far as we are concerned, far more than anything else. It is stated that there has been a Protest from President Burgers; but I have reason to think that it is a Protest of the most formal character, because certainly a very large proportion indeed of the community of Transvaal, and that representing the intelligence, wealth, and respectability of the country, has, for some time past, in presence of those serious dangers, desired the incorporation of their territory with the British dominions. I need hardly say that I am not surprised at what has occurred. I regret it; but, at the same time, I regard it as inevitable. Your Lordships will not expect me to express any precise opinion as to the grounds on which Sir Theophilus Shepstone has taken the step. This seems to me to be peculiarly a case in which we are bound to withhold an opinion until we have some knowledge of the particular circumstances—which I expect to receive before long. At the same time, it would be unfair to Sir Theophilus Shepstone if for one moment I allowed the impression to go abroad that I thought he was wanting in judgment and discretion in the step he has taken. My impression is that he carried forbearance to the last point, and that it was only the extreme emergency of the situation, and the conviction that the peace and the lives of the whole of the White inhabitants of that part of South Africa were involved induced him to adopt the measures he is reported to have taken. When I receive the details of the measures, I will take the earliest opportunity of laying before Parliament the Papers containing that information.

THE MEDITERRANEAN—SECURITY OF COMMERCE.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD WAVENEY, in rising to move an Address on the subject of commerce in the Mediterranean, said, that he spoke neither in reference to nor on behalf of either of the belligerents, nor in reference to nor on behalf of either of the political Parties in that House. His desire was to elicit from Her Majesty's Government a statement of the measures they intended to adopt for the protection of our maritime interests in the event of a prolongation of this war. A hope was indulged that the war would be localized. He felt it impossible to join in such an anticipation—it was a war, he thought, the effects of which were likely to be felt from the North Cape to Aden. It was no exaggeration, he thought, to term it a war of unexampled extent, though he trusted it would not be a war of unexampled duration. Was it possible that it could be localized? If not, all the trade of the Levant would be imperilled. It was not impossible that hostilities would be carried into the Mediterranean, and the first cannon shot fired in that sea would let loose all the elements of revolt and disturbance along its shores, and thus seriously disturb the commerce of neutrals, and especially of this country. Pirates in the direction of the Islands of the Levant and along the low-lying coasts of Dalmatia would then find their account in such a state of disturbance, and would issue forth to prey upon commerce indiscriminately, as they had done during the Greek War of Independence. The introduction of steam into the Commercial Marine, by making the vessels which used it more visible at a distance, increased in one way the dangers of piracy. Then there were very grave questions as to blockade and contraband of war—among which coal was now reckoned—respecting which an arrangement among the Maritime Powers might be very desirable. He had heard on good authority that even if Port Said was blockaded a free passage through the Suez Canal with the aid of pilots might be preserved, and he suggested that an international rule might be adopted, in accordance with which a through passage by seaways from one part of the world to another might be left for those not engaged in belligerent operations. He did not desire that the combination which he advocated should be in the nature of an alliance—all he desired was a combination of the Maritime States to preserve the freedom and security of that commerce to which, in a great degree, they were indebted for their existence and their power.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to invite the co-operation of the Governments of the Maritime States, her allies, in maintaining the security of commerce in the Mediterranean and in the seaways leading thereto."—(The Lord Wavenny.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY pointed out that no instance of piracy had been mentioned by the noble Lord except the one to which he had called attention on a previous evening. He thought the noble Lord ought to have been satisfied with the answer he then received from the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs; and that some consideration might be shown to Ministers in regard to putting the same Questions twice over. As the noble Lord did not come from the other side of St. George's Channel, there was no excuse for calling the Danube a seaway. With regard to piracy, and what the noble Lord called the wandering pirates of the Mediterranean, they did not in reality exist—the case to which the noble Lord called attention on Monday was not piracy, but simple brigandage. The noble Lord had referred to the Greek War of Independence, but at that time there were no steamers, and at the time of the Crimean War there was no piracy to speak of, though the Greek Government then acted in opposition to the French and English allied forces, invaded Thessaly, and let loose all the bad characters from the gaols. The question, also, of the Suez Canal had been the subject of recent consideration by the House, and he could not see what good could be done by again referring to it. At present, in fact, he could see no reason for any of the evils the noble Lord anticipated. He seemed to have caught a nightmare from a recent perusal of Robinson Crusoe, in which he had seen more Sallee rovers and Algerine corsairs than ever issued from those ports.

LORD DUNSANY thought it would be very undignified of this country to ask the other Maritime Powers to assist them in doing that which they could do for themselves. A few ships of the British Navy would give a summary account of any pirates who might attempt to prey on British commerce. The noble Lord, moreover, had omitted to indicate who were the Maritime Powers whose aid it was desirable to invoke. They might depend upon it that other countries, if they saw their interest was involved, would soon take means to put down pirates, without waiting for an appeal from us. The events of the Greek War of Independence, 50 years ago, were quite beside the question of the present day. It was inconceivable that piracy should exist in the Mediterranean in the presence of a few fast steamers on its coasts; and co-operation of the kind suggested might be calculated rather to hamper than assist in its suppression.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Your Lordships will probably desire that I should answer the Questions suggested by the Motion of the noble Lord (Lord Wavenny), and in doing so perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words by way of comment on the course which the noble Lord has adopted. I do not make it a subject of complaint that the Notice given by the noble Lord is of the most vague and general character; but I do make this observation—that there is absolutely nothing in that Notice which could inform anybody of what are the particular matters affecting the security of commerce to which it was the noble Lord's intention to call attention. I am sure your Lordships will understand me, and will not think I am putting unnecessary difficulties in the way of discussion, if I say that when questions are raised as to what constitutes contraband of war, or as to what particular regulations have been issued by the Turkish authorities with regard to operations on the Danube—when questions of that kind are raised, and answers to them are pressed for, it is not unreasonable that a person in my position should expect to know beforehand what the precise points are to which attention is intended to be directed; because such questions may involve very difficult points of International Law, on which a Minister of the Crown must speak with the appearance of authority; and therefore I cannot think that anyone holding the office which I hold should be called upon to give an opinion which would go forth as the opinion of the British Government, unless he has previously had time for consideration, and for eliciting the advice of those who are specially conversant with those matters. With regard to the other questions raised, I have less difficulty in answering the noble Lord. He first expressed great apprehension that this war would not be localized. He thought it would spread to an unexampled extent. I shall not indulge in any predictions, but I do not think the noble Lord gave any reason for the apprehension he expressed.

LORD WAVENEY wished to explain that what he had said, or intended to say, was that he feared the war would be of wide extent, though he hoped it would not be of unexampled duration. That it was of wide extent he illustrated by saying that its effects might be felt from the North Cape to Aden—and he feared that in its consequences it might spread over the Mediterranean.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I understood the noble Lord to say that it extended or would extend from the North Cape to Aden; but I cannot think that the people at the North Cape or those at Aden can apprehend that they are in much danger. Again, the noble Lord fears that with the outbreak of this war there will come a repetition of those piratical proceedings which occurred to so large an extent in the war of Greek Independence. I should doubt whether that will be the case, and I will say why. In the first place, the whole condition of things is changed by the introduction of steam—which alone makes an immense difference. The noble Lord then spoke of the difficulty our iron-plated ships would have in passing piratical vessels. Of course our iron-clads were not made for the purpose of chasing pirates. But here I must observe that I do not think that a disadvantage arises to the Mercantile Marine from the use of steam. No sailing vessel will be in the long run a match for a steamer, so far as speed is concerned; and I do not apprehend that pirates will fit out steamers. Again, in the neighbourhood of those islands to which the noble Lord referred the state of society along the coasts is altogether changed from what it was formerly. In fact, the present conditions are entirely different from those which existed at the time of the Greek War of Independence. At all events, as far as matters have gone up to the present time—I can state this as a matter of fact—no single complaint has reached me from people in the Greek waters in reference to any renewed outbreak of piracy there, either actual or expected. The only case that has come to the knowledge of the Foreign Office was the one mentioned a week ago by the noble Lord himself; and the result was not very encouraging to the persons who set up in that line, because the affair ended in the whole of the party being captured. I may notice, too, in passing, that that case was not one of piracy in the usual sense of the word. It was not an attack made on a vessel at sea, but a descent on an unprotected village. We have a certain number of gunboats and other small and fast vessels which are competent for the protection of commerce, and the number can always be increased if necessary. And we are not alone in the world. France, Italy, and Germany have powerful Navies; and I have not the slightest doubt that there would be an entire willingness to co-operate with us, and that in such a case no feeling of international rivalry or jealousy would be allowed to exist. I am not quite sure as to what the noble Lord said about some new arrangement or combination for the protection of commerce. I failed to make out clearly whether the noble Lord suggests that the Maritime Powers should combine to introduce new regulations, or combine together for the more stringent enforcement of the international obligations which now exist. If the latter be the suggestion, then I do not think there is on that point much difference between the noble Lord and myself. If there were anything which we considered an invasion of the rights of Neutral Powers we should undoubtedly, and as a matter of course, communicate with the other Neutral Powers, and we should be ready and willing to concur with them in a common line of action. I am not, however, aware that, under the existing rules of International Law, there is any want of due provision against interference with the interests of commerce. At any rate, it is better, I think, to wait until some real case arises. With regard to the question of the Suez Canal, I am sure the noble Lord will excuse me for saying that it is too grave and too delicate a one to be dealt with in an off-hand manner. I have already stated here, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated in "another place," that we are watching that question earnestly and anxiously with the view, should the case arise, of taking such steps as may be necessary for the protection of British commerce. I do not, for my own part, I confess, apprehend the danger and difficulty on that point which many persons seem to think may arise. I am quite sure it is not the wish nor the interest of either of the Powers now belligerents to bring upon itself the hostility of neutral nations by an interference with neutral trade which would be absolutely wanton and unnecessary, and could serve no useful purpose in the operations of war. I think the noble Lord will anticipate the answer I have to give as to his Motion. Indeed, I presume he put that Motion on the Paper rather with the view of introducing a discussion than of pressing it on your Lordships. We are quite ready to ask the co-operation of all the Maritime Powers to extend the security to commerce whenever we see or whenever it is shown that there is a necessity for such an extension; but I do not think it would be of any use to invite their co-operation unless we had had some specific proposal to bring before them. In any case it is not necessary to address the Crown to direct us to do that which we are perfectly willing to do without any Address such as that proposed by the noble Lord.

LORD WAVENEY begged to express his satisfaction with the answer of the noble Earl generally, but more especially with that part of it having reference to the Suez Canal. He would withdraw his Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

QUESTIONS.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1870— SCHOOL BOARD OF SWINDON.

QUESTION.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE asked the Vice President of the Council, If he will explain the reasons which have prevented the Education Department issuing an order for the formation of a School Board for the town of Swindon, in Wiltshire, notwithstanding the expiration, on the 27th September, 1876, of the time mentioned in the final notice of the 27th March, 1876; if it is the case that the Auction Mart, said to have been recently purchased for the purposes of a Church School, was still being used for sales on April 28th, 1877, and can in any case only provide accommodation for 350 children out of the 580 specified in the final notice of the Department; and, if he is aware that the population of Swindon, being now 18,400, and school accommodation existing for only 1,952 children, fresh educational accommodation is required for 1,114 children and not for 580 only?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, the usual procedure of the Department has been followed in the case of the formation of the Swindon School Board. The time limited by the final notice expired on the 8th of October, 1876, and, in conformity with our invariable practice, the matter was referred to the Inspector to report whether the requirements of the Department had been or were in course of being fulfilled. His Report informed us that the accommodation required was in course of being supplied, and that arrangements were being made for acquiring possession of the Auction Mart, which would supply accommodation for 223 children, and that the National School would be enlarged so as to provide for 370 children, thus providing extra accommodation for 593, being in excess of the number required by the final notice. I do not know whether the Auction Mart at Swindon was used for sales in April of this year, but it was certainly bought for the school in 1876. As to the increase in the population of Swindon, we are only able to complete the supply of the country upon the basis of the population when our notices were originally published. As soon as we have completed the general supply of the country upon this basis, which I hope will be shortly the case, we shall then have to make another inquiry, which will, of course, entail the usual notice to the locality demanded by the Act of 1870, and we shall lose no time in seeing that the accommodation for the increased population is provided. I need hardly remind my noble Friend, that if any locality desires to have a school board, and if a majority of the ratepayers vote for it in legal form, a school board is at once ordered by the Department.

INDIA—TAXATION OF INDIA.

QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, with reference to the new measures of Taxation introduced in the Legislative Council of Bengal, Whether, in accordance with the instructions of the Secretary of State for India in Council, dated 31st March, 1874, and 11th November, 1875, the intention to introduce those measures was previously communicated to the Secretary of State in Council; if so, whether they have been considered and approved by him?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, information of the intended legislation was sent home to my noble Friend the Secretary of State by telegraph under the clause of the despatch of the 11th November, 1875, referring to urgency. The Secretary of State gave leave for the introduction of the measures, reserving his liberty of expressing any objection at a later stage. At the same time, it is right to say that my noble Friend the present Secretary of State has for some time past recommended to the Viceroy the principle that where irrigation has been provided at large expense by the State for the benefit of any locality or province, the locality or province so benefited should recuperate the State.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT (1876)—
SEAWORTHY SHIPS—THE "CLYDESDALE."—QUESTION.

MR. GRIEVE asked the President of the Board of Trade, If it is true that the ship "Clydesdale," after being in the hands of tradesmen at Greenock for more than a month, and under the inspection of the two local surveyors to Lloyds Register of Shipping, and repaired to class with them, was frequently visited by the local surveyors of the Board of Trade while being so repaired, and no objection made against the vessel; if it be true that when repairs were nearly completed, cargo taken on board, and the crew shipped, the Board of Trade caused Mr. Price, their chief officer for the Clyde, and three others to survey the "Clydesdale," who reported her unseaworthy; whether he is aware that the owner thereupon demanded a special survey from Lloyds, who appointed Mr. Mumford of Glasgow and Mr. Williamson of Sunderland to join Mr. Boulds and Mr. Couchman (the local surveyors) on the survey, and if he is aware these four surveyors unanimously pronounced the vessel perfectly seaworthy; if it is true that Mr. Turner, the principal surveyor of the Board of Trade, was unable to confirm the decision of his colleagues when the ship was released; and, whether the Board of Trade is prepared to make compensation to the owner of the "Clydesdale?"

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY: The officers of the Board of Trade, Sir, may not interfere with a ship until she is brought forward for some service at sea. I do not know of any of them visiting the Clydesdale while she was under repair in the hands of Lloyd's surveyors. If they did, they would not interfere while such repairs were incomplete. At the proper time the district officer, without any direction from the Board of Trade, exercised his judgment as to her fitness to go safely to sea, as was his duty, and detained her. The owners resorted to the provisions of the 6th section of the Act of last year, and appointed a surveyor out of the statutory list, who with two Board of Trade surveyors, agreed that the ship should be further surveyed. Upon this the owners, instead of appealing to the Court of Survey, asked the Board of Trade to send down one of their principal surveyors, who went down to Glasgow and reported that the ship might be allowed to go to sea without serious danger to life, but that the preliminary detention was on reasonable grounds and perfectly justified by the appearance of certain timber heads. The Clydesdale was thereupon released, but compensation, of course, has not been applied for.

QUESTION.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Copy of the Joint Representation, made 17th February, 1877, at Constantinople, with reference to the Turkish Loan of 1854, and the Reply made by the Porte, for which papers an Address was moved on the 22nd March, will be presented to the House?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, he could assure his right hon. Friend that there would be no unnecessary delay in producing the Papers to which the Question referred.

Sir George Campbell

HOLDERS.—QUESTION.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in fulfilment of their promise last Session to influence the Porte in favour of the bondholders of the 1854 Turkish Loan, the Government will represent at Constantinople the injustice of the Turkish Ambassador in London withholding from the Bank of England the formal instruction to pay to the bondholders the money belonging to them now in the Bank, and under no possible circumstances available for any other purpose?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, the House was aware from the Answers given to former Questions that the matter referred to had been brought under the notice of the Porte, and that joint representations had been made on the subject by the Governments of England and France. He might add that the Government proposed to take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the return of the British Ambassador to Constantinople to press the matter again upon the attention of the Porte, and to make remonstrances in its own interests as well as in the interests of the bondholders.

QUESTION.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, he wished to ask a Question of the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, of which he had not been able to give him Notice:—Whether he could give the House any information as to the truth of the report contained in the newspapers that morning of the annexation of the Transvaal Republic?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies does not appear to be in his place; but I can state that no official announcement of the annexation of the Transvaal has been received, but I am informed by Lord Carnarvon that he has no reason to doubt that Sir Theophilus Shepstone, having exhausted every means of arriving at a settlement of the difficulties with which he had to contend, has been compelled to adopt the measure in question.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE
COMMITTEE.—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had a Notice on the Paper on the subject of the Business of the House, and he would venture to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it was the intention of the Government to move for a Select Committee to consider the subject of the Public Business of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that in consequence of the House being counted out on Friday night he had an opportunity of giving an explanation on this subject. He had now to state that Her Majesty's Government were not of opinion the time had come for the appointment of a Select Committee on Public Business.

POSTPONEMENT OF ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MR. TREVELYAN: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich a Question of which I have given him private Notice. It is a Question the reply to which many other hon. Members besides myself await with very deep interest. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether, in the place of his second Resolution, he will substitute words which would make it read as follows:—

"That this House is of opinion that the Porte, by its conduct towards its subject populations, and by its refusal to give guarantees for their better government, has forfeited all claim to receive either the material or the moral support of the British Crown;"

and, whether he will abstain from moving his third and fourth Resolutions?

MR. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the Question of my hon. Friend, I need not say that I stand here, as I stood last week, responsible for the whole of these five Resolutions; and, indeed, I do not think it is within my competence myself to move, or rather to adopt, any change in them before moving them, in consideration of the understanding that prevails between Members of this House and the principles upon which Notices are given—unless it were a merely verbal change, which this can hardly be called. Nevertheless, I quite accede to the substance of both the propositions of my hon. Friend. I will read the words of the second Resolution to the House as he has proposed it, because, only having heard them once, it is possible that the House may not gather their full effect. He proposes that the second Resolution, which in its original form is before all the Members of the House, should run as follows:—

“That this House is of opinion that the Porte by its conduct towards its subject populations, and by its refusal to give guarantees for their better government, has forfeited all claim to receive either the material or the moral support of the British Crown.”

Sir, that Resolution is entirely satisfactory to me, though it is not exactly the form of words I proposed; and though, as I have said, I do not feel warranted in making a change and asking the House at once to consider that change, if it be the pleasure of my hon. Friend to move that change I should readily accede to it, and be prepared to support it. With regard, Sir, to the remaining Resolutions, I may say as respects the Amendment of my hon. Friend opposite the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth), to substitute the word “obtaining” for “exacting,” I have no objection to that Amendment whatever. I presume the mode of proceeding would be this—I shall move the first Resolution, upon which I suppose there will be a division. I shall then move the second Resolution, in order that my hon. and learned Friend may have an opportunity, if he thinks fit, of moving to substitute the word which he has proposed; and if out of that Amendment of his a division should grow, I, of course, should be very ready that that division should take place. With regard to the other Resolutions, I shall not think it necessary to trouble the House by asking you, Mr. Speaker, to put them from the Chair.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am aware that there is no Question before the House, and that I have no right to address the House, but perhaps I may be allowed to say one word. It appears to me, Sir, that the Resolutions as proposed to be amended by my right hon. Friend are such as will meet with very general support—at all events from this side of the House; and with that conviction I wish to appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) not to take the course of which he has given Notice, of moving the Previous Question.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: After the important announcement which has just been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, the state of the case is entirely altered. The Resolutions as they will now stand I can cordially support, and therefore I shall not move the Previous Question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am not quite sure, Sir, that I heard correctly what fell from the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), and I am still less sure whether I understood correctly what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, but as it appears to me the House is getting into a very ridiculous position. Sir, it will be in the recollection of the House that about 10 days ago the hon. Member for East Cumberland (Mr. C. W. Howard) with some solemnity informed the House that in the unfortunate absence of the right hon. Member for Greenwich he desired to give Notice, on the part of that right hon. Gentleman, that he would, on the 1st of May, bring forward certain Resolutions “with regard to the Eastern Question and the prospective policy of the Government.” Well, we had that Notice given; and my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), with a sort of prescient intuition that it was likely there would be something rather curious in this Motion, gave Notice at once that he should be prepared to move the Previous Question. Then, on the following Monday, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich came down to the House, and gave Notice in the usual manner of the Resolutions which he was about to propose; and I remember quite well that he stated at the time he gave that Notice that he was anxious to put them in such a form as would give the House an opportunity of meeting them with any Amendment. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I said, I would move them separately.] Yes; or separately—separately with any Amendments. Well, hardly had that Notice been given when the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone got up and gave

Notice that he, on his part, would move the Previous Question. Well, Sir, the question then arose—could any Amendment be moved upon those Resolutions? It is no breach of confidence to say that my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch was anxious to alter the Notice which he had announced to the House, and to move an Amendment upon the first of these Resolutions. But he was informed that in consequence of the step that had been taken by the hon. Member for Maidstone he was precluded from doing so; and that even though the House might not support the hon. Member for Maidstone on the "Previous Question," it was absolutely impossible for my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch or any one else to move any Amendments at all upon the first of these Resolutions. Well, Sir, we on this side of the House have been called the "stupid Party;" and I freely admit that our wits are not so keen as the wits of hon. Gentlemen opposite, especially as the wit of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), for he has discovered a way of turning this difficulty by putting the Question whether certain Amendments would or would not be accepted. Having got the information that these Amendments would be accepted, then my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone is perfectly satisfied, and getting up, accepts the altered state of circumstances, and withdraws his Notice. Sir, I think this is really a very peculiar, and, I am bound to say, a rather undignified position for the House to be placed in, because this is a matter that has been before the country for more than a week; and my noble Friend the Postmaster General tells me that the telegraph revenue has been sensibly swelled by telegrams being sent to all parts of the country to support these important Resolutions. Meetings have also been held for the same purpose, and we were told that the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. E. Jenkins) was contemplating a new edition of his pamphlet which was to blow up the unnatural coalition on the other side of the House; in fact, that he was about to re-establish the mountain, and that the mountain was to bring forth something to-day. But, Sir, I confess that although we shall find ourselves in a position of some little difficulty in proceeding to discuss the very different Resolutions which are now to be submitted to us, still I think that perhaps of two absurdities we had better choose the lesser. Only this, I would venture to suggest to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch, as the noble Lord opposite has given his advice to the hon. Member for Maidstone that he should keep himself in reserve, so my hon. Friend should not pledge himself, till he sees whether at the end of the speech which we are all expecting to listen to to-night, my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich does really move this Resolution after all. We are so unused to what has passed that I feel that almost anything may happen, therefore I ought to make some such request as that—I beg to move that the Orders of the Day be postponed until after we have considered the Resolutions with regard to the Eastern Question.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Eastern Question."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Several hon. Members rose to address the House, proposing to raise a question of Order: but Mr. SPEAKER calling on Mr. Gladstone to proceed—

Mr. GLADSTONE said: I hope, Sir, I am not trespassing unduly upon the patient indulgence of the House in seeking to say a few words upon this Motion, inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the course of his speech, has made a very direct appeal to me, and has thought himself justified in insinuating a doubt whether I am about to move any of these Resolutions at all. I am aware of no ground that the right hon. Gentleman has for insinuating such a doubt, because I have already told the House that I am as much responsible at the present moment for the whole of these Resolutions as I was on Monday last. But with regard to the question how many of these Resolutions are to be put from the Chair, I think it is the usage of this House, known to all who hear me, and who are practised in the Business of this House, in the case of a string of Resolutions being moved, that it is a matter entirely within the discretion of the person moving them how many of them shall be put from the Chair—provided that he obtains from the House a judgment which, by fair implication, involves the judgment of the House on the whole of his propositions. The principle upon which I have proceeded in this case has been to put forward, in the first place, a Resolution to which, in my opinion, it will be most difficult for all candid and reasonable men to object, and I own that I was sanguine enough to believe that it might be possible to induce Her Majesty's Government to consider that Resolution. Having done so, I might have felt it to be my duty to propose the Resolutions which followed; but, at any rate, I am within my right in declining to put myself to the disadvantage of pledging myself to proceed to a succession of divisions on each of these Resolutions—possibly with diminishing numbers in each successive division. Therefore, I tell the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he has no moral right, and is entirely going beyond the bare courtesies of debate and of this House, in stating that he would wait until the close of the speech in order to ascertain whether any Resolution was moved at all, and when he calls upon me to state whether I do or do not intend to move the whole of these Resolutions. ["No, no!"] The noble Lord the Postmaster General takes exception to that statement. [Lord JOHN MANNERS: I said nothing of the kind.] Well, then, some equally good Conservative behind the noble Lord must have done so, and I beg the noble Lord's pardon for referring to him in that manner. The insinuation of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is, however, in direct contradiction to my statement that I was about to move the first Resolution, and that I should follow it by moving the second Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman got up and said he should wait until the end of my speech, in order to see whether I moved the Resolutions before he would advise the hon. Gentleman the Member for Christchurch what course he should take with regard to his Amendment. I am bound to say that that is not the treatment which hon. Members of this House are entitled to receive at the hands of the right hon. Gentleman. But the right hon. Gentleman said a good deal more than that; and in addressing myself to this point, I must assume a tone, I am afraid, of retaliation. The right hon. Gentleman says that the House is placed in an undignified position; he says that it is placed in an unusual position, and I even think he said it was placed in a ridiculous position. The last expression is rather strong, but I am not disposed to deny that the position of the House is unusual, or to assert that its position is altogether dignified. But, Sir, I ask if such is the case, to whom is that unusual and that undignified position of the House due? The question which I ask is, who is it that on this important matter has departed from the usage of the House;—who is it that upon the part of the Government which is challenged in its policy, for the first time, I believe in the history of this House, has condescended to meet a Motion of this kind by proposing to put aside a discussion upon it by means of a stifling Amendment? It is the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. From the right hon. Gentleman's side of the House proceeded the first proposal to meet my Resolutions by moving the Previous Question, and when the right hon. Gentleman was appealed to by me, he said that he had no intention of asking the hon. Gentleman who had given Notice of his intention to move the Previous Question to withdraw that Notice. I do not say that the right hon. Gentleman himself proposed to move the Previous Question; but I do say that he was perfectly willing to avail himself of its friendly shelter. If the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War is about to speak, or if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or any other Member of the Government is about to speak, I request them to tell me of any case in which a Government, challenged upon their policy in this House, have been either moved or have availed themselves of the shelter of the Previous Question. Why, Sir, we have the greatest right in the world to expect that we should be allowed an opportunity of perfectly free discussion on this subject. I speak of the great and vital matters of policy of Governments, and I want to know whether it is in the usage of the House for a Government so challenged to seek, or to employ the shelter of the Previous Question. Why, Sir, we had the strongest reason to suppose that we shall be allowed a perfectly free discussion, for again and again the chivalry of hon. Gentlemen opposite was indignant at not being allowed this opportunity of debate on this subject. Why, did not the hon. and gallant—I mean the politically gallant—Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), on an early night of the Session, directly challenge me to bring forward this question. The hon. Member could not endure that the policy of the Government should not be brought under discussion in this House, and he challenged me to bring it under its notice. I never complained. The right hon. Gentleman will do me the justice to say that I never complained of the hon. Member giving me that challenge. On the contrary, I said that he was within his free Parliamentary liberty in doing so; but I said that I should take the liberty of choosing my own time and mode in accepting that challenge. But that is not all. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire spoke only once on the subject, but the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been at it every night. Not an evening has passed on which the Eastern Question has been discussed that the right hon. Gentleman has not challenged us to question his policy. Really after what has been said to-night I must refer to some of the words he has used on former occasions. On the 16th of February, after the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire had referred to this subject, the right hon. Gentleman said the House had as much right to be taken into my confidence—

MR. ROEBUCK: I rise to Order, Sir. The right hon. Gentleman cannot properly refer to speeches which have been made in this House during the present Session.

MR. SPEAKER: No doubt it is against the Rules of the House to refer to what has been said by an hon. Member in a former debate during the same Session. I may, moreover, remind the House that the question immediately before it is the postponement of the Orders of the Day, and I am bound to say that some of the observations of the right hon. Gentleman are more relevant to the subject-matter of his Resolutions than to the Question immediately before the House.

MR. GLADSTONE: I shall entirely submit myself, Sir, to what you have said; but the right hon Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had expressed doubts as to my intentions which I thought were justified by none of the circumstances, and had by implication complained, as I thought, of myself, but, certainly, of some on this side of the House, of having placed the House in an undignified position. I was therefore, as I thought, under the compulsion to point out whence it was the doubts and difficulties have arisen—namely, as I thought, from the course which had been adopted by Her Majesty's Government. However, I will not prosecute the subject, but I will say as much as I feel it necessary to say upon it when we come to a discussion on the Motion.

MR. BENTINCK: I rise, Sir, for the purpose of expressing the hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not persevere with his Motion for postponing the Orders of the Day. I express that hope for two reasons. In the first place, a new issue has been raised, and I think hon. Members of the House are fairly entitled to ask that they should have time to consider the position in which they now find themselves before proceeding to a debate. No doubt the Government had Notice some hours ago of what was likely to take place; but the news has just burst upon the House, and we should have an opportunity of considering the question as it now stands. While I say that, I must frankly own for myself that the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman as we have them at present before us do not appear to me to show that any necessity whatever exists for postponing the Orders of the Day. So far as I am able to gather their purport, they do not amount to really anything. What he now proposes is nothing but a reductio ad absurdum of his previous proposition. But I have a second reason for the wish I have expressed, and that is, that we should remember the period of the Session at which we have arrived, the pressure of Public Business which exists, and the various matters of importance which we have to consider. I maintain that, under present circumstances, there is no ground whatever for postponing the Orders of the Day.

MR. GREENE: I cordially second what has just been said by the hon. Member for West Norfolk. If I were to state that the proposed treatment of which we have heard to-night of a grave and serious question was "un-English," I might, perhaps, be making use of an un-Parliamentary expression; but I must say that when the country is balancing, between war and no war, a subject of such importance as this should not be dealt with in the way in which some hon. Members opposite seem to desire. I think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) has had a sufficient expression of opinion, not only from his own side of the House, but from the country generally, to show him that it would have been better if he had altogether withdrawn his Resolutions. When he found that he could not be followed into the Lobby by a great many of his Liberal Friends—Gentlemen upon whom in the past he has been accustomed to depend, and whom we all respect—he ought, I think, to have taken a different course from that which he has now followed. As it is, he has adopted one of the most extraordinary steps ever taken in this House. I have been a good many years in Parliament; and I cannot remember a case of a Member in the position of the right hon. Gentleman coming down here and asking us—after we had been invited to consider certain Resolutions, after the country at large had been invited to consider them, and after meetings had been held over the land in their support—to take up those Resolutions all at once, in a very emasculated and attenuated form. I shall oppose the suspension of the Orders of the Day, and I think the country will agree with the view I take of the situation—namely, that this is not the kind of treatment to which this House should be subjected.

MR. CHAPLIN: I entirely concur with the last speaker, and the hon. Member for West Norfolk, in the wish that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not persevere with his Motion. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) has said that on a previous occasion I challenged him to bring forward a Vote of Want of Confidence in the Government. I did so. It was due to the Government, whom he had so fiercely assailed, that he should do so—and it was of even still greater importance in my idea if there was difference of opinion among us with regard to the policy of Her Majesty's Government—that Europe and that the world should know what the opinion of Parliament, with regard to this question, in reality was. But what is our position to-night? The whole state of affairs has changed. Ten days ago the right hon. Gentleman, through one of his Friends, gave Notice of Resolutions which created sensational excitement, not only in England, but throughout the world. To-night the Galleries are filled. The House is crowded. I, myself, were it not for the charity of my Friends, should be sitting on the steps of the Gangway. But now the right hon. Gentleman comes forward and withdraws two of his Resolutions and attacks the Chancellor of the Exchequer because the right hon. Baronet refuses, as he says, to meet him with a Vote of Confidence. Sir, I sincerely trust that the House will not consent to be treated in this manner. I trust we shall not consent to postpone the Orders of the Day in order to consider effete Resolutions. I hope that for the sake alike of the dignity of the House and the dignity of the country we shall mark to-night in a most emphatic and unmistakeable manner our sense of what I can only characterize as this childish vacillation of purpose.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I hope my hon. Friends who have spoken within the last few minutes will not, after all, resist the Motion for the postponement of the Orders of the Day. Whatever the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) has to say against the Government, let him say it, and let us have done with it. The right hon. Gentleman gave Notice of certain Resolutions—what their exact meaning might be we might find out, I suppose, in the course of discussion; but, by some inscrutable process, our opponents have agreed upon the course to be adopted this evening, and those Resolutions have now been so dealt with that the opposition of the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) has been withdrawn, and the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) will bring, I presume, his now united forces in support of a portion of that which a few nights ago only commanded support of a scattered remnant of his Party. Hon. Members have not allowed us to witness the preliminary proceedings which have led to this result; but we are acquainted with them, although we were not present at the rehearsal of what we have seen enacted here this evening. We have had a tragedy in this House more than once, and the right hon. Gentleman opposite has been the embodiment of it. We have this evening had a farce, and a farce so ridiculous and absurd that those engaged in it could hardly keep their countenances. Why, the hon. Member for Maidstone, as he withdrew the Amendment which he was about to present to the House, could not for the moment cease from laughing, and he had not the gravity of the augur when he looked into the faces of hon. Members. But we are not afraid to meet our opponents on whatever ground they may take their stand. The right hon. Gentleman has said we are afraid of meeting him—that we are afraid of a Vote of Censure; but when I looked through these Resolutions I could not see what it was he wanted to accuse us of. We were informed that he aimed at indicating what should be the prospective policy of the country; but I have not been able to find from the Resolutions what that policy should be. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that two of the Resolutions are of such a character that the Government may accept them; and yet these are the very Resolutions on which he asks you to condemn us. He has withdrawn the others. Does he mean to call attention to those Resolutions which he is not going to press? Is he going to press an indictment on which he is not going to take a decision? Is he going to press those Resolutions which he thinks so milk-and-watery? —[“Order, order!”]

MR. SPEAKER: I must again interpose. I hardly think the observations of the right hon. Gentleman relevant to the Question before the House.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I bow at once, Sir, to your decision. When the question arose as to postponing the Orders of the Day I thought it desirable and important to show why the Government should be anxious that the debate should proceed; but, as I have said, I at once bow to the opinion which you have just indicated.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM: I also think that the Orders of the Day should not be postponed. Resolutions about which meetings have been held throughout the country are now brought before us in an attenuated form; and I think that not only the Government, but the House and the nation have a right to longer notice of the extraordinary change which has been made in those Resolutions this evening than we have received.

MR. COURTNEY: I am sorry to interpose; but I cannot help rising to express my concurrence in the views of those who think the Orders should not be postponed. I think that as matters now stand we should all ask ourselves, are we in such a position that it is desirable, not in the interests of the House only, but in the interests of the country, that we should now proceed to discuss the Resolutions which we are asked to debate. Is it worth while to set aside the regular Business of the evening for the purpose of considering these two Resolutions alone? It is almost impossible to consider them without discussing those that are to be withdrawn; and as for those that remain, it appears to me that the first Resolution is one of which Her Majesty's Government must approve; and as to the second, it does not seem to me to involve anything on which we are not agreed. In fact, they express precisely the opinion of the Foreign Secretary. More than that, Sir, by proceeding in this way the House may be understood as giving its opinion on the third and fourth Resolutions. I can quite understand the feelings of the Secretary for War in desiring that the question should be discussed and decided at once, and that anything from a Party point of view would be better for his purpose than a postponement. But if we are to rise above Party, if we are to consider the whole country, and I may say the whole of Europe—for all the Governments of Europe are awaiting the opinion of this House as to the policy which it is right to pursue—is it desirable or expedient that a Party vote should be taken under the present circumstances, which would not fully convey to the world what that opinion really is? I was surprised that the hon. Member for Maidstone so easily withdrew his Notice, as under present circumstances it seems to me that the Previous Question is the most wise thing that could be put. When we consider that the whole country has been agitated about these Resolutions, I do think it will be in the highest degree impolitic to discuss not the whole four Resolutions, but the first two, which mean nothing.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY: Sir, I have a suggestion to make, and it is this—that the right hon. Member for Greenwich should propose his first Resolution, and that the Government should support it. As the sting has been taken out of the Resolutions, which during the past week have been agitating the country, it seems to me that this method could be adopted without the slightest danger or difficulty. In doing so we should only accept that with which we can cordially agree.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I, Sir, also should agree with the suggestion made by the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), if I were sure that the issue raised by the Resolutions this afternoon has been materially changed by the statement the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich has made, and I wish to put a question on the subject. Certainly the right hon. Gentleman himself could not have conceived that the statement which he made in the earlier part of the evening has materially altered the issue before the House. The issue has not been altered by his willingness to accept the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for the Border Burghs, for that Amendment only strengthens the second, and very slightly, perhaps, weakens a single expression in the third Resolution. The important change, if change there be, lies in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that he would not trouble the House by inviting its decision on the third and fourth Resolutions. The question which, if I were in Order, I should like to put to the right hon. Gentleman is, whether, in view of the discussion which has now taken place, he would not submit the third and fourth, as well as the first and second Resolutions, to the House? I did not understand that the right hon. Gentleman personally held any objection to the submission of these two Resolutions. I understood that he still maintains them as he did when he first put them on the Paper, and that he was only actuated—these were his own words—by a desire to save the trouble of the House. But, Sir, considering that these Resolutions in their entirety have now been for some time before the House; that they have also been the subject of discussion in the country, and that the country has pronounced an opinion upon them, though a very different opinion from that which the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmund's (Mr. Greene) imagines, I do think it is desirable that all the Resolutions should now be submitted to the judgment of the House.

MR. E. JENKINS: I rise in support of the appeal of my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Chamberlain) in regard to these Resolutions. Those who have spoken from the Front bench I think have spoken with great justice of the farcical nature of the scene enacted this evening. I cannot but feel that it would be a most undignified proceeding if, after the whole country and the whole of Europe has been invited to observe the Resolutions which the right hon. Gentleman brings forward, they should now be so completely emasculated as has been proposed. Therefore I hope, in fair justice and in honest Party warfare, that the right hon. Gentleman will consent to go on with these two latter Resolutions, and submit them to the opinion of the House. If he only proposes the first two Resolutions, as he has mentioned, I certainly, if the House goes to a division, shall be prepared to vote against postponing the Orders of the Day in order to discuss two simple matters of theory.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER: It has been said that the Resolutions in their emasculated state do not amount to a challenge of the conduct and policy of the Government, and are such as they may accept them. The Resolutions have also been designated as "milk-and-watery" Resolutions, and what I want to know is, why we should be asked to postpone the Orders of the Day in order to discuss Resolutions of that character? The best solution of the difficulty in which we are placed will be to refuse to postpone them, and I certainly shall not vote for the Motion.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that as he was not now entitled to answer the questions which had been put to him in that discussion, he would refer to them when he had the power of bringing forward his Motion.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the question before the House appears to me to be one which ought to be decided entirely on the ground of the convenience of the great majority of the House. Hon. Members who have urged that the Orders of the Day should not be postponed, undoubtedly, if they think fit, have a perfect right to make that request, because the issue submitted by my right hon. Friend has been, whether materially or not, altered to a certain extent—I will not discuss to what extent—and the House has, if it thinks fit, an undoubted right to require sufficient Notice of the terms of that alteration. On the other hand, I must say it appears to me that the great majority of the House are perfectly willing that the discussion should proceed at once; and as that seems also to be the wish of the Government, I am unable to see why difficulties should be interposed in the way of the immediate commencement of the debate. I wish, however, before it begins, that there should be no misunderstanding as far as I am concerned as to the advice which I have given to my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), and the position which I myself occupy. It is perfectly true that—as I think has been already pointed out—upon some occasions, when a series of Resolutions are proposed for consideration, the decision of the House is challenged on the whole series by a division on the first Resolution. But, on the other hand, I believe it is perfectly possible for the House to enter on the discussion of a series of Resolutions on the understanding that they will be submitted one by one, and that the opinion of the House will be challenged upon each. Now, Sir, the advice which I gave to the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone, and which he accepted, was distinctly based on the understanding that the first Resolution would be moved, that the second also would be moved with the Amendment which has been suggested and accepted by my right hon. Friend, but that the decision of the House would not be challenged on the third and fourth Resolutions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I quite agree with the noble Lord that in this matter regard ought to be had to the convenience of the House; but I would venture to add that there are other considerations which ought not to be left out of sight. Regard ought also to be had to the effect which will be produced, not only in this country, but even in foreign countries, if, after all the preparations which have been made for the discussion coming on this evening, those preparations are suddenly laid aside for reasons which I think would be hardly intelligible in England, and which would be utterly unintelligible abroad. I do not myself think there need be any difficulty in our proceeding with the discussion in consequence of the change which the right hon. Gentleman has made in his Resolutions. Undoubtedly, the change as described by the noble Lord is a change of the most material character—that is to say, if we are only to be asked to affirm the first and second Resolutions, and not to be invited to express an opinion on what is really the substantive and operative part of the Resolutions—namely, that referring to the future policy of the country. That, no doubt, is a material change in the position. It has been said that by accepting the first of these Resolutions we should be accepting, by implication, the whole of them. ["No, no!"] The right hon. Gentleman himself made use of an expression—I am not quite sure what he intended by it—as to the acceptance by implication of the substance of the whole.

MR. GLADSTONE: No, no; I had not the slightest intention of implying that the judgment of the House on the first Resolution had anything to do with its judgment on the other Resolutions. All I said was this—that by implication or inference, I could judge, perhaps, for myself by the judgment on the first what the judgment would be on the others.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I hope, at all events, the House understands all these explanations. I wish to make a suggestion to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), which I think may, to some extent, clear up our position. We have been rather taunted by my right hon. Friend for sheltering ourselves behind the Previous Question when challenged on our policy—the challenge consisting in a Resolution which he thinks we ought to accept—rather an odd sort challenge, I think. But now we are left in greater difficulty, because we are told that if we discuss and pass the first Resolution by itself the effect or consequence will be to influence the judgment of a great many besides my right hon. Friend himself as to whether this House would agree to the operative part of the Resolutions; whilst the first Resolution would be supported by the noble Lord opposite and others who would not support the operative part of the Resolutions. If I may venture to use such a simile, it seems as if my right hon. Friend had taken a lesson from a certain picture in the Royal Academy ("The Finishing Touch"), in which a lady who is having her hair powdered keeps her whole body behind a curtain in order that no harm may come to her dress. The right hon. Gentleman appears to me to have taken some such precaution as that, in order that no harm may occur to the great body of the policy which is indicated in these Resolutions. But the suggestion which I would make to the hon. Member for Christchurch is, that he should do that which he was always anxious to do after the Notice of these Resolutions had been given, but which he was prevented from doing by the Notice of the hon. Member for Maidstone—namely, that instead of moving the Previous Question, he should meet the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman with an Amendment—something of this character—"That this House declines to pass any Resolution which may embarrass the policy of Her Majesty's Government, if that Resolution be not accompanied by any indication of an alternative policy." I have no doubt that if my hon. Friend who has been defeated by the tactics on the other side were to move such a Resolution, it would lead us to a clear issue upon the question. I hope that hon. Members on this side of the House will not object to the postponement of the Orders. I can assure them that I speak not in any Party sense, or in any Party interest, when I say that I believe it would be a great detriment to the public interest if, after all, this matter were not to be discussed.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, what the right hon. Gentleman had suggested was precisely the offer which had been made to him the other night. The offer made to the Government was that the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) would withdraw his Motion if the Government would propose a Vote of Confidence in themselves. ["Oh, oh!"] Perhaps that was an inaccurate expression, and he would substitute—if they would rehearse one of those scenes with the hon. Member for Christchurch which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had so well described. They had offered the Government that dress rehearsal the other night. A distinct offer had been made to the Government by the hon. Member for Christchurch, and the hon. Member for Maidstone that day would withdraw the Previous Question if the Government would submit a direct vote on their own policy. He did not think, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had quite accurately described the position of the hon. Member for Maidstone in saying that he had stood in their way.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: That is all very well, but the hon. and learned Gentleman has entirely forgotten the circumstances of the case. The hon. Member for Maidstone had the "Previous Question" on the Paper as well as the hon. Member for Christchurch, and it was impossible for the hon. Member for Christchurch to assume the first place, unless he knew that the hon. Member for Maidstone agreed to withdraw his Notice. [SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: He offered to do so.] Yes, that is just the point—he offered it, but when? When the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had put an Amendment upon the Paper which the noble Lord and his Friends wished the Government to accept.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN: It seems to me that we shall be spending the whole night in debating whether we have anything to debate. We on this side are exceedingly anxious that a discussion should take place; and I think that the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is a very good one—that the hon. Member for Christchurch should withdraw the Previous Question, and allow us to get an intelligible issue.

MR. FAWCETT: I am not going to make any remarks on the general question; but I wish to ask a question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich and the hon. Member for Maidstone—because I am bound to confess that to us sitting here it seems that we are getting into a greater and greater haze as to the position in which we are now placed. I do not know whether that position is clear to right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Front benches opposite, but it certainly is not to us. I may fairly ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich to tell us whether, he intends to move in some modified form the third and fourth Resolutions; and I think we have also a right to ask the hon. Member for Maidstone whether, if these Resolutions should be put, he will then revert to the Previous Question? The person to decide whether the Resolutions should be put or not is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich; and I am sure it would give much satisfaction to many who intend to support him—as I do—if he would say if he intends to move the third and fourth Resolutions; and if he does, then will the hon. Baronet tell us whether the understanding between himself and the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition holds good? If these two questions are answered, it seems to me that we shall be in a position to begin the debate at once with a clear and distinct issue before us.

MR. ONSLOW thought the right hon. Member for Greenwich should state whether he had determined to withdraw the third and fourth Resolutions before the House could satisfactorily commence any discussion; but he desired to know from the Chair whether the right hon. Gentleman would not have to obtain the consent of the House to that course, and whether he could withdraw them without giving the House a reason?

MR. SPEAKER, in reply said, that the House had no power to compel the right hon. Gentleman, after proposing his first Resolution, to go on with the Resolutions succeeding.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I rise to a point of Order. It appears to me that the Amendment of which I have given Notice takes precedence of all others; but it appears also that the right hon. Gentleman is not going to put forward his second Resolution in the amended, but in the original form; whereupon an Amendment will be proposed by the hon. Member for the Border Burghs. It appears to me that if the Motion for the Previous Question is first put, it will not be possible for the Member for the Border Burghs to put his Amendment; and I should like to know how that stands before I give an answer to the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which I am quite ready to substitute for my Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: I have to state that I consider that the Amendment of the Previous Question applies not only to the first but to all the five Resolutions, and in the event of the second Resolution being put, the Amendment having claim to precedence will be the Previous Question. In that case the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Border Burghs will be shut out.

MR. BENTINCK again rose to address the House, whereupon

MR. SPEAKER informed the hon. Member that, having already spoken, he was out of Order.

MR. GORST wished to know if the Orders of the Day were postponed, and if the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to move his first Resolution, whether he would strictly confine his speech to the subject-matter of that Resolution, and whether he would be in Order if he entered upon matters germane only to the third and fourth Resolutions?

MR. SPEAKER said, the right hon. Gentleman would be entitled to offer to the House any arguments relevant to the Motion before the House, and it would only be his (Mr. Speaker's) duty to call the right hon. Gentleman to Order in the event of his addressing it on matters not relevant to the subject before the House.

MR. SULLIVAN said, a new reason had developed itself for opposing the postponement of the Orders of the Day. He desired to know what they were going to do, although there were a great many hon. Gentlemen who had begun to think, after what had passed, that they might as well postpone the debate altogether. The debate ought to have been entered upon with solemnity, and he could not help expressing his own opinion that the moral effect of the debate—whatever it might have been—would be sadly marred by what had occurred. He should be sorry to say a word which might wound the feelings of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House, but he would take the liberty of remarking that they could not but feel a certain amount of mortification at the spectacle they themselves presented. Whoever had advised the move which right hon. Gentlemen on the front Opposition bench were making that evening, it was a move which, in military strategy, was well known to be almost always disastrous—namely, changing front in the face of the enemy. It was very well known that what they were engaged in at that moment—there was no use beating about the bush any further—was simply an endeavour to hold a reconstructive meeting of the Liberal Party on the floor of the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, unknown to the majority of those who had been gallantly prepared to follow him to a division, when he was repudiated by others from whom he might have looked for the heartiest support, had now made terms with those who sat near him on the front Opposition bench. But what of those Members of that House who had heard these these new Resolutions for the first time, as he would call it; what of the men who stood by him during the last week; what of the country that had answered to his call; what of the resolutions which had been passed in many places, declaring the Motions which the right hon. Gentleman had drawn up to be right and true, and declaring that nothing else would satisfy the country? Was all that had been done in that way to be cast aside at a moment's notice by a sudden shifting of the scenery in that House? What of humble men like himself, who had endeavoured to decide what course they ought to take with reference to the Resolutions as they stood on the Paper, and who had been taken into no one's confidence? A mine seemed to have been sprung on him and others that evening, as the result of an arrangement entered into—he almost hesitated to say—more for the purpose of healing up a split in the Liberal Party than of really facing the gigantic political issue before the House. He ventured to say that the condition on which the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone had expressed willingness to withdraw his Motion was a condition distasteful to independent men, and that they had a right to be informed whether the last two Resolutions were to be discussed or not. Speaking, he was sure, for others as well as himself, although with no formal authority, he must say that if these Resolutions were withdrawn, it would be better to have no debate at all, for the debate would be merely about truisms, and would be simply a waste of time. He would end as he began, by expressing his profound regret that at a moment not only of European, but of world-wide anxiety, when something decided, something affirmative, ought to be proposed, and when Resolutions had been taken up after a week had been spent in no end of interviews and end of negotiations, the course to be followed had not been arranged on Saturday or Friday. As it had not been made at that time, he thought they should stand like men to their flag and not change their front in the face of the enemy.

MR. A. MILLS said, that they had now debated this matter for an hour and a-half, and he would be glad if the right hon. Member for Greenwich would answer the question whether he intended to move the third and fourth Resolutions. He understood the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair to say that he would be competent to debate the whole question on the first Resolution. He thought it was not consistent with the dignity of Parliament to turn it into a debating society. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman meant to challenge the policy of the Government?

MR. DILLWYN thought the question should be distinctly and categorically answered, and in order to endeavour to obtain from the right hon. Gentleman the answer which he believed would not be obtained otherwise, he would move that the right hon. Gentleman be not allowed to answer the question which had been put to him.

MR. SPEAKER: The question before the House is, that the Orders of the Day be now postponed until after the Resolutions of the right hon. Member for Greenwich.

MR. DILLWYN: I have moved an Amendment.

MR. SPEAKER: The question is only simply with reference to the postponing of the Orders of the Day. I am bound to inform the hon. Member that he has not moved any Amendment in a form which I can put from the Chair.

MR. DILLWYN: Then I will put myself in Order, by moving that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. HANBURY, in seconding the Motion, said, that hon. Members also wanted to know whether a vote on the first Resolution was to imply any opinion on the third and fourth.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

MR. TREVELYAN, while feeling it to be unpleasant to take part in such a debate, thought it absolutely necessary to say two or three sentences. Things had been said about a "compact" and a "compromise;" but the part he had played in the matter was a part which he believed a very great number of hon. Gentlemen in the House would thoroughly understand. He was one of those who did not agree with the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman. He did not think we ought to coerce the Turk—he did not think we ought to go to war against Turkey in any circumstances whatsoever; but he was one of those who thought it would be an awful national sin in any way to assist Turkey. It was with that feeling, and because he wished a definite issue to be raised, that he had taken the course he had. An hon. Member, amid cheers on the other side, characterized the first and second Resolutions as a truism. He did not think that, to the minds of many hon. Members, the announcement that under no circumstances whatever, we ought to give support to Turkey was at all a truism. He wished that the tone of the speeches of hon. Members would permit him to think so. If these Resolutions were carried, it would be a reversal of the old policy, and, as he believed, the wrong policy of this country. ["Question!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now discussing Resolutions which are not before the House.

MR. TREVELYAN bowed to the decision of the Chair, and wished only to submit, in self-defence, that the first two Resolutions, far from expressing a mere truism, were well worth debating for several nights.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the House was very anxious to know what the right hon. Member for Greenwich meant; and notwithstanding the difficulty in which the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) might be placed by having to make up his mind again for himself, the House, he thought, would act only rationally in listening now to what the right hon. Gentleman had to say as to the course he meant to take.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am afraid I must ask the indulgence of the House in answering this question. I cannot answer it without explaining some matters which I think it absolutely necessary should be explained, in order to enable the House to understand the position in which I am placed. I shall, therefore, say at once all that I have to say which has relation to the form of my Motion. Now, Sir, I heard in the early part of the Session, on a great variety of occasions, not only from the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), but also from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a very great anxiety expressed that hon. Gentlemen in Opposition—and I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman must have alluded, and, indeed, on some occasions he directly referred to me—that hon. Gentlemen in Opposition who had taken a prominent part outside these walls with respect to the Eastern Question should make their proposals inside these walls. They were told that if they had elsewhere recommended a Vote of Censure on the Government, they ought to move such a Vote in this House; or if they had advocated an alteration of policy, they ought to propose the alteration here; and if they did so, Government would willingly and gladly promote a free discussion of their proposals. I might support at great length, by quotations from the speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the statement I have just made; but I would rather rely on his belief that what I have said is an accurate résumé, in substance, of what fell from him on many occasions. Well, Sir, I felt it was impossible for us, without the risk of damage to the public interests—impossible, I would say, for me as an individual and an independent Member of Parliament, without the risk of damage to the public interests and without violating those rules of public duty and service which old Servants of the Crown are especially bound to observe—to raise any questions in either of the suggested forms so long as Her Majesty's Government were engaged in negotiations which were ostensibly carried on in concert with the other Powers of Europe. Therefore, I heartily concurred in the proceeding of my noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition when he postponed for ever so many weeks—I will say so many weary weeks—any discussion upon this question which could involve a change of general policy on the ground of possible detriment to the public interest. When these negotiations had come to a close, we arrived at a period like that which appeared to be described by Lord Clarendon in March, 1854, of drifting into war; that is to say, the active efforts of the Powers were at an end, and, at the same time, war could not be said to have absolutely begun. It then appeared to me that the time had come when I, who had taken an active part in the proceedings out-of-doors, might fairly be challenged by the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, by the Government, or by anybody else, to bring this matter in some way or other under the judgment of the House and to sustain the propositions which I have sustained elsewhere. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire is under an entire mistake when he supposes that in the course of the Recess I have proposed the removal of the Government, or Parliamentary proceedings against the Government. The furthest point to which I went was to declare that it seemed to me necessary in the public interest for the Government to alter its course, to modify and amend the policy which it had adopted. When, after the despatch of Lord Derby in the end of September, after the mission of Lord Salisbury to Constantinople, it appeared to us out-of-doors that some such modification had occurred, then, until the meeting of Parliament, I remained, if I may so say, provisionally contented with what was going on. But it has been plain to me since that new circumstances have arisen—that the position of things is not now as it was when Lord Salisbury went to Constantinople—that new matters have come upon the scene; and therefore I could not conceal from myself that in my own opinion arguments which had been urged in the Autumn for further declarations and further steps on the part of the Government were still valid, and it was still a matter of duty incumbent upon me to bring the question before the House. In consequence I considered with myself in what mode I could best submit these matters to the consideration of the House. My object is not, and never has been, to obtain or ask for a Party advantage against the Government. [Laughter, and "Hear, hear!"] Well, Sir, I understand the class of mind from which a sneer of that description would proceed; but even Gentlemen with that class of mind will recollect that the first time I opened my mouth in this House upon the Eastern Question was strongly and explicitly to commend the Government when their conduct was supposed to be impugned for the course I then believed they had taken with regard to the Andrassy Note, and that for six months after that commendation I remained absolutely silent, unwilling to proceed to cavil or to comment upon the grounds which were before me as to their policy. I cannot pretend to speak as a supporter of the Government who thinks that their conduct in this matter has been laudable or beneficial to the country. My opinion, unfortunately, is the exact reverse; but it was not my object to gain an advantage over the Government any more than to give an advantage to the Government; but my object was, if possible, to do something for the vast interests that are involved in the question. That was my sole object, and it is my sole object now, and for that reason I determined to place my proposal before the House in that form in which it would be most easy for the Government, and most easy for anybody else in this House to say—"We object to parts of your proposal, but there are other parts of your proposal which we do not think objectionable; we will march with you thus far, though we cannot march any further." It appeared to me to be of the utmost importance that there should be, if possible, some union of sentiment upon the subject. I at least wished to do all that was in my power to prevent the question falling into the category of Party questions; and I therefore proposed these Resolutions. They were a whole in my own mind; I could not propose the first without necessarily going to the second, third, and fourth, and to the fifth as a mode of combining them together; but, while I looked upon the entire argument as one, while I believe I am correct in saying that on great subjects such as this it has been the usual method instead of moving an Address on the entire subject-matter, which I could hardly have done in point of form, I put the different parts of the subject in separate Resolutions for the convenience of the House. It appeared that this course was recommended by the most obvious considerations—I do not say of Party advantage or disadvantage. I do not know whether there was the one or the other, but by the most obvious considerations of public policy. I own I had the hope with which I am taunted by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and which he seems to have thought it a sin for me to entertain; and, while he taunts me with that hope, he assumes that the terms of the Resolutions with regard to which I entertained it are worth nothing; yet, at the same time, I intended nothing in the nature of an indictment against the Government in my proceeding. Little does the right hon. Gentleman know of the motives that have governed my mind. Himself an honourable and high-minded man, I am truly sorry he is not ready to give some credit to others for being actuated by motives such as those which would prompt him in similar circumstances. In my Resolutions I divided as carefully as I could the several portions of my subject, and I said to myself—"Surely it is hardly possible that the Government will object to allow this House to express, in terms which I think much more suitable than those which they advised Her Majesty to use, but at the same time in terms analogous in their effect, what the House thinks of the conduct of the Government of Turkey in respect to the despatch of the 21st of September." I then went on, it appeared to me, in logical order and in a practical and consistent manner, in the next step, to the establishment of what I venture to think the ineffaceable guilt of the Ottoman Government with respect to the Bulgarian revolt, and I proposed to ask the House to say that neither the moral nor the material support of England ought to be afforded to the Porte; and I had some hope that the Government might be induced to go so far as to say that in the circumstances it was expedient that this great Christian country should make a declaration to that effect. The right hon. Gentleman says he distinguishes between the operative parts of these Resolutions and the inoperative parts; but, in my own opinion, the first and the second Resolutions are highly inoperative. It is quite true that in my own mind they are introductory to the third and fourth; but it is also true that in my own mind they are in themselves most important, most pregnant propositions, to establish which would relieve the mind of the country if it were the pleasure of Her Majesty's Government and of the House to sustain them. With regard to the third Resolution, I know of no reason why it should not be adopted by Her Majesty's Government. I did not in the third Resolution push to its fullest extent the precise policy I myself recommend; I have taken the phrase "practical self-government," because I found it in the despatch of Lord Salisbury, No. 167, page 216, of the second Blue Book presented in February, and because substantially it appeared to me to comprise all that was requisite. Then I placed the word "exacting" in the fourth Resolution, because, whether we use the word "exacting" or "obtaining," I meant to express the opinion I fully entertain, that the united authority of Europe ought to require from the Porte the adoption of those measures which are necessary for peace and justice. But I could not conceal from myself, even in the framing of these Resolutions, that there are many hon. Gentlemen in this House who might be disposed to entertain the earlier Resolutions who would not be disposed to entertain the later Resolutions; and certainly my hope was and my intention was to obtain the judgment of the House, as far as I asked it at all, in the most favourable form and the most favourable manner I could. I therefore intended—if I may describe my intentions when so much is said with regard to motives—when I gave Notice of the Resolutions, to proceed with them in the full expectation that we were to have what is called a fair stand-up fight. It may be wrong on my part; but I own I cannot express the surprise with which I found that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government, after the invitation they had given to us, and given I may say to me, to make a proposal of our policy—after the manner in which my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney had been compelled, as far as compulsion could be brought to bear, to divide the House against his will, when he had proposed something of a policy upon this subject—I was perfectly astonished when I found on Friday evening last that Her Majesty's Government, by whom we were invited to discuss it, and who, therefore, as I conceive, had promised a free, large, and full discussion, intended to support the Motion for the Previous Question, the effect of which, if carried, was to shut out all Amendment; for of course, if the Previous Question was adopted upon the first Resolution, that would a fortiori imply that the House would not be in the slightest degree disposed to proceed with the other Resolutions. In that state of things I considered with myself what I should do, without communicating with my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) or anybody else; and it appeared to me, undoubtedly, that in all probability my best policy would be to take a division on the first, and to state that although I regarded all the Resolutions as perfectly distinct, yet as I had, in homely phrase, put my best foot foremost, as the first Resolution was most likely to conciliate support, I had in my own mind considered the matter, and certainly I thought, both in point of usage and policy, I should be perfectly justified in refraining from taking the sense of the House upon the other Resolutions. It may be properly pointed out that there is an intermediate course—that I might have asked to have the Resolutions put from the Chair, and might have had them negatived; but I remember the case of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, that upon him it was endeavoured apparently, as far as we were able to judge, to put in force a practice which one of your Predecessors, Sir, declared irregular and un-Parliamentary—namely, that of what is termed forcing a division. I determined not to expose myself to that risk, and I therefore felt I should be perfectly justified, having submitted a proposal, as being in my own mind a whole, in a series of propositions which hon. Members are entitled to separate and treat, if they think fit, as absolutely independent of one another, in concluding that I should not go forward with the other Resolutions. Then, I found to my great satisfaction that if I did not move my later Resolutions my liberty of stating my plan as a whole remained to me, and that if I did not propose those later Resolutions so as to commit others to their support, which I have not the least desire to do, although committed to them myself, I should have the advantage of meeting the views of my noble Friend and others who sit around him. The hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), who generally speaks with ability, good sense, and proper feeling, seems to me to treat the question as if my desire to find myself in union with my noble Friend, my old Colleague, and my present Leader, was a sinful desire.

Mr. Gladstone

I was, however, delighted to find that, partly on the conditions I have described, which are entirely acceptable to me, and partly on the condition of the alteration of the second Resolution, my noble Friend thought it in his power to give a cordial support to these two Resolutions. Sir, I can go a great deal further, and I will say that I am not unable to distinguish between all I should like to have and the amount of support I can get. I say that if it were possible to induce hon. Gentlemen opposite to concur in any kind of Resolutions which would have the effect of clearing up the apparently ambiguous and even dangerous position in which we stand—if that were done in any way they could devise, nothing would give me more pleasure than to meet them. Therefore, desiring to meet them in an amicable frame of mind, and having always in view not the question of benefit to us, or damage to them, but that of advancing these enormous interests which are in some degree placed in our charge, it seemed to me that I could not possibly hesitate to make known to my noble Friend that which was in my own mind, and which I felt would relieve him from every kind of responsibility as to the last three Resolutions, however much I may be attached to them. I hope I have in some degree explained the course I intend to adopt. With regard to the alteration in the second Resolution, I have said I did not think myself justified in moving any alteration whatever, but I should be most ready to assent to the alteration of my hon. Friend. I have no hesitation in going a little further and saying that, though the alteration of my hon. Friend makes the Resolution less complete as a declaration of policy, yet to me, who take what very roughly and popularly speaking may be called the anti-Turkish side, his form of the Resolution is, if possible, more satisfactory to me than my own or any other form. How then could I hesitate, in the circumstances that I have described, as to the course I should adopt? I never heard of any principle, either of prudence or Parliamentary usage, which prescribed that anyone proposing a series of Resolutions on a great subject was bound to have each and all of those Resolutions severally put from the Chair; and having before me the fear of what are called "forced divisions," I must own that it certainly appeared very imprudent on my part to allow myself to be passed through the Candine forks, by leaving it in the power of any hon. Gentleman opposite to throw discredit on them by opposing the withdrawal of the latter Resolutions. I decline altogether to recognize the distinction which has been drawn between the operative and inoperative Resolutions. Logically and morally, as they are connected in my mind, I maintain, the first two Resolutions of themselves embody the most important declarations; and an immense gain would be obtained if it were possible to induce the Government to accede to them. The right hon. Gentleman now represents them as of no value or importance whatever; but if they are as he says, and if they do not contain mischief and poison—why will not the right hon. Gentleman opposite concur with this side of the House in obtaining the united declaration of the House of Commons on this subject. [Loud cheers.] I hear what I believe to be sincere cheers from the other side with the greatest pleasure; and I assure hon. Gentlemen opposite there is no sacrifice I would not make, so far as merely personal feelings and conditions are concerned, in order to obtain that which I desire. I want to relieve my country from what I think a most serious risk of danger, guilt, and dishonour; and in these circumstances I should be the basest of men if I did not endeavour to be guided, in every point that is to be decided, by the consideration in what way I could most effectually take steps towards it. That is the whole case; and so far as I am personally concerned I think I have made a perfectly clean breast of it. The Resolutions, as I have said, are morally and logically one, yet for Parliamentary purposes they are distinct and separate propositions. I felt the concession from me about the second Resolution was one which it was impossible reasonably to decline; at the same time, as stated by my noble Friend, if hon. Gentlemen felt that the alteration I had expressed my willingness to adopt required and entailed the necessity of further consideration, I could not possibly object to that. I think I have answered the questions which have been put to me. Before sitting down I may say—and it is right I should say—that I was so astonished to hear the announcement of the Government to employ the Previous Question on Friday that I did not at the moment see what course I ought to adopt; but, taking a little time to consider, I did come down to the House at a later hour for the purpose of reviving the subject, which appeared quite necessary for me to do. I found, however, that I was prevented doing so by the accident of a count-out, which will happen from time to time, notwithstanding the best arrangements of the Government to keep a House. That alone prevented me from asking for an explanation or saying a word on the subject, and no alternative was left but the course I have now pursued.

MR. PELL said, he regretted that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had not taken the opportunity of the Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate for clearing away much of the doubt and difficulty that surrounded the present position. He did not wish to give any offence; but it appeared to him that some arrangement had been come to between the hon. Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. Now, they knew nothing of that; but he understood the hon. Member for Maidstone to say that he intended to withdraw his Motion if the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw the third and fourth Resolutions. The House had not yet been told whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to do that or whether he intended to argue and to take the sense of the House upon them. He (Mr. Pell) thought such a course of procedure was hardly fair to the hon. Member who had withdrawn his Motion of the Previous Question, that the matter should be left in that state of uncertainty. He would, therefore, ask the hon. Member, whether he intended to support the demand that the right hon. Gentleman should state clearly whether he intended to divide the House upon the third and fourth portions of his Resolutions if the opportunity were afforded him?

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that as the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Pell) had referred to him he would ask the permission of the House to say a few words. In the course he had taken he trusted the House would believe he had acted in deference to the views of many whose advice he could not disregard.

It was, moreover, in his own judgment, that which was most calculated to promote the maintenance of peace and the true interests of the country; although he was sorry to differ from some few of his hon. Friends near him. His course had been perfectly clear. As soon as he heard that the right hon. Gentleman intended to modify the Resolutions in the manner now announced, his (Sir John Lubbock's) objections to them ceased. No doubt a number of meetings had been held throughout the country in support of these Resolutions; but it could not have escaped attention that these Resolutions had been supported at the various meetings on very different grounds, some speakers having thought they meant coercion of Turkey by war, and others that they meant neutrality. Their wording, however, in his opinion, pointed to war. But as the matter now stood, the case was very different. The right hon. Gentleman had accepted a modification of the second Resolution which entirely met their objections, and while advocating the general policy indicated in the third and fourth, he would not propose them formally. But it was one thing to support the general tenour of Resolutions, another thing to ask the House to pass them as formal and binding instructions to Government, irrespective of what circumstances might arise. The hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) had said that the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had accepted in the second Resolution had reduced it to a truism. Well, but then, if that were so, what was it before? If the change had made it a truism, then, before the change, it contained a pledge of assistance under certain conditions. But that would have been entirely in opposition to the policy of neutrality advocated at so many meetings. The alteration in the second Resolution which had been accepted by the right hon. Gentleman had entirely changed the character of that Resolution, and made it one of which, for his own part, he could cordially approve. When he was told that the first two Resolutions meant nothing and were unworthy the attention of the House, he must ask himself—"What about those meetings throughout the country, and the resolutions passed at them?" The two Resolutions

now before the House seemed to him very clear and very important. They expressed in the strongest possible manner the horror which was felt by this country at the atrocities in Bulgaria, they announced what he believed was the almost unanimous wish of the country—namely, to maintain neutrality. They gave the most solemn possible warning to Turkey; and if Her Majesty's Government would only accept them in the spirit in which they were intended, they would give them the greatest possible assistance in their efforts to give peace, justice, and good government to those afflicted Provinces.

MR. MARK STEWART asked the hon. Baronet to explain more clearly what course he intended to pursue, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had not answered the question whether he intended to move the third and fourth Resolutions?

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, it appeared to him that to look at the Resolutions as a general expression of policy was a very different thing from forcing them as binding upon Her Majesty's Government. It was the latter course which to his mind formed the great objection to the Resolutions as they originally stood.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY said, the House had been asked to interfere with the regular course of Public Business in order to discuss distinct Resolutions. An appeal had been made by the hon. Members for Hackney, Birmingham, Louth, Exeter, and various other places to obtain a clear understanding whether the right hon. Gentleman did or did not intend to move the third and fourth Resolutions. He also wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he intended to move them?

MR. MACDONALD desired to express his dissent from the remarks made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone (Sir John Lubbock), who believed that the Resolutions as they now stood would express the feelings of the meetings which had been held throughout the country. He had attended several of those meetings, and he begged leave to say that the Resolutions in their altered form would not express the feelings of the country. Therefore, the hon. Baronet the Member for Maidstone could have no correct knowledge of those feelings.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question again proposed.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD said, that it was due to the House and to the high character of the right hon. Gentleman that he should give a distinct answer to the question whether the third and fourth Resolutions were to be moved or not? To enable the right hon. Gentleman to speak again he begged to move that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Sampson Lloyd.)

LORD ELCHO said, it was only fair to the House and to every Member of it, and he must add to the right hon. Gentleman himself, when he was asked to say "Yes," or "No," as to whether he intended to stand by his third and fourth Resolutions, that the right hon. Gentleman should give an answer to that plain and distinct question.

MR. GLADSTONE: I thought I had answered it before three or four times. My noble Friend is acute enough when he wants to be acute, and I am sorry that I have been unable to convey clearly my intention upon this occasion. I mentioned that I had some days ago, with the Motion for the "Previous Question" on the Paper, made up my mind not to proceed with an attempt to obtain a decision referable to each Resolution for the reasons I have already stated, as being fatal to free discussion; but when I found that by not asking the Speaker to put the third and fourth Resolutions and by accepting an Amendment, to me perfectly acceptable, I should obtain the support of many Gentlemen whose votes were of a value beyond their numerical force, I had no hesitation in making it known that I had no intention of asking you, Sir, to put the Resolutions from the Chair.

MR. R. SMYTH said, he also had a question to put. He wished to ask the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho) whether he would pledge himself to put his Resolution?

MR. GOLDNEY said, he understood that the right hon. Member for Greenwich had determined not to put his third and fourth Resolutions.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Orders of the Day be postponed until after the Notice of Motion relating to the Eastern Question.

MR. GLADSTONE,* in rising to move the first of the Resolutions of which he had given Notice, as follows:—

said: I much regret that I should introduce a subject of the greatest importance after discussions which must necessarily have had, I do not say an irritating, but a dissipating, effect upon the mind and attention of the House. Before approaching it, I must deal with one or two preliminary matters.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald) has spoken of the character of the manifestations which have recently proceeded from the country. I have watched the proceedings and read the declarations and conclusions arrived at steadily and regularly; until to-day, when the number of meetings has entirely overpowered me, for, irrespective of other correspondence, the reports of nearly 100 meetings have reached me since this morning. As a matter of fact, having read all the resolutions passed at the previous meetings, and having even observed that from day to day their tone became warmer and warmer, I am bound to corroborate the statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford. In a very small number of these popular declarations, neutrality was either mentioned or implied. But I must add, again speaking simply to a matter of fact, though I put no particular construction on it, the reception of the Resolutions now before the House has been singularly different among the authorities that guide public opinion in the Metropolis, and those who address it in the country. Some of the greatest pundits of the Metropolis have been puzzled as to what my Resolutions mean; and I am not sure that there is not a similar doubt and obscurity in the minds of Her Majesty's Government. The people of the country, however, do not appear to have experienced any portion of this difficulty. I am able to say of all the resolutions at meetings held throughout the country, that in more than 19 cases out of 20 their general scope has been in correspondence not merely with the first two of my five

[First Night.]

Resolutions, but with the whole. It is only fair to admit that I received an account of an adverse meeting held in the great town of Bradford; but it was the adverse meeting, not of the town of Bradford, but of the Executive Committee of the Conservative Association. I wish to give it its due publicity in order that such weight as it can fairly claim may be given to it. Now, though many of the declarations of opinion have come from Liberal Associations, yet also a large number have come from towns' meetings regularly summoned, and from other public meetings openly convened, largely attended at the very shortest notice, and pervaded by a spirit of enthusiasm equal to that which marked the expression of opinion in September. At one of these towns' meetings—that which was held in Northampton, under the presidency of the Mayor—a gentleman moved a declaration to the effect that it would not be well to interfere with the action of Her Majesty's Government, and not a single person was found to second that motion. There is another town, and that is the town of Christchurch, represented by the hon. Gentleman who is not now in his place (Sir H. Drummond Wolff); he has wisely retired for the refreshment so necessary to us all for renewing the zeal and vigour of the inner man. Well, I am glad to think that the hon. Gentleman who is about to move the Previous Question, if the Notice holds good, is or was entirely at one with me on the substance of this matter. I hold in my hand the report in a Conservative journal of the speech made by him at Christchurch in September, in which he declares positively that the Provinces of Turkey must be liberated; and, as the promises of its Government are worthless, there must be other guarantees. I am glad to see that in the town he represents a public meeting has been recently convened by the Mayor, and a requisition has been made to the hon. Gentleman requesting him to support the Resolutions, the discussion of which he is about to stifle. The hon. Member will tell me if I misrepresent the case.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: The right hon. Gentleman is misrepresenting the case. The persons who requested me to support the Resolutions were chiefly persons outside the borough, imported in waggons.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. GLADSTONE: The authentic organ of opinion in a borough is a public meeting convened by the Mayor, and my statement is not weakened by the census the hon. Gentleman has somewhat rapidly taken of the persons attending it, in a manner not, I think, the most complimentary to his constituents.

I now come, Sir, to the main question. These Resolutions would include, undoubtedly, a vital or material alteration of the declared policy of Her Majesty's Government. But my first object, and one of my main objects, is to clear that position of the Government in a most important respect. One of the points which I must endeavour, therefore, to establish is, that that position is at present ambiguous. Am I right in saying that, if this is so, it is desirable that their position should be cleared? I think I can show that I do not overstate the case. I do not propose to move a Vote of Censure on the Government, simply for this reason—that I do not see what public interest would be promoted by my doing it; but I wish to say in the calmest words—yet they cannot be weak words—that I know no chapter in the history of our foreign politics since the Peace of Vienna so deplorable as that of the last 18 months. I speak of that policy generally. Some steps have been taken, especially the mission of Lord Salisbury to Constantinople, which deserved the approval of this House. But that step was immediately met on the part of the promoters of the Autumn movement by their reposing, at least provisionally, their confidence in the Ambassador, and by their abstaining from every step that could weaken his hands. They had to consider the mission in the light of the Guildhall speech. It was difficult to say how far it was modified by that extraordinary speech; but, notwithstanding, confidence in Lord Salisbury's purpose and views was the principle generally adopted, and upon that mission I have not now one word to say of censure, but only of commendation. But while he was at Constantinople there was also another Representative of England there, whose views upon the most vital questions were in direct opposition to those of Lord Salisbury. This utter difference of opinion, as we now know, was known to the Turkish Government, and it counteracted all along Lord Salisbury's efforts. This, then, is one of the points upon which the position of the Government is ambiguous and requires to be cleared.

Then, again, with regard to the withdrawal of Sir Henry Elliot from Constantinople at the close of the Conference. The conduct of the Porte had at that time deserved some manifestation of that feeling which it was reasonable for Her Majesty's Government to entertain; and all the other Powers had intelligibly shown their displeasure. But so far from displaying such a sentiment, Her Majesty's Government carefully made it known that the departure of Sir Henry Elliot was no sign of displeasure. Why was that done? It brings into question, if not the sincerity of the Government, yet at the very least their firmness and clearness of purpose. Then, again, why was it that Her Majesty's Government, at the time of the Conference, made a communication to the Porte that the views of the Conference would be words, and words alone, and were not to be enforced either by Her Majesty's Government or with its approval? It is a mild description of that proceeding to say that that rendered the policy and the position of Her Majesty's Government an ambiguous policy and position. You might as well have dismissed the Conference altogether. You might as well have done that which you seem given to do, and, at the outset of the proceedings of that European Parliament, have moved the "Previous Question." The Conference was idle; the Conference became a farce from the moment when Turkey had been informed by England that in no circumstances would she either herself enforce, or recognize the enforcement by others of, the decisions at which the Conference might arrive. Why, Sir, what was the position of the case? England was then the sole obstacle to a policy that would have given reality to the decisions that Lord Salisbury had laboured so gallantly to promote. But, like the power behind the Throne in other days, there was somewhere or other a power behind Lord Salisbury which determined that he should not succeed. And, consequently, at a very early date in the proceedings the Porte was informed on this vital matter. Why was the Porte informed of it? Why was the Porte informed of it then? When was Lord Salisbury made aware of it? Did he know it before he left England? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Yes.] Ah! he did? He knew that he was to be allowed to use words, and words alone? Did he know it before he accepted the mission? My question now is whether, when Lord Salisbury left England, and not only when he left England, but when he accepted the mission and allowed himself to be proclaimed Ambassador, he had been made aware by his Colleagues that the words which he might use, and the decisions at which the Conference might arrive, were to be recommendations simply, and were in no circumstances to be imposed upon the Porte? To that I have no answer. I must answer is for myself. But, whether Lord Salisbury was aware of the intention or not, why was that communication made to the Porte before the proceedings of the Conference? Why was that communication made, which drew forth a lively expression of the gratitude of the Grand Vizier and of the Turkish Government, not to the British Government at large, but to Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Derby? Was the same thing done by other Governments? The Austrian Government, on the contrary, knowing perfectly well with whom they had to deal, had declared that when the decisions of the Conference were arrived at they ought to be imposed upon the Porte by a naval demonstration; and, unless I am much mistaken, it was well known to the Government of Her Majesty that in the opinion of the Government of France the Conference was an idle form if the Porte was to be apprised that force was not to be used with respect to the recommendations of Europe. Therefore, we find Her Majesty's Government, by their unhappy act, playing the evil genius of Europe, and at the most critical moment taking the very step that was certain, in the opinion of the best and most experienced judges, to nullify and frustrate utterly the labours they were ostensibly undertaking. It is a mild description to say that this rendered the position of the Government an ambiguous position.

I am bound to say I think the mission of Mr. Layard has, in its outward aspect, the same effect. I carefully abstain from pronouncing a final judgment upon it. I do not desire to make it a subject of censure. I have known Mr. Layard in two capacities. I have known Mr. Layard when I last held Office under the Crown. I then knew him as the able and zealous Representative of this country at Madrid, discharging his duties in a manner that gave to the late Ministry the most perfect satisfaction. But I cannot altogether set aside my recollections of Mr. Layard in this House, when he was by far the most effective, and by far the furthest-going advocate of the Government of Turkey whom I have ever known to sit on these benches. Consequently, as we find in the Blue Book which was presented to us on Saturday, the appointment of Mr. Layard was again selected as a special subject of thanks by the Turkish Government, and it was acknowledged in a peculiar and very appropriate phrase to be on the part of the Government of Her Majesty, inasmuch as they knew his friendly sentiments towards Turkey, a "delicate attention." A "delicate attention" to that Government which has made itself responsible in full from first to last for the massacres of Bulgaria, and whose fixed intention it is that on the first similar occasion similar massacres should be again perpetrated. "Delicate attentions" to that Government from the Government of Her Majesty are matters which, if not wrong in themselves, at least require some elucidation to show that their position with regard to the crimes of that Government is not an ambiguous position.

Again, Sir, it will be remembered that a despatch was produced to us in the month of May last year, in which it was stated that Her Majesty's Government felt that Turkey was only to depend upon their moral support. Now my second Resolution, which is regarded by the Secretary for War as of so neutral and inoperative a character, carefully states that Turkey has lost all claim to either the material or the moral support of Great Britain. The lines between material and moral support are not always easily drawn. What kind of support did Her Majesty's Government give to Turkey last year when, having sent a squadron to Besika Bay to protect Christian life, they afterwards converted that squadron into a powerful fleet for some other unacknowledged purpose? What kind of support, I say, was the support then given to Turkey? Her Majesty's Government, as far as my knowledge goes, have never disclaimed this ill-omened phrase "moral support." I do not want to pin them to it—God forbid! I wish with all my soul that they may disclaim it; but I wish also to point out that, as far as I know, it has not yet been disclaimed.

What may not be done under the name of "moral support?" Why, almost as much as may be done under the name of "British interests." We sent that fleet to Besika Bay, or, at least, we made that squadron into a fleet when it was in Besika Bay; and what was the effect of the presence of that fleet? I say, without the least hesitation, it was to overawe the Provinces of Turkey bordering on the Archipelago and the Kingdom of free Greece, and to prevent any movement which might have been made in sympathy with the Slav Provinces. And, therefore, although without lifting a hand, it was material as well as moral support that was supplied to Turkey under the name of moral support, for it prevented from pouring into the field those who would have added to the force of Turkey's rebellious subjects.

I venture to say there is a greater ambiguity still, and a more prolific source of it, than those to which I have already referred; it is to be found in the conflicting declarations of the Members of Her Majesty's Government. Having recognized the mission of Lord Salisbury as a kind of point of junction at which we, who had taken part in the popular movement, were able to bring ourselves into a sort of union with Her Majesty's Government, I will go back to nothing in the conduct of the Government which preceded that mission, and thereby I shall get rid of a great deal of awkward matter spoken at Aylesbury and elsewhere. I will not draw a comparison between those speeches, and other speeches which gave some public satisfaction, and tended greatly to arrest the movement which was in progress in the country. I take only what has happened in England since the despatch of September 21 to the Conference at Constantinople. I am bound to say I cannot do otherwise than recognize the most distinct retrogression in the policy of Her Majesty's Government since the closing of the Conference. I also find contradictions which I at least am wholly unable to reconcile in the declarations of the Government. I take first one declaration, which I think ought to be borne in mind, though I do not dwell upon it, because I do not wish to make it a matter of controversy. There was a declaration by Sir Henry Elliot that it did not signify, so far as the main question was concerned, what number of Bulgarians were massacred, because the thing essential for us to do was to maintain our vital interests in the Ottoman Empire. Lord Derby very properly rebuked and repudiated that declaration in his despatch of the 21st of September; where, after describing the outrages which had occurred, and the countenance given to them, he said that no interests whatever could possibly justify acquiescence in the continuance of such a system. That was a sharp antagonism between Minister and Ambassador. But I want to know which of these two conflicting authorities is to come uppermost in the long run. No doubt the authority of Lord Derby is the greater. I am certain that what he wrote he wrote with sincerity. But if I am to look at the tone and tenor of the declarations of the Government for the last two or three months, I am sorry to say that they seem to me to be relapsing into a position in which the outrages inflicted by the Government of Turkey are to be contemplated as matters of sentimental regret, and for idle and verbal expostulations; but in which action is to be determined by whatever we may choose to think to be British interests. That is to say, that our opinion of what we think best for ourselves is, after all, to be, in substance, our measure of right and wrong all over the world. I want to know whether that contradiction subsists, or whether we still have to learn that there is to be no toleration for iniquity, and that no continuance of material or of moral support is to be given to a Government which is so deeply dyed with the guilt of these outrages.

Next I come to a declaration of Lord Carnarvon. There is not a single utterance which has proceeded from the mouth of any Member of Her Majesty's Government that served the purposes of the Government better at the time than this manly speech of Lord Carnarvon. What did he say? I will not quote him at length, but he said—

"He did not disagree, if he rightly understood it, with the public feeling and opinion, because it had been somewhat loudly expressed, and because here and there there might have been some exaggerations. He thought, on the contrary, it was a credit to the country. He rejoiced that there was neither delay nor hesitation in the expression of that feeling, and, so far from weakening the hands of the Government, he believed that, if rightly understood at home and abroad, nothing could more strengthen the hands of his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary than the burst of indignation which had just gone through the length and breadth of the land."

That was the declaration of Lord Carnarvon. No contradiction to it was given by any Member of the Government at the time. But what has been done lately? The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in a place which I need not name—his words, wherever they may be spoken, are too important not to excite attention—described the sentiment of the British people, manifested last Autumn, as a "got-up" sentiment—we know what is contained in these words—and expressed it to be his opinion that the effect of it had been mischievous. He thus spoke in direct contradiction of that declaration of Lord Carnarvon; for which, when I just now read it, I was sorry to observe there was not, from the other side of the House, a solitary cheer. On the first night of the Session, when this retrogression of which I complain had hardly begun to develop itself, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made a declaration on the subject of the Turkish Constitution, which I heard with the greatest pleasure, but for which he was, I think, severely rebuked by some of the organs of the Turkish Government in the London Press. He earned the rebuke by speaking, as he did speak, the language of good sense about the Turkish Constitution, which he described as a thing in which no sensible man could place the slightest reliance. In doing that he did not go beyond, but remained completely within, the shadow of that most masterly Paper in which Lord Salisbury—as may be seen from the Blue Book—had torn the Turkish Constitution into rags, and held it up to the contempt and derision of mankind. It is, indeed, a device—first and foremost, to delude Western Europe by a show of freedom, and, secondly, to organize, and thereby strengthen the oppressive force which bears down the subject-races.

[First Night.]

But is that the tone now? Read the despatch of Lord Derby to Prince Gortchakoff, which we have received to-day. All is changed. You will find that there Her Majesty's Government says plainly that Turkey should be allowed time to reform herself, and that it is not reasonable to abandon the hope of complete and satisfactory relief to the subjects of the Porte, inasmuch as Turkey has promised that reform. But I will quote one more, as it appears to me, a clear and distinct contradiction. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer told us on a former and not very late occasion that it was a very great hardship to Turkey that she should be complained of for not reforming herself when a war cloud was hanging over her. He said it was a time when it was almost impossible to apply moral pressure to her; and he went on to explain that, in his view, the presence of a Russian army on her frontier made her position one of great difficulty, by appealing to those principles of honour which are supposed to be so highly refined and polished in the Turkish mind. My right hon. Friend distinctly pointed to the Russian armaments as having been an obstacle in the way of the Conference at Constantinople, and as having cut off the hopes of its success; but in saying that he is in direct and diametrical contradiction to Lord Salisbury. Lord Salisbury has publicly declared, and his words cannot be subjected to question, that the Russian armament, on the contrary, constituted the hope of the Conference. I will not trouble the House with lengthened quotations; but Lord Salisbury in substance said that he knew very well that mere words were useless; nay, worse than useless, because delusive, and that it was to the Russian armaments, and the consequent danger to Turkey, and the power of pointing out that danger before her eyes, that the Representatives of the other Powers at the Conference attached their whole hope of inducing Turkey to acquiesce in their conclusions. Even with that advantage, acquiesce she would not. Thus, again, we have important Members of the Government making statements which entirely contradict one another on vital points of the case. And now, this very day, we have the despatch to Prince Gortchakoff, justly hailed with delight by the so-called friends of Turkey. I am not surprised at it, for there is no mistaking the tone of that despatch. In its tone and its tendency it is redolent all through of moral support, it is charged with moral support, and, unless the Government thinks fit to give us some explanation of it which will relieve our minds, we challenge them in this House to-night to have it declared authoritatively whether Turkey has, or has not, lost all claim to our moral as well as our material support.

The House will well recollect the whole line of argument which was pursued by the Government both for some time before and also during the sittings of the Conference. It had become as clear as possible that Turkey had at all times been a country fertile beyond any other in promises. No man knew that better than the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, when he aptly compared her promises to inconvertible paper, and said that we must have sterling metal. Necessary guarantees, something beyond mere promises, adequate securities, consisting in something beyond and above the engagements or ostensible proceedings of the Turkish Government constituted indeed the pith of the extracts which were read by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the first night of the Session from the Instructions to Lord Salisbury. Well, what has now become of those necessary guarantees? They are all gone to the winds. We are told in the despatch published this morning that we are to found our hopes on the fact that the Porte has promised certain things, and that as it has promised we cannot be sure that it will not perform. This is the vital point; it lies at the root of the whole matter. We are now told to rely on those promises. But, for my own part, I would repeat what I said on a former occasion, when we were trying remonstrance after remonstrance, and protestation after protestation. Those protestations, and those remonstrances, and those representations which have been lavished in such redundancy on the Porte by Her Majesty's Government, are all very well up to a certain point; up to the point at which there remains some semblance of a reasonable hope that they may possibly attain their end. But it is not so, when we have found by long and wide experience that they produce no substantial result whatever. It was not thus always; for in the time of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, a man of masterly ability, of iron will, and of a character which did not admit of his being trifled with, something was done in a few points by the Porte, and some improvements, on certain points, were effected in the condition of its people. But during all these later years, the case has not stood so well. With regard to remonstrances made in the time of the late Government, they were not very numerous, for no great crisis occurred in Turkey, and the matters reported were, I believe, comparatively rare. Recently the case has been different. With regard to those remonstrances, which, since the rebellion in her Provinces, have become much more numerous, our experience has been so unbroken and unvarying that the man who persists in a system of mere remonstrances and mere expostulations, really seems to convict himself, either of insincerity, which is not for a moment to be imputed here, or of a total incapacity to understand the affairs with which he has to deal.

I have spoken, then, of contrariety in the declarations of Members of the Government, and of the extremely ambiguous position in which it stands with respect to this question. I think we are entitled to ask that all this ambiguity may be cleared away, and that we may be permitted to know whether after all that has happened we are still to rely on Turkish propositions, and still to afford to the Sultan a moral support. Going outside the Government, I now come to the language of its adherents in the Press and in the country. There never has been a time when I have heard so much of direct communications between the Government and the Metropolitan Press as within the last 18 months; and my belief is that at no time has it been so constant and unfailing. What the tone of the prints is which are supposed to enjoy the privilege of these communications, every one who hears me is aware. I do not hesitate to say that the language which is held among the supporters of the Government in the society of London, and by that portion of the Press which has taken what I may call the Turkish side of this matter—I say which is called the Turkish side, because I believe those of whom I am speaking, and who suppose that they are acting a friendly part towards Turkey, are all the time driving her on to utter ruin—is language, the purpose of which, distinct and unconcealed, is to prepare the public mind for war. And for what war? Not for war under the name of war on the side of Turkey, but for a war to be undertaken under some shadowy pretext of a British interest. Now, what are British interests? and for what purpose is that phrase brought into incessant use? The phrase itself is the most elastic in the world. Consider the position of this Empire. Consider how from this little Island we have stretched out our arms into every portion of the world. Consider how we have conquered, planted, annexed, and appropriated at all the points of the compass, so that at few points on the surface of the earth is there not some region or some spot of British dominion near at hand. Nor even from these few points are we absent. Consider how our commerce finds its way into every port which a ship can enter. And then I ask you what quarrel can ever arise between any two countries, or what war, in which you may not, if you be so minded, set up British interests as a ground of interference. That is the case of India in particular. We go to the other end of the world as a company of merchants; we develop the arts and arms of conquerors; we rule over a vast space of territory containing 200,000,000 people, and what do we say next? We lay a virtual claim to a veto upon all the political arrangements of all the countries and seas which can possibly constitute any one of the routes between England and the East, between two extremities, or nearly such, of the world. We say to one State—You must do nothing in the Black Sea at Batoum, because Batoum and Erzeroum may one day become a route to the East. We say—You must do nothing in Syria or Bagdad, because we may finally discover the Valley of the Euphrates to be the best route to the East. The Suez Canal was made for the benefit of the world; but it is thought by some of these pretenders that we, who almost furiously opposed the digging of it, have rights there which are quite distinct in kind from those of the rest of the world, and that we are entitled to assert our mastery without regard to the interests of other portions of mankind. Then there is the route by the Cape of Good Hope. It happens, however, that at the Cape no one annexes but ourselves. Nay, it appears from news no older than to-day, that we are so stinted in our possessions that it is expedient to make large additions to our territory there; and to make them exactly by those menaces of force which Ministers think so intolerable in the case of Turkey. And then you know, Mr. Speaker, that any additions to our territory are always perfectly innocent. Sometimes they may be made not without bloodshed; sometimes they are made not without a threat of bloodshed. But that is not our fault; it is only due to the stupidity of those people who cannot perceive the wisdom of coming under our sceptre. We are endowed with a superiority of character, a noble unselfishness, an inflexible integrity which the other nations of the world are too slow to recognize; and they are stupid enough to think that we—superior beings that we are—are to be bound by the same vulgar rules that might be justly applicable to the ordinary sons of Adam. Now I do not hesitate to say that, in the particular case of the Eastern Question, nothing is wanted but right conduct on the part of the Government to give the greatest dignity, as well as the greatest security, to the position of this country. We have improperly allowed the vindication of the great cause in the East to pass into the hands of a single Power. It is true that, by the mouth of Lord Derby, the nation has been made to speak that which by its own mouth it does not, and would not, speak at all. He has rebuked a single Power, and has cast upon that single Power the responsibility of consequences, because it has made itself the organ of the collective will, the united judgment, and the solemn conclusions of Europe. That is the course which we have taken, and that is a dangerous course. We ought to view with regret and misgiving anything that puts a single Power in a position to take such a charge upon herself, and most of all in the case of a Power like Russia, which, as a neighbouring Power, has special temptations in matters of this kind. Such a Power as Russia, and, I must add, such a Power as Austria, has of necessity special temptations in this case; and it can never be satisfactory to me to see the subject settled either by Russia, or by Austria, or by Russia with Austria. But the question remains—How are these terrible evils, which afflict Turkey and disgrace Europe, to be met? Are they to be met by remonstrances and expostulations only? The answer echoed back from the Ministerial benches is—"By remonstrances and expostulations only." Now that, I believe, human nature, the conscience of mankind, and the civilization of the nineteenth century, will no longer bear. If you are not prepared to carry further that united action of Europe in which you seemed to engage, but which you defeated by your ill-judged proceedings, you must expect to see it pass into the hands of others, and your remonstrances and your cavils at others will not be appreciated by the general sentiment of the world until you are able to show that you are yourselves ready to enter into some honourable combination for the purpose of applying an effectual remedy to the evil.

Now, Sir, I pass from this general argument to the first Resolution, and to Lord Derby's despatch. That despatch involved one of two things. It was either a declaration that ought to have been followed up, or else it was a gross and unwarrantable insult to Turkey. There is no escape from the dilemma. You have no right to go about flinging those violent words in the face of any Power, unless that Power has made itself a criminal before Europe; and if that Power is to have your moral support, you have certainly no right to use such language. You were bound either to tear that despatch into shreds, or to go further in your own vindication. The language of that despatch was as strong as the language used at any of the meetings held last Autumn. In substance, it demanded reparation for the past and security for the future. I have read carefully to-day Mr. Baring's Report on the Bulgarian massacres. Remember it is now 12 months since those Bulgarian massacres occurred. What has been the position of the Turkish Government in relation to this question? Those massacres occurred in May, but it was three months afterwards before the first intimation reached the other Governments. What had the Turkish Government done during those three months? They had simply been engaged in wholesale imprisonment of Bulgarians in foul and loathsome dens, in bringing them to trial, and in directing scores of executions. That was the view of the Turkish Government with regard to the massacres; and they have not, even at this date, attained to a right conception of the ideas of Europe upon these most guilty transactions, and upon their own complicity in them. Lord Derby demanded that the authors of the massacres should be punished; and this, and the demand for reparation, were the main points of the despatch. We are now in the month of May. Let us see what has been done. Mr. Baring tells us that very great progress has been made in rebuilding the villages—with the forced labour of the people themselves—that many of the women and girls have been returned, and that a few of the cattle have been recovered. These are the substantive results of the despatch. These things have, however, nothing to do with the policy of the massacres, nor do they touch in the slightest degree our principal demands. But what has happened as to the punishment of the offenders and the reward of well-doers? I must go, however briefly, over these particulars of the conduct of the Turkish Government, because it forms the ground for the first two Resolutions which I ask the House to adopt. The despatch of Lord Derby has been, in the main points, treated with contempt. I do not discuss the prudence of that despatch—I hold it to be, in various points, far from prudent—but has the conduct of the guilty persons been approved and rewarded by the Turkish Government, or have they been marked out for condign punishment, as Lord Derby, speaking for the Queen, demanded? Shefiket Pasha, Toussoon Pasha, and Ahmet Aga have not been executed. One of them was not tried; one tried and acquitted; one tried and condemned, but his sentence was not executed. It is an absolute mockery to which we have submitted. I believe I may say that not one considerable man has had any sentence whatever executed against him. One or two nameless and insignificant individuals have been put to death, whether on account of these massacres does not very clearly appear; but the chief agents have escaped with perfect impunity, and decorations and rewards have been given to many of them. And, finally, of those good Mohamedans, who at the hazard of their lives interfered in the interests of humanity and justice, every one has been either punished by dismissal, or else remains to this hour unrewarded.

In the first place, there is everything short of absolute proof that these massacres were originally designed? If they were not, why were the Bashi Bazouks employed for their suppression? Yet I do not mean to imply that the employment of the Regulars would have afforded a security against outrage. On the contrary, they committed on many occasions gross cruelty and outrage. Yet they were, on the whole, far behind the incredible fury and wickedness of the Bashi Bazouks. Again, why were the Mussulman population armed? There is no sufficient answer. There was war. Yes, but the war did not occur for two months after. There was a rebellion in the small province of Herzegovina. But there were Turkish troops there to deal with the rebellion. It was a wanton and wilful act on the part of Turkey to arm those irregular troops. The extraordinary excuse you find in some passages of those Blue Books is, that there were Russian agents who suggested it to the Turks in order to cause the massacres that ensued. There is no proof, I know, of such a suggestion: still such is the allegation. But even if that were the case, does that diminish the guilt of the Turk? Not by a single hair's-breadth. I admit that the question is wrapped in mystery, and that we can only judge of facts: but this we know—that after the massacres, and when the Turkish Government was well informed of them, they proceeded not to punish the perpetrators, but to imprison and hang more Bulgarians; and that when a stir began to be made in Europe, illusory inquiries were set on foot, and that from these inquiries there proceeded reports which it is idle to describe except in plain words as lying reports. They are described as lying reports by the Consul of the United States; and in language exactly equivalent, though rather more civil, by Mr. Baring and Sir Henry Elliot, as, I think, utterly untrustworthy reports. When the stir was made in this country and elsewhere, which Lord Derby says was got up, and did so much mischief, he wrote the despatch to which I have referred, and he now deplores the agitation which led him to write it. Well, what was done? A Commission was appointed with much solemn form; but care was taken to pack that Commission, partly at the time and partly later on, with men considered safe. So, that while one or two good men were members of it, they should be always in a minority. The result is that, instead of affording redress, it has added infinitely to the disgrace of Turkey: by its delays, by violence, by obstruction, by intimidation, by what it has done, and by what it has not done; finally, by those acquittals which caused at last Mr. Baring's indignant withdrawal from a scene where he did not wish or could not bear longer to witness a prostitution of justice. Well, we know what has been done as to Shefket Pasha and the rest. Why is it that the offenders named in the Papers laid before us remain unpunished? It is because these miscreants possessed instructions to act as they did from persons still higher in the Ottoman Government. These persons in high places, it is now too plain, directed these outrages, for which a show was made in some instances of trying the perpetrators, and in other instances apologies were made for failure to apprehend them. Every portion of the conduct of Turkey in regard to these massacres possesses a dramatic unity and integrity. I make bold, without asking the House to hear the repetition of the numerous details, to say that I have myself demonstrated it, in a tract now before the world, and founded on the highest evidence. Follow it out. Examine it carefully. Everything comes home to the door of the Porte itself. Even if Shefket Pasha had been punished, why should the tool only be punished, and not also the hand that used it? And yet not only is not that the case, but we find Abdul Kerim, the man who gave him the instruction, appointed to the highest command of the Turkish Army now massed on the Danube. It seems almost idle to argue in the face of the evidence we have in reference to these cases; and the Blue Book just placed in our hands has added new horrors to those with which we were before but too abundantly supplied. It will be remembered that, as a refinement of wickedness unknown anywhere else in the world, Consul Schuyler charged upon Selim Effendi, who was employed in these inquiries, that he tortured prisoners in prison to compel them to give evidence of such a kind as suited his purpose. Selim Effendi addressed a letter to me, as I had referred to the charge, and said that it was very hard upon him to be made the subject of such an accusation, that all the proceedings in the Court were perfectly open, and that nothing of the kind could have, or had occurred. But the charge was not as to what had occurred in the Court; it related to what had occurred secretly in prison. He answered the charge which was not made, and passed by the charge that was made. In reply to his letter, which was perfectly becoming and courteous, I addressed a letter to him, and pointed out this fact; adding that he would doubtless answer the charge, which rested on the authority of Mr. Schuyler. Well, that was four months ago, and not another word have I heard from or of him.

We have, Sir, other cases of a most loathsome and revolting kind in the Blue Book that has been recently placed before us, as to which an English Vice Consul says, at page 46 of the Blue Book circulated May 5, that the evidence left him absolutely no room to doubt; and of these he gives the most painful and horrible details. I will not dwell upon them, but, as the volume is in the hands of Members, will spare them the pain. Suffice it to say that they were systematically carried on by Suleiman Aga. When the facts were made known, how was he punished? He was deprived of his sword for three days; and was then consoled by being retained in his office of Chief of Police, which he holds to this day. The Vice Consul gives an account which shows that these tortures were inflicted on the people, and especially on the priests, to make them give particular evidence.

Suffice it, Sir, on the whole, to say that the evidence, of which I have here given but a few points, when taken together, is conclusive. The outrages and massacres in Bulgaria were not the acts of the Bashi Bazouks, or the Regulars, or of the Mussulman population, except as mere instruments of the Porte. As instruments they are guilty, and as instruments alone. These massacres were not accident, they were not caprice, they were not passion. They were system, they were method, they were policy, they were principle. They were the things done in Damascus in 1860; and I may say that the Liberal Government of that day took up those massacres in a very different manner from that in which Her Majesty's Government has proceeded; so that, under the pressure then exerted by the European Powers, the Porte was compelled to hang a Pasha. Like deeds were done also during the Greek Revolution; and again and again they will be done, until the Turkish Government finds that there is some adequate authority determined to say they shall not be done again.

If these things cannot be denied—and I know they cannot be denied—are we to continue this miserable farce—for so I must call it, since this it appears to have become—of expostulation? You do not expostulate with malefactors in your own country—you punish them. The Home Secretary would consider it a senseless proceeding to expostulate with a murderer, and ask him not to commit such a crime again; or even to protest against his committing it. But with respect to Turkey, we know exactly the process, and how it is managed from beginning to end. When there occurs some crime or outrage, if there are not foreign agents near, no notice is taken of it, provided a Mohamedan be the guilty party. If it be a Christian, it is a very different matter. For example, you will find in these Papers an account of a Turkish boy who seriously wounded a Christian woman. She was pregnant, and she was seemingly about to die; but the report of the Consul is that unfortunately there was no law in the country by which the Turkish boy, being only a boy, could be punished. Would that apply to a Christian boy? In Miss Mackenzie's and Miss Irby's most sensible and dispassionate work, you will find an account of a struggle between a Turkish boy and a Christian boy. They fought desperately. The Christian boy fought in self-defence. They were both so much injured that they kept their beds for several weeks. The Turkish boy died, and what happened? There was plenty of law to be found then. The Christian boy was condemned to be hanged; and the Grand Vizier, who was travelling through the Province, delayed his departure in order to see him executed; and thus he gives the Christians a solemn warning of the consequences that would follow their resisting injury. One and the same lesson runs through all these transactions. "You rayahs are allowed not to enjoy life, but to live.

Your tribute is the condition of your life. You must take your life on the conditions we name; and if you raise your hand—it may be to secure justice by force—you will be the subject of crimes and outrages which, whatever their nature may be, will become virtue and public service when committed for the sake of maintaining Ottoman dominion over the unbeliever whom he has a right to rule." What I have said may sound like exaggeration. It is no such thing. It is, I maintain, a plain matter-of-fact description of the way in which Turkish power has been maintained. Nay, more; it is the way in which alone this unnatural domination can be maintained, with ever-increasing difficulty, and upon occasion with ever-increasing horror, until the day of its doom shall come.

I pointed out last year that in the Autumn of 1875 a body of Herzegovinian refugees had been invited to go back to their homes. In an evil hour they accepted the invitation, and returned, escorted, as they had taken unusual precautions, by a force of Turkish Regular troops; but they were massacred by some of the Beys, their Mussulman landlords. In was done in the sight of the escort; and the escort raised not a finger in their defence. This was at a time when the Turkish Government and Mr. Consul Holmes were inviting the refugees to return home. The facts were made known to Lord Derby; he addressed to the proper authorities an indignant despatch, demanding that there should be an inquiry, followed by punishment of the offenders and redress to the injured persons. No further notice has, however, been taken of the matter. His despatch remains like water poured out upon the sand. There was probably a promise of inquiry; this is one of the usual shifts; and I may state, on the authority of Mr. Baring's last Report, that this is the uniform course pursued by the Turkish authorities.

What I want to know therefore is, whether we are to continue to make ourselves ridiculous, and at the same time utterly to delude the world by what the Government is pleased to call remonstrating upon these subjects. This matter grows worse and worse. We have in the Papers which were delivered to us two days back a new crop of horrors reported from Erzeroum, as having occurred no longer ago than on the 14th of March. A body of troops went into a village and demanded food and money. Their demands were, of course, complied with. They then proceeded to maltreat the men, and to violate the woman and girls, several of whom died in consequence of the treatment to which they were subjected. On this occasion again an energetic telegram was despatched in the first instance. Afterwards Lord Derby spoke with bated breath, and desired that the attention of the Porte "might be called" to the matter. It mattered not a straw whether his language were strong or weak. It is the old story. As on the previous occasion, nothing came of his demand. My contention is that this conduct is not compatible with the decency of the case or with the honour of England; and that if no result is to follow upon communications of the kind to which I allude they ought not to be made. It is bad enough to say that you will take no notice of crimes such as those; but it is worse to notice them in a way which you know full well can produce no result, yet which deludes this country and the world by seeming to promise one, and by making a vain show of interest in the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte.

Passing to the second of my Resolutions, let me refer to the daring assertion which has been made by the opponents of the subject-races, that the outrages have ceased. We have had no Papers given us for three months; and the Papers, which were circulated so lately as the day before yesterday, supply us with no recent intelligence upon the subject. I take, however, such rather stale intelligence as they do give. The only evidence which the Government has afforded to us on the point shows that up to the 20th of February last the same atrocious and horrible state of things, concerning which complaints had been previously made, continued in Bulgaria. In those Papers Mr. Baring states that the lives and property of Christians were scarcely safer at the end of February, than they were in May of last year. I ask the House, then, to support the Resolution which alleges that the Porte has lost all claim to our moral as well as our material support.

Shall I be told, that we have withdrawn from Turkey our moral as well as our material support? This is a point at present very doubtful, which ought to be made clear. It is true that we have denounced the perpetrators of these outrages. I say we have denounced the wrong people. These perpetrators were only tools. That there were tools only, is demonstrated by the fact that they remain unpunished, free, rewarded, decorated. Why is this? Because they acted in obedience to orders—written orders in some cases—and from the highest authorities. I have spoken of Abdul Kerim; but unless other high personages are very much calumniated, they too are implicated in the guilt of these proceedings. Assuredly, no name is more odious than the name of Midhat Pasha to the Christians of Bulgaria. There is in Turkey an admittedly intolerable Government. Has it improved during the last quarter of a century? I am responsible for one, for having then believed, on the great authority of Lord Palmerston, and on the even higher authority of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, with his large experience of the Porte, that its Government might be improved. Some men, with deeper insight than that possessed at the time by any politician, knew that the case was hopeless. A quarter of a century ago, however, we thought that we ought not to despair of the improvement of Turkey, as long as a ray of hope remained. Since then a time surely sufficient for trial has elapsed, during which perfect peace has been secured for Turkey from without, and she has had no evils or mischiefs to deal with, except those provoked and promoted by her own gross and monstrous misgovernment. But have things improved in Turkey in that period? I believe that, upon the whole, instead of improving, they have become worse. I do not, of course, question the local improvements, which have been the result of an increase in the number of Consuls and Foreign Agents; because wherever a Consul or a Foreign Agent resides there is usually a little precinct formed, within which comparative security is enjoyed. Nor do I doubt that here and there some partial, indecisive measures have been adopted for the purpose of putting into execution a portion of the promises of the Porte. But since 1854 there has been in Turkey a great increase in the centralization of the Ottoman system, and in the taxation; and a multiplication of the agents of the Government in the persons of those whom it is a mockery to call police. The result has been that there has been an aggravation of Mohamedan as well as Christian grievances; and there is far more discontent among the Mussulman inhabitants of Turkey now, than existed a quarter of a century ago. Mr. Baring, in referring to the Turkish police, states that they are little or no better than organized bands of brigands. But this Force, which is one of the greatest curses of the country, is a Force which does not belong to the older Ottoman system. Again, of late, Turkey has acquired a passion for a National Debt, for large standing armies, for iron-clad fleets, and for improved arms; and the result has been that a great increase of revenue was necessary. It has been raised in a disproportionate degree from the Christian Slav Provinces, and it is this endeavour to obtain an enormous revenue which has been one of the greatest curses of the country. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman cheers that statement. But what remedy is he prepared to propose for this state of things? Why, he is prepared to look on and to expostulate. I say that it is better, it is more honest, not to look on, and to withhold this expostulation, rather than to profess our interest and to pursue a method such as the one now in use. And here I may, perhaps, be allowed to offer a suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman. Why should he not prepare printed forms of expostulation? There might be blanks for the number of villages burnt, for the number of men killed, and for the number of women violated; and there ought to be another blank to be filled up as occasion required by the word "expostulate," or "represent," or "regret," or, if necessary, "protest." This would save a considerable amount of labour at the Foreign Office, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the sovereign guardian of the public purse, might really, by the simple means that I suggest, effect some reduction in the cost of that establishment. This is a sorry subject on which to jest. But it is the Government who have made a sorry jest of a matter in itself very solemn. It is a sorry jest constantly to reiterate expostulations of this character with the knowledge founded on long experience, that as a general rule they will work without being followed by any result. The Porte, which well understands the force of words, knows that our expostulations begin in words and that they end in words; and it is time that the people of England and the people of Turkish Christian Provinces should begin to understand as much.

It appears to me that if Her Majesty's Government desired really to pursue an effective policy, they should have gone further than I have yet indicated; but they would have done a great deal if they had gone as far as I have hitherto suggested. They would have conveyed an amount of confidence to the minds of the people of this country which they are now very far from feeling.

But, Sir, in my opinion, a just denunciation of outrages which former events had placed within our cognizance, and a real, not an equivocal withdrawal of support from Turkey, though they are more than we can yet be sure of having obtained, are very far from filling up the measure of our duties and our honourable obligations. I argue that we ought to use our influence in the great Council of Europe for the effectual deliverance of these Provinces from oppression, but not for their transfer to any foreign dominion. Now, it is a foreign agency, not under our control, to which we have chosen to make over the fulfilment of engagements which are ours. I must, therefore, consider our relation to that foreign Power. We need entertain no fear at all that the action of Russia in the present effort will endanger British interests. Russia is not mad enough to touch British interests in the execution of the purpose she has in hand. We have, however, given Russia a magnificent opportunity, of which she can avail herself, to plead truly that what she asks is what Europe asks; and the difference between her and other nations is that they are content to put up with, and she is not content to put up with, Turkey's infatuated refusal to give securities for the improvement of her Government. You may say that she is pursuing selfish objects; but, if that be true, that is an additional condemnation of your policy, because if she was untrustworthy, why did you leave her to act alone and unrestrained in accomplishing this work? I had hoped that Her Majesty's Government might even have been disposed to have accompanied me thus far, and that we might all look forward to the establishment in these Provinces of local self-government and local liberty, and so saving them from transfer to any other foreign dominion. In this, as in other hopes, I am baffled; and instead of a wise co-operation in the endeavour to effect a great good, I am called upon to consider the misdeeds of Russia. We are told that Russia has been guilty of the greatest cruelties in Poland. I hear hon. Members opposite cheering that statement; but no cheers came from that quarter of the House when, at the time those cruelties were being committed in Poland, remonstrances against them were moved from this side of the House. I put aside, for the present, cases in which the tongue of calumny has been busy, or cases in which there may be a doubt about the facts. Apart from such cases, there have been at least two occasions on which, in my view, the conduct of that Power cannot be defended. The first occasion was when the Emperor Nicholas took up arms to put down by force Hungarian liberties—the liberties of those Hungarians who, at the time, were very anxious to interest the world in their own affairs, but who do not now appear desirous of extending those liberties to others; a fact which, had we known at the time it was to occur, might have somewhat modified our feelings in their favour. The claims of those Hungarians, however, were at the time just, and we thought that the proceedings of the Emperor of Russia, who lent to Austria the effectual aid of his armies in suppressing them, were unjust and unwarrantable; but I never heard any objection to his conduct proceed from hon. Members opposite. Again, as to Poland, I remember that as late as during the second Government of Lord Palmerston, a Motion was made by Mr. Horsman on the subject of the proceedings of Russia in Poland, but Mr. Horsman was not one of the Party who sat opposite; on the contrary, he was a Gentleman who on all questions of foreign policy expressed the strongest Liberal opinions, and the support which his Motion received proceeded almost wholly from this side of the House. One word with regard to the Papers which have just been laid upon the Table of the House with reference to the misdeeds of the Russians in Poland. That Paper purports to be presented by command of Her Majesty, which means that it has been presented at the instance of Her Majesty's Government. [Sir H. DAWKINSON WOLFF: By command of Her Majesty, in pursuance of an Address.] [Lord JOHN MANNERS: It was moved for from the opposite side of the House.] I have no doubt it was moved for from the "opposite" side of the House; my hon. Friends on this side of the House have always been desirous of exhibiting the cruelty in Poland; but the disposition of the Government and their Friends to hold up to reprobation the cruelty in Poland, appears to me to be of much more recent origin. Now, Sir, for my own part, I rejoice in the fact that the misdeeds of a Government should come to light, come how they may; but I think this mode of proceeding was eminently a shabby mode. You produce the misdeeds of other Governments; do you produce your own? Will you lay on the Table a detail of the proceedings by which the Mutiny was suppressed in India? I cannot recollect a more distinctly culpable proceeding on the part of any country than the slaughter of the Dyaks by Her Majesty's naval Forces, and by Sir James Brooke. But that evil act was discussed, vindicated, and approved in this House. I will give you another case. There is an official Report of my own in the Colonial Office, rendered in 1858-9, when Lord Carnarvon was Under Secretary, which sets forth the proceedings of the British Government in Cephalonia, at a time when a predial rising had taken place. It was a serious predial rising, which official panic or the selfish alarms of a class magnified into a rebellion. As such it was insignificant, almost ludicrous. But martial law was maintained in the island for six weeks. I believe one of our soldiers was wounded. A score of the people were shot, and many scores were flogged, and the punishment of flogging is one viewed by the Greek population, as I have often been assured, with a horror even greater than capital punishment. Will you lay that Report on the Table? What is the meaning of producing charges against other countries when you are not prepared to produce your own? [An hon. MEMBER: The Cephalonian Report, I think, has been laid on the Table.] I think not, I must have known of it. And I proceed with my general argument.

One of my greatest objections to the policy of Her Majesty's Government has always been, since we began to attend to it at the end of last July, that it tends so extravagantly to facilitate the execution of the most selfish aims that Russia could possibly entertain, and to enhance her influence and her power. It is a tremendous thing to infuse into the mind of the Christian subjects of the Porte the conviction that they have no other hope, no other ally, but Russia. It is hardly possible to dispute that that has been the effect of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. That the misgovernment of the Slav Provinces should cease is my first and great object, but I confess it would be with qualified satisfaction, although with a real satisfaction, that I should hear of the cessation of that misgovernment, unless I felt that a healthy growth of local liberty would come into the place of the abominations now afflicting these Provinces. I had hoped that something might be obtained from the Government with reference to the first and second—and even perhaps the third—Resolutions, which would have enabled me to avoid trespassing at so much length on the indulgence of the House. With regard, however, to the fourth Resolution, I was absolutely hopeless. I admit that it challenges the course of the Government, and suggests another course. If you wish, for the sake of humanity, for the sake of the peace of Europe, for the sake of the obligations this country has incurred, to close the Eastern Question, it cannot be satisfactorily done except by action which shall be both united and real. And my complaint against Her Majesty's Government is, that whenever they have seemed to concur in promoting united action it has always been done under conditions which have made that united action useless and even visionary. Do not let me conceal my own belief. I have in my fourth Resolution expressed the strong opinion I entertain—namely, that the policy of 1826 and 1827 was a wise and just policy. But that was a policy that had no more the approval of what I may call the West-end of London, than the Christian cause has now. That portion of England does not express the true sentiments of England. Looking over all the great achievements that have made the last half-century illustrious, not one of them would have been effected if the opinions of the West-end of London had prevailed. The Test Act would not have been repealed. Parliament would not have been reformed. Slavery would not have been abolished. Municipal Corporations would not have been opened. The Corn Laws would not have been repealed; nor Free Trade established; nor the Tariff reduced to a few lines; nor the Navigation Laws done away; nor the Universities opened; nor the Church of Ireland disestablished; nor the Land Tenures of that country re-enacted. I might extend this long list. I regard it with sorrow and misgiving that the nation has ever been in advance of those who ought to have been its leaders. But the fact being so, I cannot relax my efforts in this cause out of deference to the opinion of what I have called the West-end of London.

But then I am told that there has been, in relation to this question, inaction on the part of Liberal Governments. Now, Sir, this is a subject much too wide to be disposed of by a taunt, or by any incidental remark. It is a question of history; and if a Motion were made for a complete inquiry into the conduct of all Governments since the Crimean War with regard to this great question, I, for one, would not object to it. In my opinion, it is totally impossible for any man or for any Government in Western Europe to raise the Turkish Question, simply of his or their own motion. How was it possible for us during the Franco-German struggle, or during the protracted controversy that resulted in the Geneva Arbitration, to raise the Turkish Question? Nay, even if we had been more free, there were no events in Turkey on which we could take our stand. There was, so to speak, no point of departure. There was no revolt of which we could examine the cause; there were no massacres of which we could expose the guilt. In 1860 massacres did occur in Syria, which may be partially compared with the massacres in Bulgaria in 1876. A Liberal Government was then in office; and observe the very different course pursued by that Government. Whether we had been wise and right in all things I know not. I am by no means prepared to claim for us off-hand a sentence of universal acquittal; but this I know, that at a very early date, in the affair of the Lebanon, Lord Russell wrote a letter in which he positively announced that a British squadron would be sent to the coast of Syria, and that if necessary marines would be landed. At the same time France declared her intention of sending troops to Syria. We heard nothing then about fears of provoking Turkish valour to desperation by these rather decided methods. On the 28th of July Lord Russell said that the remaining points, which were of essential importance, appeared to be to obtain the assent of the Porte to the intervention of foreign troops, and the fixing of a time for the intervention of those troops, to cease. On that the consent of Turkey was given, and the foreign intervention did take place. And how was the consent of Turkey given? It was given in a Conference by Safvet Pasha, on the 27th of August, and in terms which were very remarkable. You might have had just the same terms now if you had chosen to seek them in the same manner. They are these—

“It is owing to the counsels of the Representatives of the Powers, and the vision held out to us of foreign troops landing on our territories, notwithstanding the refusal which we should have given to the conclusion of the Convention, that we have been reduced to choose the lesser of two evils.”

The consent of the Turkish Government was obtained; but it was given in view of this—that they had before them the vision of foreign troops landed in Syria, notwithstanding their refusal, and they were reduced to the choice of the lesser of two evils. I ask for a comparison between our course throughout in the matter of the Lebanon, and the course of the existing Government since the Autumn of 1875. I might refer to other matters; but I will not now pursue the subject.

I will next say a few words only on the nature of our obligations in this particular case. It is much too late, in my opinion, to argue whether we are bound to take up the case of the Christians in Turkey or not. We might have argued that question before the Crimean War. But in the Crimean War we did two things; and I must repeat the challenge I have made to the Government with regard to those two things, for they are of vital importance in this great controversy. The first was, that we abolished the power of interference which previously existed, and which was lodged in the hands of Russia. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for War have told me that they do not admit that such a power of interference existed. I think it is possible that they may have misunderstood my statement; because I am quite certain that if they hold that proposition in the terms I have just stated, they are holding it in the face of history and of law as recognized in Europe for a hundred years. They may have understood me to say that Russia had, by the Treaty of Kainardji, a Protectorate over the Christians. Now, I admit that she had no Protectorate over the Christians. A Protectorate is a scheme involving direct and positive powers. She had no such powers in regard to the Christians in Turkey generally. What she had was this—a stipulation from the Porte that the Porte should firmly protect the Christian religion and its churches. Of that stipulation she had a right to require the fulfilment, as well as of every other stipulation in her Treaties. There is not the least doubt that it is a distinct stipulation. To set up the doctrine that this distinct and substantive stipulation is a mere Preamble, that it is absorbed in the latter part of the Article, is really little less than ridiculous. The latter part of the Article is separated from the earlier part by the Italian word which can only be translated by “furthermore,” or “moreover,” or some equivalent. Russia had a covenant with the Porte for the protection of those churches, and she had the same right to require its fulfilment as she had with respect to every other covenant in the Treaty. That, I say, cannot be doubted. Now, let us look at the opinions upon this point. I quoted the other day the opinion of the standard historian of the Turkish Empire—Von Hammer. He expressed the general historical judgment of the world on this point. But, if you want a legal opinion, I will quote that of Bluntschli, who is, I observe, considered as the highest authority as a jurist at present living on the Continent of Europe. He says—

There is the opinion of Bluntschli. It is not a controversial opinion; he states it as a notorious fact, in a matter which has never been contested. "I am responsible for the translation; but the words "obtained the establishment of it," I believe, fairly represent the words of the original. Since I spoke before on the matter, I have referred to the authority of Sir Robert Phillimore, and I find in him what I expected. I have had the honour of his friendship for half a century, and I did not open this question without having consulted him. He has entered into an argument to show that Russia did not possess by the Treaty of Kainardji the claim which was made at the time of the Crimean War. In that we are all agreed. But Sir Robert Phillimore has never denied that this stipulation for protection in the Treaty of Kainardji was a binding stipulation; that Russia had a right to require it to be carried into execution, and a right to interfere with Turkey on a breach of it, just as she had in regard to any other part of the Treaty. As far as I know, opinions are not at variance on this point, unless, indeed, it is intended by the present Government to set up in 1877 a construction never heard of for over 100 years after the Treaty was concluded.

In such a matter, without doubt, we cannot omit to refer to the Blue Books of 1854. I must own it has not been in my power to read through the whole of those Blue Books—or rather to re-read them, for I was pretty well familiar with them at a former period—and, therefore, it is possible some assertion may be found in some part of them which more or less expresses the opinion that appears now to be maintained by the Government. Yet I think not so, because I have looked over them as well as I could, and because I find what seems to me a most distinct declaration on the part of Lord Clarendon, that some right of that kind on the part of Russia was acknowledged by us. I recollect myself, taking my memory for what it is worth, that this was distinctly our position in the controversy. We held that Russia misconstrued the Treaty, and overstated her right; we never, I believe, denied that she had some right; and accordingly, I find, also, in Book No. 1, that on May 26th, 1853, Baron Brunnow sends in a Memorandum, in which he speaks of the engagements of the Porte, dating from the Treaty of Kainardji, as granting to the Orthodox Church that freedom of worship, that tranquility of conscience, and that peaceable possession of rights which Russia could never cease to watch over. In the same book, on the 21st of June, Lord Clarendon, says in reply, on the part of the Government, that on the basis of Baron Brunnow's Memorandum, a complete and satisfactory arrangement might have been concluded without compromising the dignity of the Emperor. I think, then, I have made my demonstration complete; and, if so, the case stand thus—That there was a Treaty engagement, under which Russia was entitled to require from the Porte a protection of the Christians, and to resent it against the Porte as a national wrong if she did not protect them. That right was entirely destroyed and swept away by the Crimean War, through the expenditure of our blood and treasure, and of the blood and treasure of our Allies; and we could not thus sweep that right away, in my opinion, without becoming responsible for the consequences; without being as solemnly bound as men can be bound in faith and honour to take care that those, for whose protection it was intended, should obtain either the same thing or something better in its place. But, besides all I have now said, and even independently of this, as I believe, perfectly irrefragable argument, what was the case of the Crimean War on the very face of it as a dry matter-of-fact? It was this—That Turkey was about to be engaged in a contest of which the probable result was her defeat. I apprehend there was no doubt of that. It was probable she would be defeated. We intervened to prevent that defeat. We, together with our Allies, gave her a new lease of her existence; we gave her resources; we gave her the strength, of which she has been making such frightful use in Bulgaria. And now is it possible for us, on any principles, I care not what, which will bear to be stated in the face of day, so to put out of view the obligations, which our honour entails on us, as to say—"We wash our hands of this business, and will have nothing to do with it?" Much more, how can we say—"We will consent to pay delicate attentions to the Government of Turkey, and to be affording her in a thousand indirect forms moral assistance"—which in many instances is apt to glide into material assistance—"against any nation which may attempt to carry into effect the judgment of united Europe?"

I hope I have made pretty clear the state of the case, as it bears upon the third and fourth Resolutions. I have pursued not the best tactics, perhaps—for I am, perhaps, no great tactician—but the best tactics in my power. Very simple they have been. They have consisted in attempting to obtain the assertion, by as many as possible, of what was valuable in itself, even although it was not the whole of what seemed to me valuable or even essential. On that account I ranged my Resolutions in the order in which they stand; and when I found myself threatened with extinction by the somewhat rude machinery of the Previous Question, so that a free and unfettered discussion, even of the first Resolution, was to be rendered impossible, I came readily to the conclusion that it would not be expedient or becoming for me to ask you, Sir, to go through the idle form of putting each of them in succession from the Chair, with the certainty of obtaining a decision that they should not be put. But I am bound to say that to the whole of these Resolutions I, as an individual, steadfastly adhere. I ask no sanction from my noble Friend near me (the Marquess of Hartington) for anything except that for which he votes. I think it would be the meanest and paltriest act on my part to endeavour to crib from him some indirect support for that which he is not prepared to support overtly. I really know not on what grounds he is not willing to accompany me in the whole of these Resolutions. I would thankfully accept his aid, as I would the aid of the Government, for I think the union of the English people in this great matter is an object of the highest importance. There is not one of you opposite who can more deeply deplore than I do the use of the rude irregular methods to which we have been driven in order to exercise an influence upon the foreign policy of the country. I look upon these methods as, at the best, unsatisfactory and imperfect; I look upon them, in every case, except the case of necessity, as vicious and bad. It has been that necessity alone which has driven us to the point at which we stand to-night. For my part, I think no day of peace likely to come for the East, no final or satisfactory settlement, unless it be by the authority of united Europe. I see the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General has been complaining of violent language, and of the imputation of motives on my part. He is, I suppose, on the way to high judicial office, and from one in his position, as compared with other Members of this House, I have a right to expect something more than the average share of judicial temper. But what said he to his constituents? I have never imputed motives to the Government. I have never said they were governed by love of power. I should have been ashamed of such a statement. I cannot, indeed, account for their conduct, except by the supposition of some singular delusion, or some sinister influence which they do not themselves understand, and are not conscious of, so strange does it appear to me. But never have I imputed to them motives inconsistent with their perfect honour. Yet what says the hon. and learned Gentleman. He goes to his constituents, and to them he announces that I have entered into a warfare against the Government, animated by a vindictive malignity founded on my exclusion from office. ["Oh, oh!"] These are the judicial words of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I am glad he has come into his place. It gives me the opportunity of expressing a hope that when he resigns that place for one more permanent, more dignified, and more enjoyable, he will proceed in a different spirit to deal with the suitors, and even with the culprits, who may be brought before him. No, Sir, I impute no motives. If a word I have said seems to convey them, I disclaim it, and in a moment I would wash it away; but I believe no such word has passed my lips. It is a great crisis, Sir, in which we stand. Legislative Bodies are at all times occupied, more or less, in the making of history, and it is a very grave passage of history which we are now engaged in making. Sir, there is before us not one controversy, but two. There is the controversy between Russia and Turkey; there is the controversy between Turkey and her revolted subjects. I think the Government and their supporters out-of-doors in the Press are committing a great error in this—that it is the first of these two controversies—that between Russia and Turkey, which, after all, is only symptomatic—to which they address their minds. In my opinion, the other is the deeper and more important. The other is a controversy which can have no issue but one, and I do not hesitate to say that the cause of the revolted subjects of Turkey against their oppressors is as holy a cause as ever animated the breast, or as ever stirred the hand of man. Sir, what part are we to play in regard to it? Looking at this latter controversy—the controversy between Turkey and her subjects—the horrible massacres of last year, the proofs of which have been afforded that they are only parts and indications of a system; that their recurrence is to be expected, nay, that it is a matter of moral certainty, if they are now allowed to pass with impunity; looking at the total want of result from Lord Derby's efforts, at that mockery which has been cast in our teeth in return for what I quite admit was upon ordinary rules and principles an insulting despatch, can we, Sir, say, with regard to this great battle of freedom against oppression which is now going on, which has been renewed from time to time, and for which one-third of the population of Bosnia and Herzegovina are at this moment not only suffering exile; but, terrible to say, are upon the very verge of absolute starvation; upon which depends the fate of millions of the subject-races that inhabit the Turkish Empire—can we, with all this before us, be content with what I will call a vigorous array of remonstrances?—well intended, I grant, but without result, as expressing the policy and satisfying the obligations of this great country. Can we, I say, looking upon this battle, lay our hands upon our hearts and, in the face of God and man, say with respect to it—“We have well and sufficiently performed our part?” Sir, there were other days, when England was the hope of freedom. Wherever in the world a high aspiration was entertained, or a noble blow was struck, it was to England that the eyes of the oppressed were always turned—to this favourite, this darling home of so much privilege and so much happiness, where the people that had built up a noble edifice for themselves would, it was well known, be ready to do what in them lay to secure the benefit of the same inestimable boon for others. You talk to me of the established tradition and policy in regard to Turkey. I appeal to an established tradition, older, wider, nobler far—a tradition not which disregards British interests, but which teaches you to seek the promotion of those interests in obeying the dictates of honour and of justice. And, Sir, what is to be the end of this? Are we to dress up the fantastic ideas some people entertain about this policy, and that policy in the garb of British interests, and then, with a new and base idolatry, to fall down and worship them? Or are we to look, not at the sentiment, but at the hard facts of the case, which Lord Derby told us 15 years ago—namely, that it is the populations of those countries that will ultimately possess them—that will ultimately determine their abiding condition? It is to this fact, this law, that we should look. There is now before the world a glorious prize. A portion of those as yet unhappy people are still making an effort to retrieve what they have lost so long, but have not ceased to love and to desire. I speak of those in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Another portion—a band of heroes such as the world has rarely seen—stand on the rocks of Montenegro, and are ready now, as they have ever been during the 400 years of their exile from their fertile plains, to sweep down from their fastnesses and meet the Turks at any odds for the re-establishment of justice and of peace in those countries. Another portion still, the 5,000,000 of Bulgarians, cowed and beaten down to the ground, hardly venturing to look upwards, even to their Father in heaven, have extended their hands to you; they have sent you their petition, they have prayed for your help and protection. They have told you that they do not seek alliance with Russia, or with any foreign Power, but that they seek to be delivered from an intolerable burden of woe and shame. That burden of woe and shame—the greatest that exists on God's earth—is one that we thought united Europe was about to remove; that in the Protocol united Europe was pledged to remove; but to removing which, for the present, you seem to have no efficacious means of offering even the smallest practical contribution. But, Sir, the removal of that load of woe and shame is a great and noble prize. It is a prize well worth competing for. It is not yet too late to try to win it. I believe there are men in the Cabinet who would try to win it, if they were free to act on their own beliefs and aspirations. It is not yet too late, I say, to become competitors for that prize; but be assured that whether you mean to claim for yourselves even a single leaf in that immortal chaplet of renown, which will be the reward of true labour in that cause, or whether you turn your backs upon that cause and your own duty, I believe, for one, that the knell of Turkish tyranny in those Provinces has sounded. So far as human eye can judge, it is about to be destroyed. The destruction may not come in the way, or by the means that we should choose; but come this boon from what hands it may, it will be a noble boon, and as a noble boon will gladly be accepted by Christendom and the world.

The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the first of the Resolutions of which he had given Notice.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House finds just cause of dissatisfaction and complaint in the conduct of the Ottoman Porte with regard to the Despatch written by the Earl of Derby on the 21st day of September 1876, and relating to the massacres in Bulgaria."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF, in rising to move an Amendment to the Motion, said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had begun by alluding to some transactions which had taken place in the borough which he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had the honour to represent, and had stated that he had at a meeting last year expressed sentiments which justified the Resolutions then before the House. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman was not desirous of misrepresenting him; but he certainly had done so, when he had referred to this newspaper account without reading any extracts. He begged, therefore, permission of the House to make a personal explanation. On the 7th of September last year, either the very day, or just before the right hon. Gentleman's pamphlet was published, he was asked to attend what was called an atrocity meeting at Christchurch, and he found that two or three local gentlemen. Liberals, wished to advocate the establishment of an independent kingdom in Bulgaria. He had, therefore, written to say that he deplored the atrocities that had taken place in the Balkan Provinces; that it was sufficient to protest against the horrors which had taken place; and that all that could be done was to determine, as far as our influence went, that they should not recur; but that he could not join in any political demonstration on the subject of the future government of those Provinces. While concurring in the first part of the Resolution to be submitted to the meeting, he had taken exception to the latter part, because a public meeting was not capable of entering into the details of negotiations which could only be settled by statesmen after quiet consideration. In those circumstances he attended the meeting, and, according to the report in The Times of the next morning, he began his address on that occasion by expressing the hope that they would be unanimous, as they were not met for a Party purpose, but to deplore the atrocities and the misgovernment of the Turkish Provinces, for which they desired an effectual remedy, though they could not say what it was to be. They had all, at different times, deplored these atrocities, and they did so now; but they said they were not to be remedied by any arbitrary or violent action on the part of this country. The right hon. Gentleman had then stated that he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had been requested by another meeting to support the Resolution before the House. He would read a letter he had received that afternoon, to show how erroneous was the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and how these meetings had been got up by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite. His correspondent said—

"I am told that a day or two before circulars were issued to the leading Liberals, asking them to attend and bring as many friends as possible, and up to mid-day on Friday it was spoken of as a meeting of Liberals. On Friday afternoon, however, a few bills were posted that a public meeting would be held, &c.; subject, 'The Eastern Question.' The meeting was, of course, a packed one, and they passed all their resolutions. Mr. Davey was then supported by all the Dissenting ministers. I hear that two or three waggon loads of people came from Milton, outside the borough."

Mr. Gladstone

Having disposed of that which was merely a personal question, and one scarcely consistent with the dignity of the right hon. Gentleman to have brought forward, he would venture to submit to the House his reasons for moving the Amendment, with which he should conclude. First, he moved that Amendment, because he thought any discussion in that House at the present moment on the Eastern Question highly dangerous, and that the best mode of disposing of the matter would be by the Previous Question, so as to show to the world in general, and to the public of this country, that the House of Commons was not inclined in any way by public discussion to embarrass the future action of the Government. The crude manner in which the hon. Member for East Cumberland (Mr. C. W. Howard) had given Notice of the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman showed that a Motion would be brought forward relative to the prospective policy of Her Majesty's Government. Now, he was not aware that such a Motion had ever been brought forward in that House. They might condemn the past or the present; but a condemnation of a course to be pursued, which must be guided by contingencies as they arose would, not only by that House, but by any assembly of business men, be rejected and repudiated. He had always advocated the right of intervention on the part of this country established by the Treaty of 1856, and his advocacy was not founded on the substitution of the right of Europe for the rights of Russia, but on the few words, the "concert of Europe," which gave this country and Europe a right of intervention in the affairs of Turkey, or any other country, when they were dangerous to the peace of its neighbours. He had, therefore, last year pressed on the Government for an intervention. He had pressed Her Majesty's Government again on the Motion brought forward by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Mr. Bruce), and, on another occasion, had asked the Prime Minister, whether the time had not arrived to intervene by means of a Congress, or, if necessary, a Commission, on the affairs of Turkey; and he urged upon the Government that a Conference was necessary. But, while doing so, he never contemplated or suggested in any way the authorization of the idea that England should act alone, or without the assistance of her Allies, and of those who with her had signed the Treaty of Paris. The right hon. Gentleman rather took credit for the way in which Liberal Governments had acted towards Turkey; but their conduct was one of the principal reasons for objecting to the Motion, for it was owing to the action of several Liberal Governments in regard to the misgovernment of the Turkish Provinces that it was impossible for any Government to take any other steps now than those which had been taken. With great self-glorification the right hon. Gentleman referred to the action of the Government of Lord Palmerston in 1860 with regard to Syria. But what was the position? In 1856 the Treaty of Paris was signed; in 1857 occurred the Indian Mutiny; in 1858 and 1859 nothing occurred in Turkey, and the Conservatives came into office. In the latter year, after the Liberal Government had come in, they had intervened in the affairs of Syria, and he gave them credit for so doing. But Syria was not in Europe; it was not surrounded by States of the same nationality and the same religion; it was entirely isolated from Europe; it was feasible for the Powers to delegate one of their number to send a Force there without any danger of the occupation becoming permanent. But the right hon. Gentleman had taken good care not to refer to what had occurred subsequently; for in 1862 and 1863 disturbances had occurred in Servia, Herzegovina, and Montenegro, and what had the Government of that day done? Why Lord Russell, as the organ of the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a leading Member, wrote a despatch to the Powers who signed the Treaty of Paris, in which he denounced those disturbances as the result of scarcely-concealed conspiracies in those Provinces to bring about anarchy, plunder, and bloodshed, and declared that it was incumbent on the Powers of Europe to preserve the general peace in words almost identical with those which had been most properly used by the Government of the present day. The right hon. Gentleman now spoke strongly of the Government having announced before the Conference of Constantinople that there was to be no coercion; but in 1869, when he was the head of a Government with a majority far greater than that of the present Government, Lord Clarendon authorized a Conference to be held at Paris on the affairs of Crete, and, under circumstances almost analogous to the present. Then the right hon. Gentleman, through his Foreign Secretary, not only repudiated coercion, but told the now revolted Provinces that they were not to anticipate any encouragement if they followed the example of Crete. On that occasion Lord Clarendon, writing to Lord Lyons on January 5, 1869, said—

“Her Majesty’s Government, anxious to avert the occurrence of events that might threaten the maintenance of peace, and convinced that this feeling is shared by every other Power, thinks that by laying down in distinct terms certain principles of public morality and of International Law, the Conference may give, though indirectly, a clear and unmistakable warning to other Provinces, where there is reason to apprehend that insurrectionary movements against the authority of the Porte might find encouragement, that the Great Powers of Europe would view with the strongest disapproval any unwarrantable proceedings on the part of such Provinces inconsistent with the principles so laid down by the Conference.”

Yet now the House was invited to acquiesce in these violent Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman. There was another occasion on which the right hon. Gentleman had the opportunity of showing sympathy with the Christians of Turkey; but which he did not take advantage of. In 1871 the signatories of the Treaty of Paris were invited to make the state of the Christian subjects of the Porte a casus belli. What said Lord Enfield in that House in answer to Sir John Gray?—“That the state of the Christian subjects of the Porte was improved.” Yet a Report had been laid on the Table that day which showed that 20 days before that reply of Lord Enfield was given, a despatch had been received from Consul Holmes, in which it was said that the state of things had in no way improved. Consul Holmes, writing from Bosna Serai, on February 24, 1871, said—

“The unnecessary delay and neglect, to the prejudice often of innocent persons, the open bribery and corruption, the invariable and unjust favour shown to Mussulmans in all cases between Turks and Christians, which distinguish the Turkish administration of what is called ‘justice,’ throughout the Empire cannot fail to suggest the question—what would be the lot of foreigners in Turkey were the European Powers to give up the capitulations? I am convinced that their position in the Provinces, at all events, would be intolerable, and that they would quit the country to a man, while the outcry and feeling in Europe against Turkey would ultimately cause her ruin. The universal ignorance, corruption, and fanaticism of all classes precludes all hope of an efficient administration of justice for at least another generation.”

In the face of that despatch the Government of the right hon. Gentleman in 1871 gave the improved state of Turkey and of its Christian subjects as a reason for strengthening the hands of Turkey against Russia and the other Powers of Europe. There was a second reason why he objected to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that from first to last, both in his Resolutions and in his speeches in the country, he had tried to make them the subservient supporters of the policy of Russia. He charged the Conservative Party with wanting war, but it was the right hon. Gentleman himself who advocated war. Not a syllable had he uttered that night but what meant war against Turkey with the European concert which he had devised in his own head, but which the Papers before the House showed was utterly impossible for that purpose. In speaking in favour of Russia he had urged that night, as he had done on two previous occasions, that the Crimean War having abolished the Treaty rights of Russia, and especially those said to be obtained under the Treaty of Kainardji, we were bound to assume the position which Russia had occupied previous to the Crimean War under that Treaty. On a former occasion the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) took issue with the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the Treaty of Kainardji; he therefore would not refer to the text of the Treaty, but would confine himself to showing that the right hon. Gentleman was utterly incorrect in the view he had taken of it. He preferred citing written and published documents to any language he could himself use. What was the interpretation put on that Treaty by Count Nesselrode? Count Nesselrode, writing to Sir Hamilton Seymour, dated St. Petersburg, June 14th (26), 1853, said—

“As to the Treaty of Kainardji, it is very true if taken by the letter, that the rights and privileges of the Greek religion are not mentioned in express terms, but the protection given to the religion and to its churches well implies to the eyes of every man of sense and good faith that of the rights and privileges of the said churches. From the moment the Sultan undertook towards us to protect them he thus conferred on us the right to watch over the manner in which he would fulfil that engagement."

That was the pretension which was combated by the Crimean War. He would put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether he was not a party to the Memorandum which, in 1854, was submitted to Russia by the Plenipotentiaries of Austria, France, and Great Britain. The Conference was held at Vienna, and that document was sent as the basis of the Conference at which Lord John Russell was our Plenipotentiary to Prince Gortchakoff on the 28th of December, 1854. It said—

"Russia, in renouncing the pretension to cover with an official Protectorate the Christian subjects of the Porte of the Oriental rite, equally renounces as a natural consequence the revival of any of the articles of former Treaties, and notably the Treaty of Koutchouk-Kainardji, the erroneous interpretation of which has been the principal cause of the present war."

In other words, what Russia tried to convert into a Protectorate of all the Christian subjects of the Porte was the principal cause of the Crimean War. But the Crimean War did not abolish the rights of Russia. It merely resisted the pretensions of Russia to exercise a Protectorate which had never legally existed and which would have been unendurable to Turkey. What again said Lord Clarendon in his Circular dated June 19, 1855—

"By the Treaty of Kainardji it is provided that the Sultan shall protect the Christian religion and its churches, and it was upon a complete misinterpretation of this Treaty, but without even an allegation that its stipulations had been violated, that Russia claimed a right of interference between the Sultan and 10 millions of the Sultan's Christian subjects. If the claim had been yielded to, and if a great wrong had thus been perpetrated, the authority of the Sovereign within his own dominions would in a great degree have been transferred to a foreign Power, and an important step would have been taken towards the overthrow of the Turkish Empire and the establishment of Russian supremacy on its ruins."

That was the result advocated by the right hon. Gentleman. From first to last the right hon. Gentleman had advocated subserviency to Russia, and he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) felt persuaded such a sentiment must be abhorrent to that House and the country. In his speech at Blackheath, when Russia was carrying on what had been called an unofficial war in Servia with respect to Turkey, the right hon. Gentleman took the opportunity for advertizing his sympathy with Russia. "I, for one," he said, "am ready, as an individual, to give the right hand to Russia when her objects are right and just." The right hon. Gentleman had also by continuous action encouraged the pretensions of Russia. What happened at the Conference at St. James's Hall? The right hon. Gentleman had played a great part in that Conference. He distinctly advocated the policy which was contained in the fourth Resolution, and referred with approbation to the course taken by Mr. Canning in 1826, in invoking the aid of Russia and inviting the concert of all Europe for the establishment of Greek independence; and what had been the result of that document? The Protocol of the 23rd of March (4th of April), 1826, to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded, was referred to in the Russian declaration of war against Turkey of the 26th of April, 1828, and see what followed? By the Treaty of Adrianople, Russia certainly did obtain some privileges for the Greeks, but she obtained for herself additional territory in Asia. She gave the Greeks the Morea, but she took Anapa and Poti. By the Treaty of Kainardji, while she assumed to protect some churches, she took Kinburn, Kertch, Yenikale, and Azoff, conquests which were hostile to England. And what was wanted now? To obtain towns in Asia. How did she assist the Christians in Bosnia and Bulgaria? Why, by advancing her armies against Kars, Erzeroum, and Batoum. Why did Russia advance by the Black Sea? Mr. Palgrave had told us. He said—

"Anxiety is sometimes felt at the news of Russian conquests in Central Asia and the security of our Indian possessions is by some thought to be jeopardized by the appearance of the two-headed eagle in Bokahra and Samarcand. But in truth the Russian flag over Alexandropol, within a day's ride of Kars, is much nearer India. Let the line of country, the comparatively narrow line, of which we have been now speaking, from Batoum and the Ajaras on the Black Sea down to Bayazid and Van once become Russian territory and the entire Tigro-Euphrates Valley, now separated from Russia and Russia's obsequious ally Persia, by Kurdistan alone, becomes Russian also. The Persian Gulf and the directest of all Indian routes, a route where no wide desert tracts, no huge mountain chains intervene, nothing but the serviceable sea, will thus be not only open to, but absolutely in the hands of, our very doubtful friends. The exclusion of all commerce, all communication by the most important line, except what is Russian and through Russia, will be the first and immediate consequence; what may be the ulterior results time alone can tell. But if India have a vulnerable point next after Egypt, it is the Euphrates Valley and its communications."

But all the conquests of Russia to which he had referred had been made under the pretext of protecting the Christian subjects of the Porte. He asked the House whether the policy of the right hon. Gentleman had not given to the Russians the greatest possible encouragement by the hope of assistance from this country. He never heard from abroad but he heard stories which he would not believe unless the right hon. Gentleman himself were to corroborate them, as to the encouragement which the right hon. Gentleman held out to the advance of Russia. He had heard of letters written by the right hon. Gentleman to Russians in which he spoke of the Russian advance as "The Holy Cause," and he was informed that when General Ignatieff was in this country the right hon. Gentleman urged him not to allow the Russian Army to be demobilized. The conduct of the right hon. Gentleman certainly gave some colouring and confirmation to those rumours. In fact, the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman might have been dictated at Moscow, composed at St. Petersburg, and telegraphed from Kischeneff by the same hand that composed the Russian Manifesto. With regard to them, he would say the first was a platitude and the second was a trap. The first Resolution merely declared on the part of the House what had been stated over and over again by the Government to Turkey, and the second tied our hands in case the necessities of the country should call on us to take action. The first Resolution was a Vote of Censure on Turkey. But what right had we to pass a Vote of Censure on Turkey any more than on Russia? How were we to obtain the concert of the Powers? The right hon. Gentleman had condemned the Government for producing Papers proving the cruelties of Russia in Poland, and he had contrasted that with the acts and even cruelties of Englishmen elsewhere. But if his argument held good for bringing forward statements against Turkey, surely the argument held good also for bringing forward statements against Russia. The right hon. Gentleman, in throwing this country into the arms of Russia, apparently forgot that those Papers had given us the most terrible list of cruelties perpetrated by Russia in Poland not in 1862 and 1863, but within the last three or four years. Colonel Mansfield wrote to Lord Granville in 1874, describing how the soldiers had surrounded the peasants, and on their refusal to change their religion, had given 50 blows to every man, 25 to every woman, and 10 to every child, while one woman, more vehement than the rest, had received 100. In one village a peasant suffocated himself with charcoal rather than have his child baptized by the official parish priest. Later, the peasants were assembled and beaten by the Cossacks, until the military surgeon declared, that if the punishment were continued longer it would endanger life; then they were driven through a half-frozen river to a church, where they were compelled to enrol their names as of the official religion. The British Consul at Odessa also wrote home, stating the cruelties which had occurred there, and that the ground of them was proselytism. And these were the acts of Regular troops and of the Government of Russia, a Government which came forward with all these professions of philanthropy; that was the Government to which the right hon. Gentleman wished us to become subservient. He asked again, how were they to obtain the concert of the Powers, seeing that Germany had declared that she would not consent to the occupation of Bulgaria by troops of any of the guaranteeing Powers to carry out their policy? It was his intention on this occasion to propose not the "Previous Question," but an Amendment, of which he would give the terms before he concluded. He thought the House had great occasion for thankfulness to the Leader of the Opposition for the part he had taken in this matter. The noble Lord last year rather resented any compliment from the Ministerial side of the House, and therefore it was with every apology that he ventured to state how much the noble Lord's conduct was generally appreciated for its statesmanlike, patriotic, and candid character. But the noble Lord was like the successor of an abdicated Emperor, who, repenting his abdication, tried to grasp the substance of a power, the symbols of which he had resigned. The noble Lord recollected very well the maxims laid down for the guidance of the Liberal Party, when led by Lord Palmerston—namely, that Russia should not be allowed, like a great giant, to stride from the Baltic to the Mediterranean. And he recollected, also, the patriotic conduct of the Conservative Party in 1854, 1855, and 1856, when, being in a minority of only 19, instead of obstructing, they gave a loyal support to, the Governments of Lord Aberdeen and Lord Palmerston. He did not ask to-night for a Vote of Confidence in Her Majesty's Government. What he asked the House to do was to reject a Vote of Confidence in the Russian Government. He believed the House to-night, by rejecting the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions would relieve the Government from the dangers and trammels of a mischievous restlessness, and enable them to proceed upon their course of watchful neutrality, to maintain the honour and interests of this country, and the peace of Europe. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice—

Sir H. Drummond Wolff

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "declines to entertain any Resolutions which may embarrass Her Majesty's Government in the maintenance of peace and in the protection of British interests, without indicating any alternative line of policy,"—(Sir Henry Wolf.)

—instead thereof.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, they had frequently been invited to bring their opinions on this question to the test of discussion and the judgment of the House, but up to the present time they had scarcely had an opportunity of taking part in a discussion which presented any more than a peg on which to hang their speeches. He confessed he feared at one time to-night that the present opportunity was also about to pass away, but this fear had entirely vanished after hearing the magnificent speech of the right hon. Gentleman. It might be true that the right hon. Gentleman only intended to propose the first two Resolutions, but three-fourths of his speech had been devoted to a justification of the principles laid down in the concluding Resolutions. The hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) might think Resolutions of that kind inopportune. Indeed, he might think all Resolutions which did not imply implicit faith in the Government were inopportune; but these Resolutions were not inopportune to hon. Gentlemen sitting on his (Mr. Chamberlain's) side of the House. The negotiations of Her Majesty's Government had entirely failed, so that they could not be accused now of hampering the efforts of the Government. They were in the presence of a great crisis. They were in fear, and not altogether without reason, that this country might once more, as in the past, drift into war—a war which would be abhorred by the majority of the people of this country. It was, therefore, the duty of every man to speak out, and to protest as best he could. He pointed out that the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman could not have been proposed much earlier. They were intended, as he understood, to formulate their opinions as expressed in the Autumn agitations. Whatever might be the feelings of the hon. Member for Christchurch as to the resolutions passed at those meetings, their policy, or their wisdom, even he might feel some patriotic pride in the spirit which dictated them—a spirit which distinguished a free people, hatred of oppression, of cruelty, and of tyranny—a spirit which was the guarantee and justification of our liberties. When the hon. Member spoke of these meetings having been got up, he clearly knew very little of popular agitation. He (Mr. Chamberlain) had had something to do with agitation, and with agitation which had been successful. He knew that money could do something, and that organization could do more; but he knew that neither money nor organization could move a popular agitation, unless there was a deep-felt popular sentiment on which to work. The object of these meetings was twofold. In the first place, it was intended to prevent a drop of English blood from being shed or a pound of English treasure being spent to uphold the detestable tyranny of the Turks; and, in the second place, to enlist all the influence which the Government could bring to bear in order to secure the better government of the Christian Provinces of Turkey. At that time the country had reason to fear that the Government was going to pursue what was sometimes called the traditional policy with regard to the Eastern Question. Certainly, nothing had been said by the Ministers to show the country that it was an erroneous impression. When, however, the Blue Books were distributed, they found some Members of the Cabinet, especially Lords Salisbury and Derby, had become convinced of the futility of such a policy, and their despatches teemed with expressions as strong as anything that had been said at the Autumn meetings, although of course couched in more diplomatic language. In fact, in deference to the public agitation, the Government had changed their policy. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen opposite who cried "No" were, of course, entitled to their opinion; but Lord Derby had said himself, in one of his despatches, that the Government would not now be able to fulfil their Treaty obligations in consequence of public feeling in this country. ["No, no!"] That expression implied that the Government would have carried out their Treaty obligations had it not been for the public agitation. ["No, no!"] That did not seem to please the hon. Gentlemen opposite, or suit their views. Then he should give them the opinion of another Member of the Government. They had been told it was true the Government had changed its policy, but only changed it because events had altered, as a man changed in summer a heavy coat for a light one, but then this showed that the Government had a different mind in February from what they had now, and what they said on this side of the House was, that the Government had, if not actually taken the coat from their wardrobe, cut it after their pattern. Then, as regarded the second object, they found the proposals at the Conference almost exactly what was contemplated by those who moved to secure self-government for the Christian Provinces. It was quite true that the proceedings of the Conference were accompanied by an ostentatious assurance of non-intervention, which some of them thought courted the failure which subsequently ensued; but Her Majesty's Government said they had hopes of success, and it did not, therefore, lie with the Opposition to challenge the policy. But their negotiations had entirely failed, and now a new responsibility had been cast upon those who thought that the objects which they sought in the Autumn were of supreme importance to re-affirm their necessity, and to point out means by which they could be accomplished. This was the more necessary because they had some evidence of re-action on the part of Her Majesty's Government. During the time of the Conference the Government appeared to have loyally supported Lord Salisbury, both in his attempt to bring moral coercion, and in his willingness to provide material coercion with the consent of the Porte; but when the proposals were rejected by the Porte, then the Government desisted from bringing pressure to bear upon Turkey, and appeared to have fallen back upon their traditional policy, and renewed their distrust of Russia. He was not a sympathizer with Russia. He confessed that he could not altogether regret that she was earning a well-deserved retribution for her treatment of Poland and the tribes in Central Asia, and the persecution of the Jews and Catholics; but could they regard with satisfaction the position in which they had been placed by the policy of Her Majesty's Government, under which Russia was left to be the arbitrator of the destinies of those Provinces, and their unhappy populations had no choice between the almost bestial tyranny of the Turks and the iron despotism of Russia? But when the Member for Christchurch spoke of the right hon. Member for Greenwich making these Resolutions subservient to the interests of Russia, he begged to submit that it was not in the interest of the Russians that these Resolutions were submitted to the House, for these Resolutions proposed to take the matter out of the hands of Russia and put it in the hands of united Europe. The hon. Member for Christchurch in August last said that he did not then share in the distrust of Russia. The hon. Member then believed that England would be as popular as Russia if she showed the same interest as Russia in the welfare of the Christian subjects. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had, in reference to this subject, called attention to the fact that no

nation, unfortunately, had an entirely clear record in this matter, and least of all this country, whose very name for long years was a bye-word for our perfidious treatment of foreign policy, and who had much to regret for her doings in Asiatic countries; and, to come nearer home, they could not regard without shame some of our past dealings even in connection with Scotland and Ireland. He hoped that we were prepared to judge Russia as we desired to be judged—by her present intention and her present actions, and not by what took place in the past. If hon. Members would take an impartial view of the case of Russia as it had been presented by Prince Gortchakoff, he then hoped it would be agreed that Russia had been harshly used. The hon. Member for Christchurch said that Russia had no Treaty rights with regard to the Christians in Turkey; but at least she had a traditional interest in the subject, and it was simply impossible for her to see her co-religionists tortured, and to remain all the time silent and unmoved. From the first Russia said that peace was impossible unless some guarantee was given for the better government of the Christian Provinces of Turkey. She had formulated her demands; and he thought that they were just and reasonable. They had been accepted by this Government, and had been presented to the Conference, where, of course, they were refused by the Turks. Then, at the instance of the English Government, they had been reduced again and again until they had dwindled down to the Protocol; but these successive concessions had only hardened the Turks, who had rejected all of them contemptuously. And yet the Government now turned round upon Russia, and expressed doubt of her sincerity and intentions, and threw upon her the responsibility of the war; while it was clear that in the interests of peace she had made successive sacrifices, and at the instance of Her Majesty's Government she had been content to accept less than originally she had a right to demand. For himself, whatever motives they might attribute to Russia, whether interests of aggrandizement or sincere desire for peace, he could not see how she could have refrained from using force to secure the objects for which she had made so many sacrifices. Attacks had been made on the right hon. Member for Greenwich, but he should not follow that example by attacking Her Majesty's Government in a similar spirit, for although their policy was inconsistent in detail, yet he thought that it might be explained by one prevailing idea. He believed that the one thing Her Majesty's Government had been sincerely anxious for was the preservation of peace, almost at any price, though the means taken were not very likely to secure the object; that was what explained the despatch of Lord Derby to the Government of Austria, urging them to take such measures as would assist the Turks to put down insurrection—an insurrection which the right hon. Member for Greenwich considered to be a war in one of the holiest of causes. Undoubtedly, the same desire for the peace of the world induced the Government to accept the Andrassy Note, to refuse their concurrence to the Berlin Memorandum, to urge upon Turkey to accept the demands of Russia, and then at another time to urge Russia to withdraw demands refused by Turkey. But, unfortunately, these proceedings had not resulted in obtaining their object, and war had broken out. We had allowed Russia to draw the sword alone when we might have held the hilt, and in order to avoid the bare risk of an intervention with all Europe against Turkey, we had placed ourselves in a position where we might, in some unreasonable panic, be alone, face to face, in a war with Russia. The Government said they would not interfere unless British interests were affected. He would not presume to say that this policy was a gospel of selfishness, because he did not know in what sense the words British interests were used. If they only meant a jealous fear lest our trade should be injured, then it was unworthy of us; but if, on the contrary, they meant that we had undertaken a vast responsibility in connection with our Indian Empire, whose happiness lay in the continued security of our rule, then he said that these were interests to guard, and, if necessary, to defend, even by the sword. But then, in this case, Russia had a right to ask Her Majesty's Government at what point they considered that those interests would be imperilled. Russian statesmen had a right to complain that we had no definite policy, and they never knew at what point they might overstep an imaginary line, and invite our hostility, and as long as this was uncertain the English people might find some morning that in the course of the night the Russian Army had unwittingly overstepped the mark which the Government had placed upon their maps, the passing of which was to be the passing of the Rubicon, and the signal for the commencement of hostilities. Her Majesty's Government should give the House some information as to the point at which they considered that British interests would be interfered with. One thing he was quite certain of—that British interests would be no longer identified by the people with Turkish misgovernment and misrule. He confessed that he thought, looking at the whole of the subject, that we had less to fear for British interests than we had to fear for the condition of those unhappy Provinces. He should tender his support to the third and fourth Resolutions of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, which sought to protect these Provinces, as well from any other foreign dominion as from the tyranny of Turkey. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Christchurch had told them that now such policy was too late. He (Mr. Chamberlain) could only say that it seemed to him that it was never too late to try the experiment. One thing was quite clear—that the experiment had not been honestly or sincerely tried up to the present time. It might have been tried with a good chance of success at an earlier period, when the Government were asked to join in the Berlin Memorandum. A joint intervention with all Europe against Turkey was a risk which might be righteously encountered in order to prevent the certainty of the war in which the two countries were now engaged. The Conference at Constantinople was a distinct acceptance of the principle of international arbitration. International arbitration was only an idle dream unless they were willing to accept at the same time the idea of international obligations. England especially had a duty cast upon her to do something for the relief of these poor suffering people, whose condition was very much the result of our past interference. Because he believed that the Resolutions faithfully represented the opinions of the great mass of the English people which hitherto had had no representation in the House, but only in the agitation out-of-doors, and because he believed they were just and expedient, he should offer to them his humble and hearty support. He knew that their defeat was a foregone conclusion; still he hoped that in the end the policy which they indicated might prevail.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: I am not going to dwell on the somewhat unhappy wrangle which occurred at the beginning of the evening with respect to the form which this debate should take. I feel, however, bound to say, that under all the peculiar circumstances of the case, seeing that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, who, throughout the last Autumn, led a great agitation on this subject, at last had declared that the time had come when he could not, consistently with the course which he then took, remain silent with respect to it any longer, and in consequence had placed a series of Resolutions on the Notice Paper, on which he distinctly intended to invite the opinion of the House—not separately, but as a whole—the country, from one end of it to the other, will, I think, learn with astonishment to-morrow morning that the right hon. Gentleman has changed his course at the last moment, and has abstained from inviting that opinion. Therefore, whatever may be the view taken as to the moving of the Previous Question—and I, for one, would have preferred meeting the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman with a more decided opposition—I believe my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) has done well, when a person occupying the high position of the right hon. Gentleman at the last moment strikes out the pith of his Resolutions and changes the front which he presented, not only to this House, but to the country, in giving the House an opportunity of expressing its opinion that it will decline to entertain the question of any Resolution which might embarrass Her Majesty's Government in the maintenance of peace and in protecting British interests, especially when such Resolution indicates no alternative line of policy. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of all the meetings which have been held in the country, not only during the Autumn, but in the past week. Now, as to those which were held in the

Autumn, I can only say that I, for one, should have been ashamed of my countrymen if public expression had not been given from one end of the land to the other of their utter detestation of the horrors which had been committed in Turkey. Do you think that because we happen to be Ministers we are not Englishmen? Do you think that because we happening to be Ministers of the Crown pursue a line of policy which you do not like we have not the feelings of Englishmen? Do you suppose that we twelve men are the only persons in the country who have not been alive to the horrors which have been going on in Turkey? If you think that, or if you have let the country think that, you are grievously mistaken. And I am bound to say that you have misled the country, and led it to think that because we have pursued the policy that we considered right and just, we are more callous than you to the horrors of all that has been going on in Bulgaria. ["No, no!"] The right hon. Gentleman says "No, no," but it is true. I think these allegations against the Government are perfectly false. But when you come to the meetings that have been held during the last week, they are not the spontaneous feeling of the country. It is a matter of notoriety that they are meetings held for the express purpose of backing up those Resolutions which the right hon. Gentleman now disdains to put before the House. ["No, no!"] Yes, and if the opinions of those meetings are to be gathered as the opinion of this House apparently is to be gathered, if all the horrors perpetrated in Turkey are to be paraded before the country, if they are to be spoken of by the most eloquent man who can be found, if you propose Resolutions containing some policy to stop these horrors, and if at the same time you strike out the pith of those Resolutions, I do not wonder at your getting any expression of opinion at such meetings. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the policy of the Government has been ambiguous. I hope to show before I sit down that it has been as clear as possible, and has proceeded in one straight line. The right hon. Gentleman said that no policy could be more deplorable than the policy of the Government during the last 18 months. Eighteen months! And in his very next sentence, he said that when we went to the Conference at Constantinople the country had confidence in the Government. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Confidence in Lord Salisbury.] I am coming to that. I thought that the right hon. Gentleman stated that when the Conference went on the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends held their hand. Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to ask this question? When was the meeting of the Conference at Constantinople? And when was the meeting of the so-called Conference at St. James's Hall? Did they not stay hands? How long did they stay their hands? If you compare dates you will find that there was very little time between the two to stay their hands in. The right hon. Gentleman says that he had confidence in Lord Salisbury and the proposals he made at the Conference. Now, if there has been one thing against which Englishmen ought to protest it is when an attempt is made to separate one Member of the Cabinet from the others. [Cheers.] Yes! this attempt to separate Lord Salisbury from the other Members of the Cabinet led some people to believe that the Cabinet were not united until the publication of the Blue Books, when all these castles in the air fell to pieces, and it was shown that every word uttered by Lord Salisbury expressed the firm declarations of the united Cabinet that sent him out and gave him his Instructions. The right hon. Gentleman has said there was a power behind Lord Salisbury which had previously determined that he should not succeed. I tell the right hon. Gentleman that a person holding his position in this House, unless he has some evidence to bring before the House, ought not to make such a statement. [Mr. GLADSTONE pointed to the Blue Books lying on the Table before him.] I repeat, that unless he has some evidence to prove the fact, he has no right whatever to make that statement. Nay, more, I will prove to him before I sit down that the statement is untrue, and that no such charge can be made, or ever ought to have been made. The right hon. Gentleman says we had determined that the Conference should fail, and that it must needs have failed, because we told Turkey that we were not going to enforce the decision of the Conference by arms. Now, I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if any Gentleman who has taken any part in these meetings has ever put to the people of this country this question straight out—"Will you go to war?" And that is the question which you shirk to-night. That is the one thing that you do not dare to put to the country and to this House. Are you prepared to go to war against Turkey as an ally of Russia? The right hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of answering me. Let him answer that question if he can—not in a dozen or even a hundred sentences—but by a simple "Yes" or "No." It is a simple question. It is a vital question. It is a question that admits of no deviation. It can only be answered in a monosyllable one way or the other. Are you prepared to engage the country in a war with Russia as an Ally against Turkey? We did not get at the answer to that question in a long wrangle of an hour-and-a-half, when we heard that the third and fourth Resolutions were to be withdrawn. The right hon. Gentleman at considerable length went into the declarations of the Ministers and their Supporters. To my mind it is perfectly marvellous, if you consider the enormous number of pages in the Blue Book and the speeches that have been made, that you cannot pick out one single sentence to show that we could have done anything that we have not done. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Press, which has supported the Government, has to a certain extent prepared the country for war. I want to know how, when, and where? And what war? The right hon. Gentleman has spoken in reference to British interests, of the enormous territory we have, and says that when we speak of British interests being affected we can find them anywhere, whenever we want an excuse for war. I hope to tell the right hon. Gentleman before I sit down what those British interests are. Then he went on to say, and for the best part of an hour—I assure the right hon. Gentleman I listened to him with attention and admiration, and agree in a great deal he said—he went on to speak of the massacres that had been committed. Well, nothing would induce me to say a word here or anywhere else of defence of the acts of the Government in Turkey, which he has condemned. I utterly abhor them from the bottom of my soul, and I speak not only for myself, but for every Member of the Cabinet. I will not separate myself from the Government any more than will Lord Salisbury. The Government is one on that point; and I believe that if a Liberal Government had been in power, with the right hon. Gentleman at its head, they could not have felt more utter detestation of those acts than we have.

There is another point on which I must say a word, though it is going back to an old story—I mean as to the Treaty of Kainardji. The right hon. Gentleman has on every occasion referred to that Treaty. His conscience is not easy on the subject of the Crimean War, and he always seems to me to try and invent some way of escaping from responsibility in reference to it. Well, to-night again, the right hon. Gentleman has fallen back on the Treaty, and quoted the authority of a great historian in support of his view. But it happens that the historian was not attempting, in the passage which he quoted, to describe accurately the precise extent and effect of that Treaty; he was endeavouring simply to give prominence to the fact that the extraordinary fate was reserved for Turkey at that moment of being compelled to admit for the first time the intervention on the part of her Christian subjects of a Power which she had reason to believe was her deadly enemy. If you wish to understand what the meaning of the Treaty was, not as an abstract question, but as a practical one, surely you should see what was the conduct of the Ministers who dealt with it in 1856. The right hon. Gentleman has said that much correspondence passed on the question, and he referred to one person who, as he stated, knew more of Turkey, and had more influence in Turkey, and understood the question better than any other man—namely, Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. The Ministers of the day very properly took the advice of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe on this very point, and in his reply he wrote—

"As the Treaty thus evoked to serve as the basis of another more stringent and comprehensive one is doubtless within your Lordship's reach, I will only observe with reference to it that of the four Articles which alone, as I am assured, have any bearing on the subject the 7th allows of a limited Russian interference only for one particular church and its ministers, and of no direct protection at all; the 8th relates exclusively to pilgrims; 14th accords to Russia the right of protecting one specified church in this neighbourhood; and the 16th applies exclusively to Wallachia and other Provinces restored to Turkey by the Treaty."

Well, again, what said Lord Clarendon, who will surely be admitted to be a high authority—

"The whole question as regards Russia turns upon the interpretation of the 7th Article of the Treaty of Kainardji by which Russia engaged to protect the Christian religion and all its churches throughout European Turkey; but so carefully did the Porte guard itself against any right of interference on the part of Russia, that by a subsequent portion of the Article that interference was expressly limited to the right of making representations with respect to a church in Constantinople and to take those representations into consideration. But it is this unlimited interpretation of the Treaty which has been throughout insisted upon by Russia, and for which she is now prepared to go to war."

He had yet another document to quote to the right hon. Gentleman, and it is an extract from the views communicated by the Plenipotentiaries of France, Austria, and Great Britain, to Prince Gortchakoff in Dec., 1854. They say—

"La Russie, en renonçant à la prétention de couvrir d'un protectorat officiel les sujets Chrétiens du Sultan du rit Oriental, renonce également par voie de conséquence naturelle, à faire récrire aucun des Articles de ses Traités antérieurs, et notamment du Traité de Koutchouk-Kainardji, dont l'interprétation erronée"—[Cheers.]
—Yes, that is the point—"a été la cause principale de la guerre actuelle."

That was an exact description of the case. Well, the question came to be debated in the House of Commons in 1856, and during the discussion an hon. Member spoke as follows:—

"It is said that what the Sultan gives to-day he may revoke to-morrow, and that the Treaty does not give to the Allied Powers that right of interference which some hon. Members think necessary for the security of the Christian subjects of the Sultan."

And what was Lord Palmerston's reply?

"I do wish," he said, "those who hold that opinion to remember for a moment what was the cause of the war. It was that the Emperor of Russia sent Prince Menchikoff to Constantinople with a demand which, if agreed to, would have given to the Emperor a right of interference in favour of the Christian subjects of the Sultan which was held by the Government of the Sultan, and by the English and French Governments, and admitted by the greater part of Europe, to have been a practical transference of sovereignty over 12,000,000 of the subjects of the Sultan to the Emperor of Russia. The war took place in consequence of the resistance of the Sultan to that demand; and if the treaty had placed that firman of the Sultan under the guarantee of the Allied Powers in a greater degree than the note of Prince Menchikoff required that the protection of the Christians should be placed under the Emperor of Russia, the only effect of a war commenced to maintain the independence of the Sultan, and to protect him against an authoritative interference of foreign Powers in the relations between him and his subjects, would have been to multiply by five the evil which he had previously resisted, and to give to all the Allies those very powers to resist which they took up arms to defend the Sultan. Therefore, a war begun to maintain the independence of the Sultan would have ended in utterly destroying that independence."—[3 Hansard, cxlii. 124-5.]

The course thus condemned by Lord Palmerston is the very course which the right hon. Gentleman wishes us now to take. He wants us to act in concert with Europe in the direction of coercion. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head; but it is true, nevertheless. I want to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to this, for it is the contention of Her Majesty's Government, and it was the contention of the Government of which Lord Palmerston was a Member, in 1856, that the fact of the Firman having been adverted to in the Treaty, and the issue of it having been recorded in the Treaty, would give to the Allied Powers that moral right of diplomatic interference and of remonstrance with the Sultan which, says Lord Palmerston—"I am perfectly convinced would be quite sufficient to accomplish the desired purpose." Who, I would ask, is responsible for anything that may be deficient in the way of power to do what hon. Members opposite want? It is surely the Government which was in power in 1856, and if the Government of that day held the opinion which the right hon. Gentleman who has brought forward these Resolutions now holds, they would have insisted on the insertion in the Treaty of a much stronger Article than that which was inserted.

The right hon. Gentleman further objects to the notion that the Treaty of 1856 was carefully revised in 1871, but he seems to forget that he was solely responsible for the last-named Treaty. He says further that the Treaty was passed in a hurry, and that England and Prussia, who were parties to it, had no time to think of it; at all events, that Prussia was so much engaged in the French war that she did not even take the trouble to answer Prince Gortchakoff's note. So far as Prussia or Germany—call it which you will—is concerned, I am quite sure the right hon. Gentleman's memory is at fault. He seems to forget that the Conference on which the Treaty was based was held in London at the express instance of Prussia, that it was Prussia which took the leading part in these negotiations from the beginning, and that at its close Her Majesty's Government, of which the right hon. Gentleman was then the Leader, thought fit to express thanks to Prussia for the part which she had taken in the business. I hope we shall hear no more of the statement in reference to the Treaty of 1871 that Germany had no time to consider it. The right hon. Gentleman has thought fit to say that the policy of Her Majesty's Government in reference to this matter has been ambiguous, but nothing could be wider from the truth. He has said that the policy laid down by Lord Salisbury at the Conference was right, but that that was not the policy of the Government, and he has chosen to refer to some words which I used in the Autumn, and to which I still adhere, as does also the Government. How does the case stand? If any hon. Member will look at the proceedings which took place before that Conference, he will see how far we deserve the charge of the right hon. Gentleman. He says that we put a stop to all the good that could have resulted from the Conference by telling Turkey that we would not enforce the decisions of the Conference by war. Let me remind him that the whole gist and basis of the Conference was that we would not interfere with the independence or integrity of Turkey. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that when Europe had gone into the Conference on these terms, she should have taken advantage of the position so gained, and then have turned round and said to the Turks—"If you don't agree to our terms we will go to war with you?" I say that if we had departed from that basis we should have been guilty of a gross breach of faith. The words I used in the Autumn, and to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded, are true, and will be substantiated in the documents now upon the Table of the House. What were the Instructions which were given to Lord Salisbury before he went to the Conference at Constantinople? In the Instructions given to Lord Salisbury before he left for Constantinople, it was laid down that—

"Pacification cannot be attained by Proclamations. Powers have a right to demand, in the interest of the peace of Europe that they shall examine for themselves the measures required for the reform of the administration of the disturbed Provinces, and that adequate security shall be provided for carrying those measures into operation."

And that security was eventually laid down in the proposition for an International Commission, and in the provisions as to the appointment of the Valis. When the right hon. Gentleman says that our policy has been ambiguous, I reply, that if ever a policy has been marked by two distinct landmarks, it is that of Her Majesty's Government. What are those two distinct landmarks—and don't put them upon Lord Salisbury, because they are the embodiments of the opinions of Her Majesty's Government, and are to be found in the Instructions given to him before he left this country. The first of these landmarks is as follows:—

"Her Majesty's Government cannot countenance the introduction into the Conference of proposals, however plausible or well-intentioned, which would bring foreign armies into Turkish territory in violation of the engagements by which the Guaranteeing Powers are solemnly bound."

[MR. GLADSTONE: Where is that to be found?] That is to be found in the Instructions which were settled before Lord Salisbury went abroad, and it is one in which I entirely agree. The next landmark is also one in which I entirely concur, and it is as follows:—

"It should be understood by the Porte that Great Britain is resolved not to sanction misgovernment and oppression, and that if the Porte by obstinacy or apathy opposes the efforts which are now making to place the Ottoman Empire on a more secure basis, the responsibility of the consequences which may ensue will rest solely with the Sultan and his advisers.—[Turkey, No. 2, 1877, pp. 3-6.]

It has been said by the right hon. Gentleman that the Government has sanctioned the maladministration and oppression going on in Turkey. Let us look to the facts. The Conference came to an end, and let us hear what were the last words which Lord Salisbury used on that occasion—not as speaking for himself alone, but as the mouthpiece of the Cabinet—

“It is my duty to free Her Majesty’s Government of all responsibility for what may happen, and I am therefore instructed to declare formally that Great Britain is resolved not to give her sanction either to maladministration or to oppression, and that if the Porte from obstinacy or inactivity, offers resistance to the efforts now being made to place the Ottoman Empire on a more sure basis, the responsibility of the consequences will rest solely on the Sultan and his advisers.”—[Ibid. p. 362.]

That was the policy of Her Majesty’s Government, and the question is whether they should have gone further or not? But after the Conference was brought to a conclusion Russia was still not at all satisfied. Russia had then massed her forces upon the frontiers of Turkey, and she determined to take further steps in the matter. In the Circular which Prince Gortchakoff sent throughout Europe he still felt how necessary it was to maintain, at all events, the appearance of European concert, and therefore he made in it a remarkable statement which I wish he had always kept in view and had acted up to—namely, that European concert should be preserved.

The right hon. Gentleman, in referring to the Protocol, seems to forget that Russia was not the assenting party to it, but was the originator of it. It was not a European—it was a Russian Protocol. Russia at that time stood in full armour upon the frontiers of Turkey, and under such circumstances disarmament by Turkey was impossible, because the attitude of Russia had excited not only the apprehension, but the fanaticism of the Mussulman population of Turkey. I believe that it was the attitude of Russia at that time that was the obstacle to the internal pacification and reform on the part of Turkey. In all these circumstances Her Majesty’s Government consented to sign the Protocol, not perhaps believing that it would effect much, but at all events, as it was there stated, in the interests of peace. What was the conduct of Turkey after that? Turkey was not asked to be a party to the Protocol, which was a document drawn by the Powers themselves, and in which they agreed to give her time to see what she could do in the way of reforming her Government, reserving to themselves the right, if she did nothing in that direction, of future interference. Well, Turkey protested against that document, claiming to be treated as an independent Power, and protesting against what she considered to be a humiliation of her as a Sovereign country. In doing that I think she was unwise; that she was blind—utterly blind—and foolish. She is now suffering for her folly, and I have not a word to say on her behalf. Yes; but still the Protocol had held out to her that Europe would allow her time to see whether her promises would be fulfilled; and yet, almost immediately after that Protocol had been signed, Russia throws it at her and holds it to her head as though it were a loaded pistol, and requires her at once to reply to it. Russia said there was no guarantee that reform would be carried into effect, that all chances were closed against conciliation, and that there was no alternative but coercion. I entirely deny that. Russia insinuated that she was doing a work on behalf of Europe. Now, Her Majesty’s Government felt bound to protest against that. I do not know what grounds Russia had to suppose that she was charged by Europe to carry out the objects of the Conference or the Protocol. I maintain that Her Majesty’s Government replied, not only with justice, but with dignity, to the letter which Russia sent. We said—

“Her Majesty’s Government cannot, therefore, admit, as is contended by Prince Gortchakoff, that the answer of the Porte removed all hope of deference on its part to the wishes and advice of Europe, and all security for the application of the suggested reforms. Nor are they of opinion that the terms of the Note necessarily precluded the possibility of the conclusion of peace with Montenegro or of the arrangement of mutual disarmament. Her Majesty’s Government still believe that with patience and moderation on both sides these objects might not improbably have been attained.”

Then we go on to say—

“But the course on which the Russian Government has entered involves graver and more serious considerations. It is in contravention of the stipulations of the Treaty of Paris of March 30th, 1856, by which Russia and the other signatory Powers engaged, each on its own part, to respect the independence and territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire. In the Conferences of London, 1871, at the close of which the above stipulation with others was again confirmed, the Russian Plenipotentiary, in common with those of the other Powers, signed a Declaration affirming it to be an ‘essential principle of the law of nations that no Power can liberate itself from the engagements of a Treaty nor modify the stipulations thereof unless with the consent of the contracting parties by means of an amicable arrangement."

I ask the House, I ask the country, whether Russia has performed her duties under that Treaty of 1871? Her Majesty's Government would willingly have refrained from making any observations on the subject, but as Prince Gortchakoff seems to assume, in a Declaration addressed to all the Powers of Europe, that Russia is acting in the interest of Great Britain and other Powers, they felt bound to state, and I feel bound to state openly here, in a manner equally firm and public, that the Russian Government is not acting in concert with the other Powers. If any Power has more than another prevented united European action, that Power is Russia. Russia and Turkey are at war—war in a part of Europe which is the most inflammable you can conceive—in that part of Europe where every Power has an interest, and I am sorry to say an almost antagonistic interest. Of that war we feel the effects in this our own country at the present moment in the rise in the price of bread. War having broken out, the landmarks of the policy of the British Government are as clear as they were before. They have nothing to do with the war. Great Britain has declared absolute and strict neutrality. What the result of the war may be God only knows, but all the efforts of the British Government must clearly be as far as possible to localize the war—to reduce its area to a minimum. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich have talked about British interests, and the hon. Member for Birmingham has challenged Her Majesty's Government to point out what are the British interests which can possibly be drawn into this war. The policy of Her Majesty's Government is one of strict neutrality between the parties. We warned them as long ago as May, 1876, that they had nothing to expect from us. We warned them at the Conference, and since there has been no loss of time in the issue of our declaration of neutrality. So far, therefore, as it is a Russian and a Turkish war, we have nothing to do with it. In the war between Russia and Turkey we are absolutely impartial.

Mr. Assheton Cross

There is the first clear landmark. Whether the war will produce the results which it is supposed will be produced is another matter. Although our efforts will be directed to prevent that war from spreading, it is impossible for anyone to say where it will stop. I am afraid that Russia, by the action she has taken, has assumed a most serious responsibility. Other nations may soon be drawn in—other interests may soon be involved. And there are interests that may be touched which technically it may be within the rights of belligerents to attack, but which practically are altogether outside and foreign to the objects and purposes of this unhappy war. There are English interests, there are European interests, there are Indian interests, there are world-wide interests which may be concerned. We do not want additional territory—we want nothing. We wish this war had not broken out. Batoum and other places have been spoken of, but there is the Suez Canal, in which not only England, but the world, is seriously concerned. Why the Suez Canal should be attacked by Russia in any shape I cannot imagine. Whether attacked by Russia or by Turkey, that is a question of not only English, but European interest. It is the road from the West to the East of the world. Take another place in which not simply England, but the world is interested. I mean Egypt. Alexandria is for practical purposes an English, a French—nay, a European town. No place can be of more commercial importance than Alexandria. Is Europe to allow Alexandria to be destroyed or Egypt to be occupied? Well, what am I to say about the Treaties as to the Straits of the Dardanelles and the possession of Constantinople? Is it necessary for carrying on the war between Russia and Turkey, and for the protection of the Christians in Turkey, that Constantinople should be either attacked, approached, or occupied? I say "No." These are questions which no country in Europe could regard with indifference; and when I mention them I hope they are so remote that they will not practically arise. But they are questions which must be considered by any British Government, and which any Ministry, even if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) himself were at its head, would not dare to neglect, or if it did, the country would very soon send it an answer which it could not mistake. And that is the second clear landmark. However, I hope, as I have said, these things are in so remote a future that we need not contemplate them. Let me quote the words which the Emperor Alexander used on the 2nd of November last to our Ambassador. His Majesty said—

“He had on several occasions given the most solemn assurances that he desired no conquest, that he aimed at no aggrandisement, and that he had not the smallest wish or intention to be possessed of Constantinople.”

Let us see that His Majesty keeps to his words. He continued—

“All that had been said or written about the will of Peter the Great and the aims of Catherine II. were illusions and phantoms: They never existed in reality; and he considered that the acquisition of Constantinople would be a misfortune for Russia. There was no question of it, nor had it ever been entertained by his late father, who gave proof of it in 1828, when his victorious army was within four days’ march of Constantinople.”

Our Ambassador further wrote that—

—[Turkey, No. 1, 1877, p. 643.]

If the Emperor keeps his word, thus solemnly pledged, British interests will not be concerned. But a victorious army is a difficult thing to deal with, and a country once aroused is not always so easily quieted. All I can say is, that, as far as Her Majesty’s Government are concerned, they sincerely trust that no action of Russia will ever require them to protect those interests which lie outside of this war; but that if those interests should be affected, of course it cannot be expected that either Europe or England will not interfere to protect them. I am sorry to have detained the House so long, but I must say one word before I sit down on the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman. I am bound to confess that when I read them the first time I could make neither head nor tail of them, and the debate during the early part of this evening showed that others shared my difficulty. Some have said that the first two Resolutions have nothing in them, and I caught from the right hon. Gentleman that he himself had very much that opinion, for he thought Her Majesty’s Government might accept them; and yet he said they were brought forward practically because he thinks the policy of the Government so entirely false and erroneous that he felt bound to protest against it. Now, I could quite understand a Resolution being moved by the right hon. Gentleman declaring that we are bound to interfere in consequence of what has gone on in Turkey and to join Russia in the present war. If that is what the right hon. Gentleman means, why in the name of goodness does he not say so? I have never yet seen an account of any one of the meetings held in the country at which that issue has been put straight before them. Do you mean war or do you not? That is the question. The right hon. Gentleman said we have used every possible expression we could use, that we have remonstrated and expostulated, and pressed and protested; and he suggested to us a blank form in which you could put in any word you want. The word that he wants us to use is war. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. If that is not it, what is it? I can tell you what it is. It is as clear as daylight. What he means is this—“If you will only say you will go to war if they don’t do these things, although you don’t mean to go to war; if you will only bark loud enough, though you don’t mean to bite, Turkey will give way.” Well, I call that conduct utterly unworthy of us. [Cheers.] Yes, you tried that policy on in the case of Denmark. I do not like the position of the boy who writes up “No Popery,” and then runs away. If you mean to go to war, say so. When that issue is put plainly before the country I know what the answer of the country will be. But the right hon. Gentleman goes on to say that what he wants is practical self-government and local liberty. He speaks of these things as he might of a cargo of rice or a bale of merchandize, that you could tumble out at once into the middle of Turkey. Why, practical self-government and local liberty are the growth of years. All we can do is to sow the seed of them; but depend upon it the fields in which that seed will not grow are fields which are ploughed up by war and watered with blood. The one result of war would be this, as was said in reference to Greece, there would be a generation of men missing, old men and boys alone would be left to till the soil. Now, let me ask in that case what is the good of these Resolutions? The whole sting of them is gone. The one thing on which the right hon. Gentleman comes before the country he has taken away from the judgment of the House, and he has left something which hon. Members below the Gangway opposite say is not worth debating. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) when he says—"Is that all you have to offer us after the speeches you have made? If you do feel bound to put something before the country, let us, at all events, decide that something. Don't bring that something before us and then wipe it off the slate." If you are displeased with our policy, turn us out; but first show us what policy you have to offer in place of ours. Do not imagine that the country will think of the hundred votes you may obtain in the division. They will only see that you have decided nothing, and that what you wished to carry into effect you have not had the courage to put before the House. Looking at the whole question and at the time which hon. Gentlemen opposite have chosen to bring it forward, I must say I think their object has been not so much to unite Europe, or to unite England, as to unite the Liberal Party. As the right hon. Gentleman seems to think the policy of the Government ambiguous, let me before I sit down once more state clearly what it has been and what it is. It has been that they will not in any way sanction oppression or tyranny in any part of the world where they have the power to interfere. It has been to preserve inviolate our Treaty engagements, and to set an example which, if followed by other nations, would materially add to the happiness of the world. It is, deeply as they regret the war, to maintain the strictest neutrality between the contending nations. It is, outside the necessities of this actual war, to maintain, as they ought to maintain, and as any British Government would maintain, those interests of England which ought to be maintained. They have no thought of fear; they have no thought of gain. Before the face of this House, of England, of Europe, of the world, they are conscious of the honesty of their own purpose. They are conscious of their own earnest desire for peace; they are conscious, if need be, of their strength. They have, I hope, the wisdom not to use that strength improperly, and wherever and whenever the opportunity may offer to stop this war, to heal these wretched divisions, to improve the condition of these Christian populations in a way which will really improve them—and that way, in my opinion, is not by war—to localize, to minimize, or to wipe away the effects of this war, there the Government will give their services.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 —(Mr. Childers.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER apprehended there could be no two opinions on the point that it would be necessary to adjourn the debate. The only question was as to the day for resuming it. [Cries of "To-morrow."] He hoped it would be the pleasure of the House to continue the debate to-morrow. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. J. Holms) had an important Motion, which stood first on the Paper for to-day, and the second was a Motion of the right hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loghlen). He hoped they would waive their rights with regard to these Motions, in order to allow the present debate to be resumed.

MR. J. HOLMS said, that under ordinary circumstances he should not for a moment have hesitated to give way, but a section of the House to which he belonged believed that it was an urgent necessity that the House and the Government should know more fully what the opinion of the country was, and that an Adjournment of the Debate until Thursday would be of essential service for that purpose. The right hon. Member for Greenwich had changed his Resolutions, though he (Mr. Holms) did not believe he had changed his course on this question, and the country should have an opportunity of considering the matter before the resumption of the debate. He felt it, therefore, his duty not to accede to the appeal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he very much regretted the position which his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney had taken up. It was undoubtedly necessary from time to time, when important questions such as this arose, that the House should seek to make itself aware of the opinion of the country. But the Resolutions of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) had been on the Table of the House and before the country for some time, and the country had had an opportunity of expressing its opinion on them. That opinion was known to hon. Members who represented the constituencies. Now, he did not think it would conduce to the dignity of their deliberations if they were deliberately to postpone a discussion such as this in order that they might receive instructions from their constituencies. As he had said, the general scope, nature, and tendency of the Resolutions of his right hon. Friend were already known to the country, and it could not be necessary that the constituencies should have an opportunity of expressing their opinion as to any changes which had that night been made in the Resolutions. It would be much to be regretted, therefore, if his hon. Friend and those who had Notices on the Paper refused to give to-morrow for the continuation of the debate. He might remind his hon. Friend that it was not probable, even if to-morrow was devoted to the discussion, that the debate would be finished that night. They would probably be in the position of having to appeal to Her Majesty's Government to give another day, and he could scarcely consider it fair, in the present position of public Business, that they should call on the Government to sacrifice the time at their disposal if hon. Members on that side of the House were not prepared to make some sacrifices also.

LORD ESLINGTON said, the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition had stated that the Resolutions had been on the Table of the House for several days, but how many of them he (Lord Eslington) wished to know now remained? The country had supported the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich on many occasions; but they had been deceived on that occasion, because the Resolutions to which they had given their support had been withdrawn. If the debate were adjourned what were they to discuss? There was one Resolution, which was a truism, on which all probably were agreed; and there was another to discuss, the terms of which were to be altered, and until to-morrow the House would not know what they were. It was a most unsatisfactory position for the House to be placed in. He wished very much to know what was the question before the House? Great national interests were to be sacrificed in order to indulge a Party purpose, and he regretted it.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, as he had a Motion for to-morrow evening he would willingly withdraw it if the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) would withdraw his Motion, but if his hon. Friend would not take that course, he should retain his Motion.

MR. RYLANDS said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had not withdrawn the substantial part of his Resolutions. It was desirable that time should be given in order that the House might hear a few more echoes from the country on this great question.

MR. BIRLEY said, they could come to a decision without outside pressure. There were many reasons why the debate ought to be brought to a speedy conclusion. He had not much respect for public opinion as expressed in the papers during the last week, which had no doubt been got up to order.

CAPTAIN NOLAN expressed a hope that if the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) gave way, that the Government would give him a day for the discussion of his Motion relative to the Army.

MR. ANDERSON said, as hon. Members opposite had alleged that the agitation of the last few days had been got up to order, it was desirable that they should wait and see whether the agitation of the next few days was got up to order also. This was the most important debate of the Session. The greatest interest was felt in the country upon the question; and it was most desirable that the country should have the opportunity of considering the alterations which had been proposed in the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman before the debate was resumed. He therefore urged his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney not to give way. The debate should not be resumed so early as to-morrow.

MR. E. JENKINS put it to the Government, whether it was worth while to resume the debate to-morrow, when it was well known it could not be concluded before Thursday?

MR. MONK thought the fact that the debate was not likely to conclude to-morrow was an unanswerable argument for resuming it to-morrow. If it was not resumed to-morrow, the debate would not be concluded on Thursday. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) would defer to what seemed to be the very general desire of the House.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY protested against extending the time for resuming the debate over to-morrow, merely to get up an extraneous expression of opinion, whether sham or otherwise. It should be remembered that the Business of the House had to be proceeded with, and that that Business was the Business of the country. The Government would, therefore, press the resumption of the debate to-morrow. If it did not go on, the Government would not be prepared to give Thursday. If it went on to-morrow, and was not finished, the Government would give Thursday. But the Government felt strongly that, having given up Monday, they had a right to call on private Members to give up Tuesday. Therefore, his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer would to-morrow move that Notices of Motion be postponed till after the Order of the Day for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Eastern Question.

MR. J. HOLMS explained that what he had said was not solely with regard to his own particular Motion. He believed he was giving expression to the general opinion on that side of the House. Under all the circumstances, however, he would yield to what he understood to be the general wish of the House, and waive his claim for precedence with his Motion. He hoped, however, that the Secretary for War would endeavour to find an early day for discussing the Army Estimates.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY assured the hon. Member that he would do all in his power to secure the earliest opportunity for the proposed discussion.

(Mr. Raikes, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 3rd May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. BIGGAR said, that, as the hour was late, he would move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. A. H. BROWN objected to the Motion.

MR. PARNELL thought they should know how late they were expected to stay discussing that Bill. There were several Amendments on the Paper, and it was not possible to foresee how long the discussion would continue. If there was any idea of going on to half-past 1 or 2 o'clock, he would rather at once protest now than make the stand later.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER pointed out that, as he had promised to accept the Amendment on the Paper of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Frederick Cavendish), and was willing to accept that of the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), which involved only a small amount of revenue, there was not likely to be any difference of opinion except on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wenlock (Mr. A. H. Brown). He hoped, therefore, the hon. Member would not press his Motion to report Progress.

MR. COURTNEY said, it was not his intention to move his Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clauses 8 to 12, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 13 (Payment into Exchequer of surplus interest from Post Office Savings Banks Fund).

On the Motion of Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH, Amendment made in page 6, line 7, after "expenses," by inserting—

"Including a sum to be determined by the Treasury to provide against depreciation in the value of the securities."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, thinking that the remainder of the Amendments on the Paper required a fuller discussion than they were likely to receive, would move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—
(Sir Joseph M'Kenna.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 8; Noes 167: Majority 159.—(Div. List, No. 116.)

MR. A. H. BROWN moved in page 8, after Clause 9, to move the following Clause:—

(Extension of exemption of s. 11, 32 and 33 Vic. c. 14.)

"The exemption enacted by the eleventh section of the thirty-second and thirty-third Victoria, chapter fourteen, shall be extended to any tenement or part of a tenement occupied as offices or counting-houses for the purpose of exercising or carrying on any profession, vocation, business, or calling, by which such person or persons shall seek a livelihood or profit within the meaning of the Act of the fifth year of the reign of George the Fourth, chapter forty-four, section four."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was sorry he could not accept the Amendment, on account of the sacrifice of revenue it would involve and the increased difficulties to which it would give rise.

MR. HERSCHELL strongly supported the proposed clause.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD observed that not one farthing of the old revenue would be lost by the adoption of the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

SOLICITORS EXAMINATION, &c. BILL.

(No. 52.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD ABERDARE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to regulate the admission of Solicitors of the Supreme Court of Judicature of England. By former statutes, and by the Acts of 1873 and 1875, persons applying to be admitted as Solicitors were required to pass examinations known as the preliminary, the intermediate, and the final examinations; and the power of making regulations for the conduct of those examinations and of appointing the examiners, was vested in certain of the Judges of the High Court of Justice: the Bill proposed to transfer those powers to the Incorporated Law Society, and make other amendments in the law relating to Solicitors. No person was to be admitted as a Solicitor without a certificate that he had passed the three examinations before stated; these examinations were to be held under the management of the Incorporated Law Society, who were to make all necessary regulations as to time and place and subjects of examination, to appoint the examiners, and arrange their remuneration by fees or otherwise. The fees payable in respect of their examinations were to be settled by the chiefs of the Divisions of the High Court of Justice, and were to be applied to the necessary expenses of these examinations and to other points of legal education. In case of the refusal of a certificate an appeal was given to the Master of the Rolls. Members who had taken University degrees, or had passed certain academical examinations, and utter barristers, who desired to transfer themselves to the other branch of the profession, were excused the preliminary examination. Barristers of five years' standing were exempted from the intermediate examination also, and could be admitted Solicitors on passing the final examination.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Aberdare.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought the provisions of the Bill would be extremely useful, and as the measure had the approbation of the Judges, he agreed to the Motion for the second reading.

LORD HATHERLEY also expressed his approval of the measure, and said that the Incorporated Law Society deserved the highest credit for what it had done in the cause of legal education.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

SOUTH AFRICA BILL—(No. 40.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clauses 1 to 12, inclusive, agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

Clause 13 (Power to Her Majesty to authorize Governor General to appoint deputies.)

THE EARL OF BELMORE asked his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) to explain under what sort of circumstances the power which was proposed to be given by the clause to the Governor General to appoint a deputy—he himself being present within the limits of the confederation—would be exercised?

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that the Governor General might be absent in a distant part of the confederation, in the fulfilment of his duties as High Commissioner, and it might be convenient to leave some one with powers to administer the Government at head-quarters. This had already been done during Sir Henry Barkly's administration.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 51 (Creation of Consolidated Revenue Fund.)

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that this clause provided for the raising of the general revenue and its appropriation. He should have expected to find here a provision for its issue under the warrant of the Governor General. There, however, was no such provision in the Bill, and he thought it might either have been accidentally omitted, or it might be provided for in some other way of which he was not aware. He thought he was right in calling his noble Friend's attention to the matter which was one of some importance, and one which had led to a correspondence, when he himself was a Colonial Governor, between the noble Earl the Leader of the Party opposite (Earl Granville) and himself.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON was afraid he could not on the moment give a satisfactory answer. He would look into the matter, and if there was anything to state, state it on Report.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 67 (Laws respecting Natives to be reserved.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, that the object of this measure, no doubt, was the establishment of representative and responsible government in South Africa, and he could but hope that in granting constitutional powers to a society in such a peculiar condition, the scheme would not prove unworkable. All parties would unquestionably desire to treat the rising State with every indulgence; but the colonists must be made to understand that with the grant of representative Government, their own Executive and Legislature would be held responsible for the good government of the Natives and the safety of the frontier. He did not object to the policy of the clause; but it must be clearly understood that constitutional Government carried with it its responsibilities.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, his noble Friend had touched a most important and difficult question. No doubt, the difficulty of carrying out the principle laid down by the noble Lord in Colonies where there was a large Native population was very great, and in South Africa particularly so. It was for this reason that all laws relating to the Natives or to Native affairs were to be reserved by the Governor General for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure. Therefore, Her Majesty's Government took upon themselves the responsibility to the Imperial Parliament for any legislation of the Colonial Legislature which might affect the Natives. He confessed he had great anxiety with respect to this measure: but, taking into account the peculiar difficulties attending these Colonies, he was satisfied that the scheme of the Government was the best that could be devised.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL pointed out that the Bill threw the primary responsibility of legislation as affected the Natives on the Colonial Government, and that the responsibility of the Home Government was restricted to the power of veto in such cases as were reserved by the Governor General.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the clause reserved to the Home Government a controlling power over Colonial legislation in respect of the Native population. The Colonial Government had hitherto shown great prudence in regard to the disturbance, which had broken out on the frontier, and this afforded evidence that they might be trusted with larger powers. Moreover, it was much safer to entrust such powers to a confederated Legislature than to a small Legislative Council. In the former there was a wider public opinion, and consequently a larger policy; and this was the best safeguard against abuse.

Clause agreed to.

Further Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 67.)

THE EASTERN QUESTION—DESPATCH OF 1st MAY, 1877.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND rose to call the attention of the House to the Earl of Derby's despatch to Lord Augustus Loftus of 1st May, 1877. The noble

Duke said, he must throw himself upon their Lordships' indulgence while he made a few observations on the subject he was about to bring under their notice; and he had this claim to their indulgence, that he could assure their Lordships that he would rather that the subject had been brought under their notice by some one else—and it was only because no other noble Lord had shown an intention of bringing it under consideration, and because he felt that the matter was at present one of vital importance, that he had ventured to introduce it. He thought the despatch was couched in language of a much stronger description than the noble Lord and the Government could have intended to use; and his fear was that it would be read by other countries, and more particularly by Turkey, as an abrogation of the Declaration of Neutrality. It was most important this country, acting in concert with the other Powers of Europe, should maintain a strict and bond fide neutrality. He perceived in that morning's papers indications of the ill effects that had already arisen from his noble Friend's despatch; he saw that at St. Petersburg, at Berlin, and at Paris it had caused much consternation; and he had brought the matter forward in the hope that his noble Friend the Secretary of State might be able to state what would calm and soothe the alarm that now prevailed on the Continent. He hoped nothing would fall from himself that would in any way embarrass Her Majesty's Government. He felt deeply grateful to his noble Friend and to the Government for their continuous, assiduous, and unremitting exertions to maintain the peace of Europe. Unfortunately those exertions, however strenuous, had failed. In the despatch to which his Notice referred, he perceived that his noble Friend particularly inveighed against Russia for having broken the Treaty of 1856; but his noble Friend himself the other day in this House declared that no Treaty was irrevocable. Now, he (the Duke of Rutland) thought that he could show their Lordships that Russia had not broken that Treaty. After the outbreak of the Servian War there were differences of opinion between several of the Powers; an attempt was made by diplomacy to arrange these difficulties and differences; a Conference was proposed, but did not succeed in arranging them; a Protocol was proposed, and again that failed of its intended object; and why did they all fail? He asked their Lordships whether Russia did not go to the utmost extent she could in meeting the demands of his noble Friend and of the other Powers of Europe? She gave way on almost every point in controversy; whether it was the occupation of Bulgaria, or the granting of administrative autonomy to European Provinces—in every way Russia did what she could to meet his noble Friend. But Turkey refused to give way; she would do nothing; she would listen to nothing; she maintained that attitude at the Conference, and in that spirit she rejected the Protocol. After the Powers of Europe had been brought together and endeavoured to settle these matters by peaceful means, and after their endeavours in common had failed, he thought Russia was justified in saying she had fulfilled her obligations under the Treaty of Paris, and she was called upon to interfere in a more active way. A great deal had been said about the independence of Turkey; but the independence of Turkey was a thing of the past. Did anyone mean to say that, after the blood and treasure we expended in the Crimean War—after 20 years of misgovernment in Turkey, increasing every year and every month, and culminating in the Bulgarian atrocities—we had no right to interfere in the concerns of Turkey? The noble Lord himself had interfered. What could be more direct interference than writing such a despatch as the noble Lord wrote on the 21st of September, in which he said—

“Your Excellency will, in the name of the Queen and Her Majesty’s Government, call for reparation and justice, and urge that the rebuilding of the houses and churches should be begun at once, and necessary assistance given for the restoration of the woollen and other industries, as well as provision made for the relief of those who have been reduced to poverty; and, above all, you will point out that it is a matter of absolute necessity that the eighty women should be found and restored to their families.”

Could anyone who read that despatch conceive of its being sent to an independent Power? But further, the noble Marquess, whom he did not see in his place (the Marquess of Salisbury), in his despatch to the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary, dated Pera, the 4th of January last, said—

“The independence of the Ottoman Porte is a phrase which is, of course, capable of different interpretations. At the present time it must be interpreted so as to be consistent with the conjoint military and diplomatic action taken in recent years by the Powers who signed the Treaty of Paris. If the Porte had been independent in the sense in which the Guaranteeing Powers are independent, it would not have stood in need of a guarantee. The military sacrifices made by the two Western Powers twenty years ago to save it from destruction, and the Conference which is now being held to avert an analogous danger, would have been an unnecessary interference if Turkey had been a Power which did not depend on the protection of others for its existence.”—

He asked their Lordships whether, after reading the despatch, it was not something beyond all human belief that people could still talk of the independence of Turkey? There was another thing in these debates on the Eastern Question which had struck him as curious, and that was the amount of blame that had been cast upon the late Prime Minister, lately the leader of the Liberal Party for his participation in what was called the Autumn Crusade. The Government of this country must always be anxious to know what the real feelings of the people were on this or any other subject; and if their Lordships doubted what the feeling was their doubt might be removed by a despatch of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary, containing language which reflected the greatest honour upon him. On the 5th of September, 1876, the noble Lord wrote—

“It is my duty to inform you that any sympathy which was previously felt here towards that country has been completely destroyed by the recent lamentable occurrences in Bulgaria; the amount of outrages and excesses committed by the Turkish troops upon an unhappy, and for the most part unresisting population, has raised an universal feeling of indignation in all classes of English society, and to such a pitch has this risen, that in the extreme case of Russia declaring war against Turkey, Her Majesty’s Government would find it practically impossible to interfere in the defence of the Ottoman Empire.”

Well, how was that feeling discovered? Why, through the efforts of Mr. Gladstone. His noble Friend the noble Duke seemed to admit that he was correct.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON: I beg your pardon—I do not.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND: Did the noble Duke deny it? Why, last night, in “another place,” Mr. Cross said he perfectly agreed in all that had been said throughout the country in reference to the atrocities committed in Turkey; and, therefore, he contended that the Government were indebted to Mr. Gladstone for the knowledge of the real feeling of the country in this matter. He might be told that these things had passed, and that it was perfectly useless to ask these questions now, and that he was merely wasting their Lordships’ time; but he thought not, if they could only learn a lesson from what had taken place and apply it for guidance in their future conduct. He was one of those who were of opinion that, if the Government could have conscientiously signed the Berlin Memorandum, peace would have been secured; but, unfortunately, on that occasion they separated themselves from the rest of Europe. He had an earnest and strong conviction that his noble Friend was unable to sign it; but the consequence had been that we had lost the opportunity of joining with the other Powers in securing the peace of Europe. His fear was that at present they were again on the verge of a similar catastrophe. He would ask his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) whether any other Power in Europe had written such a despatch to Russia as that on which he had been commenting? He would ask him, further, whether the despatch of the 1st of May was submitted to the other Governments of Europe, and, if so, whether they approved it? It was very important that they should not be agitated at the present moment. He was sure that they were all anxious to localize the war and, if possible, to procure peace; but he felt confident the only way to do so was for the Powers of Europe to hold together and maintain a strict neutrality. He did not desire to detain their Lordships, but he could not sit down without referring to the words which the Emperor of Russia used to our Ambassador on the 2nd of November last. Mr. Cross read the despatch in “another place” last night, and perhaps he was wrong in repeating it now; but he felt it was so important at the present moment that the words of the Emperor of Russia should be known to every man, woman, and child in this country and in all Europe that, at the risk of wearying their Lordships, he would read an extract from it again. Lord Augustus Loftus, in a despatch dated November 2, 1876, wrote—

“His Majesty pledged his sacred word of honour in the most earnest and solemn manner that he had no intention of acquiring Constantinople, and that, if necessity should oblige him to occupy a portion of Bulgaria, it would only be provisionally, and until peace and the safety of the Christian population were secured. . . . His Majesty could not understand, when both countries had a common object—namely, the maintenance of peace and the amelioration of the condition of the Christians—and when he had given every proof that he had no desire for conquest or aggrandisement, why there should not be a perfect understanding between England and Russia—an understanding based on a policy of peace, which would be equally beneficial to their mutual interest and to those of Europe at large. ‘Intentions,’ said his Majesty, ‘are attributed to Russia of a future conquest of India and of the possession of Constantinople. Can anything be more absurd? With regard to the former it is a perfect impossibility; and as regards the latter I repeat again the most solemn assurances that I entertain neither the wish nor the intention.’ His Majesty deeply deplored the distrust of his policy which was manifested in England, and the evil effects it produced, and he earnestly requested me to do my utmost to dispel this cloud of suspicion and distrust of Russia, and charged me to convey to Her Majesty’s Government the solemn assurances he had repeated to me.”—[Turkey, No. 1 (1877) p. 643.]

No language could be stronger than this. There was the word of honour of the Emperor of Russia given to Her Majesty’s Government that he had no desire to acquire Constantinople, and that he did not seek to approach India. He (the Duke of Rutland) could not believe that anyone claiming the name of a gentleman, much more that of an Emperor, could falsify his word of honour given in such language. It seemed perfectly impossible. But suppose it were not so—suppose that Russia did wish or attempt to take Constantinople, to stop the Suez Canal, and seize on Egypt—suppose all these impossibilities, what better security could there be against them than to unite with the rest of Europe in resisting such schemes of aggrandizement? If that time should ever arrive, he felt confident there was no man in England in whom the country could repose greater confidence than in his noble Friend the noble Earl. The interests of England and her honour would be safe in his hands.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, the noble Duke has concluded with a remark so personally complimentary to myself that I almost shrink from commenting, as I otherwise should have been inclined to do, on some points of the speech he has just made. My noble Friend says the interests and honour of the country are perfectly safe in my hands; but if I am to put the plain and ordinary meaning on the remarks which he has just made, he must believe that the course we have pursued in this matter is both unwise and unsafe; and if that is the case, I should be surprised that my noble Friend felt any confidence for the future, which was so little justified by the past. On previous occasions when I have heard my noble Friend speak in this House he has not often indulged in flights of imagination; but I think my noble Friend was for once imaginative when he said, in the opening sentences of his speech, that he would not have thought of bringing this subject before your Lordships if anyone else had appeared willing to do so. Now, my Lords, the despatch on which he has commented was placed in the hands of the public yesterday morning—the same afternoon my noble Friend placed his Notice on the Paper:—and I do not well understand how he could contrive to ascertain in so short a time that he was the only person likely to bring forward the subject. But that is not all. My noble Friend is imaginative again when he speaks of the consternation produced by the appearance of the despatch in the various European capitals. I should like very much to know how he has found that out. I think I have at least as many opportunities of knowing what takes place in the various capitals of Europe as my noble Friend can have; and although it is rather too early, when a Paper has only been before the world for 48 hours, to learn the effect it has produced, I certainly am not aware that it has created the feeling of consternation which my noble Friend has attributed to it.

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND: I have seen the telegraphic despatches on the subject in the morning papers.

The Duke of Rutland

THE EARL OF DERBY: What morning papers?

THE DUKE OF RUTLAND: In The Daily News.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I give my noble Friend equal credit for sincerity and simplicity; but if he has taken his estimate of the policy of the Government from the telegraphic information of The Daily News, I am not surprised that his conclusions have been such as he has described. But I must go on to the other points my noble Friend has touched. He puts to me a question which I think, under the circumstances, is one of a rather singular character. He wants to know whether, before the despatch referred to was published, it was submitted to the judgment of the other Powers. Was such a question, my Lords, ever asked before? Has it ever before been expected that a British Minister, writing an important despatch, expressing the opinion of his Government on the step which another Government has taken, should abstain from expressing that opinion until he had consulted with the other Powers of Europe, and made quite sure that no one would disagree with it? My Lords, I need not say that such a course would be altogether unreasonable. But my noble Friend goes back on matters of old date. He went back to the time of the Berlin Memorandum, and said if we had only signed that Memorandum there would have been no disturbance of the European peace. I have answered questions on that subject again and again within the last few weeks, and I shall only revert to the matter now to say that, if we had done as my noble Friend says we ought to have done, we should have been involved in what I am sure neither House of Parliament would desire—a war against Turkey in conjunction with Russia. I will not discuss that other point which my noble Friend the noble Duke introduced—namely, the debt of gratitude which we owe to the distinguished ex-Prime Minister, who was lately the Leader of the Liberal Party. My noble Friend thinks the Government ought to feel grateful to Mr. Gladstone for the language which he used and the course which he pursued. Well, if it was my habit or my wish to take a purely Party view of things, I should sympathize with my noble

Friend; I think that, in a party point of view, Mr. Gladstone has rendered great service to the Government: but if I had been a Member of the Liberal Party I should not be at all grateful to that distinguished person for the services he had rendered to them. My noble Friend went on to the question of the independence of Turkey, and said it was all nonsense to speak of Turkey as an independent State. I own I do not see what that has to do with the present state of affairs. It was a very fair question to discuss when the matter before us was to what extent we were entitled to interfere in the internal affairs of Turkey; but when that is all past and gone, it is merely raising a retrospective and historical question which it would serve no good purpose to discuss. As to any charge of inconsistency in talking on the one hand of the independence of Turkey and on the other hand writing a despatch which dealt with the internal affairs of that country, I may point out that at the time that despatch of the 21st September was written we were in a peculiar position with regard to the Turkish Empire; the Powers were engaged in the work of mediation, and we, among others, were trying to bring about a settlement of the controversy. It was perfectly reasonable, therefore, and not at all inconsistent with the independence of that country that we should interfere when acts were committed tending to make effective mediation impossible, and say—"We can have no more to do with you if these acts continue; we can take up your case no longer if you do not put a stop to them." Then my noble Friend quoted the words of the Emperor of Russia to Lord Augustus Loftus, which have been for some time before the public of this country and of Europe. I do not quarrel with my noble Friend for referring to that declaration if he thought it appropriate and important; but I may observe that at the time when that declaration was made Russian armies were stationed on the frontiers of Turkey; a war loan had been issued, and mobilization had taken place; and I may also point out that from the same high and distinguished authority there was another declaration made—I mean that speech at Moscow, which, if I chose to argue the point, I might refer to with as much propriety and as much effect as that with which my noble Friend has referred to the conversation with Lord Augustus Loftus. I think my noble Friend was guilty of an argumentative fallacy when he said that the position we held in the despatch to which he referred would be considered inconsistent with our professions of entire neutrality. Now, I do not see what the two things have to do with one another. Does it follow that because we mean to be neutral in a war—does it follow because considerations of policy or the interests of our own country withhold us from taking any part in a quarrel going on between other Powers—that we are therefore bound to abstain from giving any expression of opinion on the subject? That has never been the course in this country, and if we had pursued it on this occasion we certainly should not have escaped criticism more severe and more just than that which has been addressed to us. As regards foreign Powers, I agree as to the danger of hasty language; but if there is one thing more than another which is likely to lead to hasty and ill-considered and, therefore, possibly injudicious and dangerous words on the part of those who represent either the present, or any other Government, it is that they should be called upon night after night, with no definite issue before the House, to express opinions which necessarily go forth to all Europe, upon the most delicate and difficult questions.

LORD WAVENEY was understood to say that public feeling had not in the least changed since the Conference at St. James's Hall, and to refer to the meeting on Monday evening showing the interest taken by the public in this question.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not think it would be convenient to go into a debate on the Eastern Question at this moment; but I should be reluctant that this discussion should close without making a few observations on what has passed. I certainly cannot concur in the censure of the noble Earl the Secretary of State on the noble Duke for having brought this question forward. On the contrary, I think it exceedingly valuable that the noble Duke should have shown the moral courage to speak in opposition to the feeling of those around him, and give expression to his honest and conscientious convictions on the subject which he brought before the House. The noble Earl found fault with the noble Duke for having gone back to the Berlin Memorandum. My Lords, I can quite conceive that Her Majesty's Government are anxious to throw a veil over the past; but I think it most natural that the noble Duke, having spoken for the first time in the House on the Eastern Question, should have referred to one of the most remarkable incidents in these negotiations. I entirely agree with the noble Duke that the act by which we separated ourselves from Europe and the mode in which the Memorandum was rejected were most unfortunate circumstances, and the misfortune has been aggravated by the subsequent boastings of Her Majesty's Government and their supporters that a most material check was thus given to the three Emperors. I should like to know what the check which broke up the concert of Europe at the time has effected? The noble Earl asked the noble Duke where he got his information as to the effect which the despatch to which he referred produced in foreign countries; and when the noble Duke said it was from the Correspondent of The Daily News there was a general laugh on the other side, as if the question had been disposed of. But I must remind your Lordships that something of the same kind happened last year. Certain things were conveyed to the people of this country by the Correspondent of The Daily News. Her Majesty's Government and the Prime Minister threw the greatest doubt on the information given them, but a long time afterwards, by an inquiry made by their orders, they did obtain information which, so far from justifying the sneers which they had indulged in at the information received from the Correspondent of The Daily News, entirely corroborated it. So that the fact of such a statement as that to which the noble Duke referred appearing in The Daily News does not seem to be conclusive as to its falsehood. Objection was made by the noble Earl to the noble Duke's reference to the despatch demanding, in an imperious tone, redress for the outrages committed by the Turkish Government. I am not going to enter into the dispute as to how much confidence the noble Duke ought to repose in the noble Earl. I leave them to settle that among themselves. But from what I know of my noble Friend's disposition I am sure that he is as little inclined as anyone can be to manufacture despatches for home consumption, and which are not intended to be of any use in the transaction of public affairs—but when your Lordships read these despatches—one addressed to the Turkish Government, the other addressed in a scolding tone to the Russian Government, and compared them with the Proclamation of strict neutrality between the two countries—they certainly do raise the impression that they were intended rather to create a favourable impression at home as to the foreign policy of the Government than to secure the objects at which they professedly aim. I again say that I acknowledge with thankfulness the action of the noble Duke in bringing the matter before your Lordships.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I only rise to say that, considering the gratitude of the noble Earl (Earl Granville) to the noble Duke, your Lordships might have justly expected that the noble Earl himself would have expressed some opinion upon the despatch. But the noble Earl has risen and has sat down again, and has not said a single word on the subject of the despatch, except that it was not intended for Russia, but for home consumption.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had described the despatch to Lord Augustus Loftus as one of a scolding character, and had added that although the noble Earl was incapable of manufacturing despatches for home consumption, a comparison of these two despatches might lead to the inference that they were intended to produce a favourable impression at home as to the policy of the Government, rather than a beneficial effect on the course of events abroad.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I did not so understand the noble Earl. I wish to point out that so far from the despatch being volunteered on the part of the Government, it was a despatch which was absolutely called for by the communication which was addressed by Prince Gortchakoff to Her Majesty's Government. That was a communication which upon the face of it stated that the Emperor of Russia in what he was doing was acting in response to the sentiments and the interests of Europe. If Her Majesty's Government had the opinion that that was a just statement, then of course they were entirely in the wrong in responding to the despatch; but, on the other hand, if the statement was one which the Government of this country could not accept, then I believe it was their bounden duty to place upon record in a manner which could not be mistaken the opinion which conscientiously they entertained of the step taken by His Imperial Majesty. I believe that the people of this country agree in the statements which are made by Her Majesty's Government in the despatch of my noble Friend; and I must say I heard with some amazement and deep regret the suggestion made by the noble Duke that the Government of this country, in expressing their opinion, called for after the circumstances I have described, ought to have submitted their opinion to the other Courts of Europe before expressing it.

QUESTIONS.

QUESTIONS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Why the Petition presented to the Right honourable Sir John Somerset Pakington (now Lord Hampton) about the 26th of November 1866 by the Right honourable Colonel John Wilson Patten (now Lord Winmarleigh), of Mr. John Clare, the inventor and patentee of the metal shipbuilding of the State Navy, and the plaintiff in "Clare v. The Queen," has not been acted upon, though repeated applications have been made to the Admiralty; and, whether he has any objection to lay the said Document, and Lord Winmarleigh's Note that accompanied it, upon the Table of the House?

MR. A. F. EGERTON, in reply, said, that the case of Mr. Clare had been carefully considered by successive Boards of Admiralty. Mr. Clare had also endeavoured to enforce his claims in the Courts of Law. Under those circumstances, he was not prepared to lay on the Table of the House the Petition presented to the Admiralty by Mr. Clare, because it could not be found. Besides that, it was not desirable to reopen a matter that had already been decided upon.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he would state why he withheld from Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, after having written of Mr. John Clare's claims in the terms of the following note,—

"Eccle Riggs, Broughton in Furness,
"Novr. 6, 1872.

"Dear Sir,

"The Memorial you send states many facts which are not within my knowledge, but I do think that, as stated in paragraph nineteen, you have contributed to the present system of construction of vessels of war, and I wish that some compensation could be granted to you whatever may have been your strict legal rights.

"R. Asheton Cross.

the Petition of Mr. John Clare, the inventor and patentee of the metal shipbuilding of the State Navy, and plaintiff in "Clare v. The Queen," specially addressed "To Her Most Gracious Majesty Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland," sent into him at the Home Office 3rd March 1874, as the official medium between Sovereign and subject; and, why he placed the case of Mr. Clare before the Law Officers, Sir Richard Baggallay and Sir John Holker, when his case and claims on the Admiralty were solely scientific and mechanical, and not legal questions?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that Sir George Grey, when Secretary of State for the Home Department, had considered Mr. Clare's case, and answered a Question similar to that put to him by the hon. Member. He had himself already made a statement to the House on the subject, and it was not his intention to repeat it. He might say that he had been persecuted by the infliction of letters on this subject, greater than had befallen any other Member of the Government or of that House. When he took office he referred the matter to the Law Officers of the Crown, to see if any point favourable to Mr. Clare had been overlooked. Their answer was to the same effect as those given by the Law Officers of the previous Government, and he hoped he should hear no more on this subject.

ARMY—TROOPS FOR SERVICE ABROAD. QUESTION.

MR. HAYTER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the fact, as stated in the "Times" of May 5th, that a special Roster has been formed of troops for immediate departure for service abroad, including a Brigade of Guards, seven Regiments of Cavalry, four Brigades of Artillery, and forty Battalions of Infantry?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I have to inform him that no special Roster has been formed of troops for departure for service abroad; the ordinary Roster only has been formed as for the usual number of troops.

THE JESUITS—10 GEO. IV. QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY, who had placed on the Paper a Question with respect to the Jesuits in England, said, he would not trouble the House by reading it, but would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to reply to it as it stood on the Notice Paper.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think I must trouble the House by reading the Question of the hon. Member. It is as follows:—

"To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, that 'circumstances might render it expedient to put in force the existing Laws prohibiting the residence in this Country of Members of the Society of Jesus, as defined in the Act of 10 Geo. IV.; whether the present position of European affairs may not be regarded as demanding that step, having regard to the way that the Papal authorities are actively engaged in exciting public opinion against Russia as the head of the Greek Church, and to the increase in number, influence, and activity of the Jesuits, the recognized agents of the Vatican in this Country; and, whether, in the event of not enforcing the existing Laws, some other and what means will be taken for protecting the Executive Departments of the Government and the public interest generally, from the secret operations of this dangerous organization.'"

The hon. Gentleman puts it more pithily to me—what I mean to do in reference to the Society of Jesus. Well, as a matter of fact, I know very much less about the proceedings of that Society than does the hon. Member, and the chief information I have received as to the members of that Society came from the hon. Member himself. But, with regard to the first part of the Question, I may say I am not aware that the Papal authorities are more actively engaged in exciting public opinion in this country than a good many other people are. Exciting public opinion, I have been told on high authority, is a very proper thing to do; but I am quite sure that if anything were being done which was injurious or unfriendly to our Ally, the Emperor of Russia, proper representations would be made to Her Majesty's Government by His Majesty's Ambassador on the subject, and that those representations would receive prompt attention. With regard to the other part of the Question, as to the dangers which are threatened to the Executive Departments of the Government, "from the secret operations of this dangerous organization," I undoubtedly feel, as we all feel, much alarmed at this suggestion. What I would propose to the hon. Member is that he should place at our disposal the information which he seems to possess on this subject.

ARMY—COMMAND OF THE HOME DISTRICT.—QUESTION.

MR. STACPOLE asked the Secretary of State for War, If, by the regulation limiting the command of the Guards to Major Generals promoted from full pay of the Guards, there is now but one officer (excluding the late and present holders of the appointment) who is eligible for the command of the Home District and Brigade of Guards; and, if so, whether he proposes to make any alteration in a rule which thus takes away the power of selection for so important a command?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that the statement of the hon. Member was quite correct as to the present state of things. He had, however, been informed that there would be several eligible officers to choose from when a vacancy occurred.

COAL MINES—THE TYLDESLEY EXPLOSION.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can explain how it was that the Counsel appointed by the Treasury to attend the Tyldesley Explosion did not attend Coroner's Inquest on Saturday; and if he will attend at the next sitting of the jury?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that the reason why counsel did not attend the inquest was that there were two inquests, and that consequently fresh counsel had to be engaged, and there was an accident in the post. Counsel would be present at the adjourned inquest.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—EGYPT.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a Question of which I have given him private Notice, Whether he has any objection to explain more clearly to the House on the part of Her Majesty's Government, the intimation of the Home Secretary, that England would defend Egypt from interference or attack, and the points I wish to be explained are these—Firstly, whether it is the meaning or intention of Her Majesty's Government to enable Egypt by the supply of troops to participate as a belligerent in the Turco-Russian War without incurring the danger of retaliating hostilities; secondly, whether the House is to understand from the language of the Home Secretary that Her Majesty's Government intend, in the event of Russia so retaliating upon Egypt by an attack upon Alexandria, to employ the British arms against Russia; and, lastly, whether the intimation to Turkey and Egypt that their chief ports will be more or less protected by England against Russian hostilities is not a substantial contribution to their available strength in the war, and a departure from strict neutrality by this country?

MR. SPEAKER: If the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer thinks proper to answer that Question, it is not for me to interfere; but I am bound to say to the hon. Member that a Question of that character should be submitted to the House in the form of a Motion, as it involves matters of argument and debate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: All that I can say, in answer to the hon. Gentleman, is that the Question is one which it is impossible for me to answer.

MR. SULLIVAN: Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to give Notice that I shall ask this Question on Monday next.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—BLOCKADE IN THE BLACK SEA. QUESTION.

MR. E. HUBBARD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, in view of Article Three of the notification of the blockade of the Black Sea, which grants a delay of three days, reckoning from the 5th May, to merchant vessels wishing to enter one of the blockaded ports, and a delay of five days to those who wish to clear from the same, Her Majesty's Government consider that this notification gives the "reasonable time" required by International Law for a notice of blockade to take effect. The article having appeared in the "Times" of Monday 7th May, and the time expiring on Tuesday the 8th and Thursday the 10th May; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will consider the possibility of making immediate representations to the Porte in favour of British shipowners who, under this article, would have to forego their homeward cargoes to save the hull of their vessels from capture?

MR. BOURKE: Her Majesty's Government are not prepared to contest the right of the Porte to issue the regulations with regard to the blockade which have appeared in the newspapers; and with regard to the second paragraph of the hon. Member's Question, I have to state that a telegram was sent yesterday to Constantinople authorizing and directing Mr. Layard to request that the Porte would give an extension of the days of grace to vessels wishing to enter the blockaded ports. That telegram added the hope that Her Majesty's Government would receive from the Porte an assurance that an extension of the days of grace should be accorded, in order that vessels which are now on their way to ports in the Black Sea should be enabled to arrive there.

MR. WILSON asked whether that applied also to vessels having cargoes for ports in the Mediterranean?

MR. BOURKE said, it was a general instruction to Mr. Layard.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR— BLOCKADE OF THE DANUBE.

QUESTIONS.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is aware that the Turkish authorities on the Upper Danube have, contrary to the proclamation of the 1st of May, seized and set on fire a British corn-laden lighter; if so, what measures he intends adopting in order to prevent the seizure and destruction of British lighters and other steam-tugs now detained in the Upper Danube? Further, if he can inform the House of the nature of the blockade established in the Black Sea, if beginning at the entrance to the Dardanelles, the Bosphorus, or only outside Russian Black Sea ports; also, whether he will use the influence of Her Majesty's Government with that of the Turkish Government to procure an extension of the time allowed for leaving blockaded ports?

MR. BOURKE: I only had time to notice this Question a short time before I came down to the House, but I think

Mr. E. Hubbard

I shall be able to give a satisfactory answer. With regard to the first part of the Question, I have to state that instructions have been issued by the Porte to the Turkish Commander-in-Chief, authorizing him to stop the property of neutrals in the Danube, in order that the operations of war might be carried on. These regulations, issued by the Porte, appeared in the newspapers some days ago. The Commander-in-Chief is authorized by the Porte to close the navigation of parts of the Danube, and also to detain neutral vessels, provided it should be necessary in order to carry on the operations of war, giving those neutral vessels indemnification. The regulations which we have received on the subject are now before the Law Officers of the Crown, and I have not yet received their Report, so that I cannot give any further information on that part of the subject. If any vessels have been destroyed it has probably occurred during the fighting which is reported to have happened on the Danube. With regard to the further Question of the hon. Member, I understand the hon. Gentleman to ask whether the blockade of the Black Sea is to take place on the Turkish waters?

MR. GOURLEY: The Dardanelles, the Bosphorus, or other parts of the Black Sea?

MR. BOURKE: The Turkish Government, of course, will not blockade their own ports; and, therefore, I understand that the regulations with regard to the blockade apply to the Russian ports of the Black Sea. A telegram was sent yesterday to Mr. Layard instructing him to use his best efforts to obtain an extension of the days of grace allowed to British ships.

PARLIAMENT—THE WHITSUN RECESS. QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. BERESFORD HOPE,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was not possible to speak with perfect certainty at this moment respecting the duration of the Whitsun Recess; but he hoped it would be in the power of the House, without inconvenience, to rise on Thursday, the 17th instant, and he should then propose that they re-assemble on Thursday, the 31st instant.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Ordered, That the Notices of Motion be postponed till after the Order of the Day for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Eastern Question.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

THE EASTERN QUESTION—RESOLUTIONS (MR. GLADSTONE).

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [SECOND NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [7th May],

“That this House finds just cause of dissatisfaction and complaint in the conduct of the Ottoman Porte with regard to the Despatch written by the Earl of Derby on the 21st day of September 1876, and relating to the massacres in Bulgaria.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word “House” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “declines to entertain any Resolutions which may embarrass Her Majesty’s Government in the maintenance of peace and in the protection of British interests, without indicating any alternative line of policy,”—(Sir Henry Wolf,)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

MR. CHILDERS said, he rose to support to the best of his power the Motion of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, whose speech, though not delivered under circumstances of great public convenience, considering the two hours’ wrangle which preceded it, had been listened to with sincere admiration as one of the greatest and most noble efforts which his right hon. Friend had ever made in the House. That speech was a statement of policy at once complete, interesting, and worthy of guiding the House and the country on the greatest question which had come before this Parliament. In those third and fourth Resolutions, which were not to be put, the House might perceive the elements of the solution of this question; and whatever differences there might be on points of detail, and he confessed he shared them, he had no doubt that history would give his right hon. Friend his due in regard to a statement of policy which was of the most vital importance to the interests of this country. If the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich had done no more than elicit some of the expressions, some of the assurances, some of the declarations which were made last night by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, it would have resulted in a great gain for the cause which he and those near him had so much at heart. There was a great peculiarity about the reception of the speech of the Home Secretary by hon. Members opposite. He had watched the right hon. Gentleman himself very carefully while he was delivering his speech; but he had watched still more carefully the faces of the right hon. and hon. Members sitting behind him. When the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the charges brought against Her Majesty’s Government as being false, the whole of the hon. Members opposite cheered him to the echo; when he spoke of the unity of the Government and of their internal agreement, he was received with cheers from one end of the House to the other; when he denounced war against Turkey, the cheers were still louder; when he referred to his first landmark of “No coercion,” the cheers were redoubled; when he spoke of the action of Russia being the real obstacle to peace, and used the usual stock Party arguments to which we had been so accustomed during the last three months, nothing could be louder than the cheers he called forth from hon. Members opposite. But when the right hon. Gentleman went further, and announced his utter detestation of the Bulgarian outrages—[Ministerial cheers.] Yes, hon. Members opposite cheered now. When he said that he abhorred from the bottom of his heart what had occurred in Turkey not a single cheer came from the opposite side. When he said that the whole responsibility for the present state of things rested upon the Sultan, hon. Members opposite had listened to him with dismay. [“Oh, oh!”] He (Mr. Childers) was telling the strict truth. When the right hon. Gentleman said that in the war that was now going on England was determined to observe not only absolute neutrality, but absolute impartiality, hon. Members opposite did not cheer; and when he said that our interests were in danger in so remote a future that he need hardly contemplate it, even the hon. and gallant Member who sat behind him (Admiral Sir William Edmonstone) began to fan his face. He (Mr. Childers) pretended to know nothing about the secrets of the Cabinet. The Cabinet kept its own secrets; but, at any rate, he knew, and those who saw the faces of hon. Members opposite last night must know, a great deal of the effect which the declarations of the right hon. Gentleman produced upon them.

MR. PLUNKET rose to Order. He begged to ask, whether it was competent for the right hon. Gentleman to take advantage of this opportunity to give an account of what happened last night, which he (Mr. Plunket) begged to say was an entire misrepresentation of what took place?

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is referring to a speech in the current debate, and it is perfectly competent for him to do so.

MR. CHILDERS remarked that the hon. and learned Gentleman spoke of misrepresentation, and in the same breath called him to Order for reference to a past debate. Had it come to this—that they on that side might not even refer to a discussion on a previous night adjourned to the present, but might be accused under cover of rising to Order of misrepresentation. That was a very curious attempt to take advantage of the rules of debate. He would, however, at once turn to the main question before the House. What were the Resolutions which were before the House, and what was the Amendment they were asked to discuss? In the first place, he would ask what the Resolutions were not? Although his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich had expounded and explained with a force difficult to answer the whole of his four Resolutions, he did not intend, as he distinctly stated, to move the third and the fourth, but merely intended to move the first and second, and to agree to certain Amendments in the latter. The third and fourth Resolutions, therefore, were no longer before the House; but his right hon. Friend had a perfect right, in fact, he was bound, in his view of the question, to refer to them so as to enable him to put before the House and the country his policy as a whole.

Mr. Childers

The third and fourth Resolutions expressed very plainly the policy which the right hon. Gentleman advocated; but he was bound to admit that it was desirable, that they should not be put to the House as they stood, on account of one or two expressions which occurred in them, and which were undoubtedly open to question, more, perhaps, on the score of opportunity than on any other ground. With regard to the third Resolution, for instance, he might admit that there was an ambiguity and indefiniteness about its language, inasmuch as it expressed a desire that—

“The influence of the British Crown in the Councils of Europe should be employed with a view to the early and effectual development of local liberty and practical self-government in the disturbed Provinces of Turkey, by putting an end to the oppression which they now suffer, without the imposition upon them of any other Foreign Dominion.”

This might mean that under no circumstances should any of the oppressed Provinces be annexed to Austria, a position he was not prepared to adopt. Again, the fourth Resolution was open to question as to the propriety of the House demanding that the influence of Great Britain should be—

“Addressed to promoting the concert of the European Powers in exacting from the Ottoman Porte, by their united authority, such changes in the Government of Turkey as they may deem to be necessary for the purposes of humanity and justice, for effectual defence against intrigue, and for the peace of the world.”

What did “exacting” mean? and was it necessary that all the Powers should be united? It was unnecessary to enter into further details with reference to the third and fourth Resolutions at the present moment. The case, however, was very different with regard to the first and second Resolutions. The first Resolution was perfectly plain, for it related to the action of the Ottoman Empire in answer to the despatch of the 21st of September, 1876, action—or, rather, inaction—which was practically an affront to this country; and the second Resolution followed up that assertion by the almost inevitable conclusion that the Porte by its conduct had forfeited all claims to assistance from this country, whether it were moral or material; and upon those two Resolutions he should endeavour to show the House that it was most expedient that Parliament and the country should pronounce clearly. That the House would do well in the present position of affairs in the East to pronounce most distinctly that neither moral nor material support should be given to Turkey, was a proposition so clear, so simple, that he was surprised at the kind of opposition which had been made to it in certain quarters. It had been stated out-of-doors and suggested in that House that the first Resolution was unusual and unwise, as it censured, not the Government of this country, but the Government of Turkey. As a general rule, the province of the House was rather to censure the acts of Her Majesty's Government than of foreign Governments in no way responsible to us; but there was a peculiarity in the despatch of the 21st of September, 1876, written by Her Majesty's Government. It expressed, no doubt, the opinion of the Government, and it professed to speak in the name of the Queen; but, in point of fact, it originated in and conveyed to Turkey the decision, almost the commands of the people of England; and so it was understood by the Porte. In the Blue Book that had been recently published Lord Derby, writing to our Chargé d'Affaires in Constantinople, gave an account of an interview which he had had with the Turkish Ambassador here, in which he said that the latter, referring to the Despatch of the 21st of September, endeavoured to persuade him to soften his demands, and not to press for the rigorous punishment of the men who were guilty of these outrages in Bulgaria. The Turkish Ambassador, in unequivocal language, appealed to the forbearance, not of the Queen or the Government, but of the people of England. If, then, that despatch was written as from the people of England, we who represent the people were fully entitled to remark on the manner of its reception, and the entire avoidance of our demands. He had observed strong expressions outside the House as to that despatch being unworthy, unjust, and undiplomatic—something which an independent State ought never to receive from another State. But the fact was—no matter what words might be used on the subject—that Turkey was not independent, and had never been independent for a century past. No one had expressed that fact more clearly than Lord Salisbury himself, when he spoke of Turkey as a Power which depended upon the protection of others for its very existence. He could not help thinking that the old Parliamentary definition of independence might not be very ill-applied to the Ottoman Power. An independent Member of Parliament was once said to be a Member who could not be depended on; and he thought such a definition fairly expressed the amount of independence which we were entitled to attribute to Turkey. In fact, the despatch, from beginning to end, was a peremptory order to the Turkish Government to make reparation as quickly as possible for the greatest crime that had stained the history of the present century. What had the Ottoman Government done in answer to the appeal and orders of Her Majesty's Government? He did not think it was possible to say that, in the trials or sham trials which had taken place, the Ottoman Government had complied with that despatch in the smallest degree. In the first Blue Book they found that nothing had been done; in the last Blue Book they found that nothing had been done. Mr. Baring, in accounting for his departure in disgust from Philippopolis, said—"Murder, arson, pillage have been committed in broad day, and yet nobody has been punished." He had waded carefully through those despatches, and he could not find one word that went to show that the Porte had in any way complied with the wishes of Her Majesty's Government. The Government had been using the name of the Sovereign and expressing the feeling of the country; but their requests had been entirely neglected. That being so, he could not see what objection there could be to the first Resolution of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone). But an Amendment to the Resolution had been submitted to the House by the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), and that Amendment implied that the adoption of the Resolution would "embarrass Her Majesty's Government." How could that be the case? The policy of the despatch of September, 1876, was the policy of Her Majesty's Government. They admitted that they had been flouted and scorned by the Ottoman Government. Could Her Majesty's Government be embarrassed by the House formally declaring what Her Majesty's Government themselves had declared over and over again? But the real fact was that the country had been told repeatedly, not by Her Majesty's Government, but by those outside, who were said to be friends of Her Majesty's Government, that it was a despatch which did not do justice to Turkey. [An hon. MEMBER: Name.] The hon. Gentleman could not have read the newspapers for the last six months. If the Amendment to this Resolution were carried, those who said the despatch did not do justice to Turkey might be satisfied; but he should have thought Her Majesty's Government who wrote that despatch, which fairly expressed the opinion of the people of England, would scarcely be satisfied. The second Resolution of his right hon. Friend stated that the Porte by its conduct to its subject populations, and by its refusal to give guarantees for their better government, had forfeited all claims to the moral or material support of the British Crown. Was there any Member of the House who would really deny that that proposition was true and ought to be affirmed? It would be curious to watch in the course of the debate whether any such denial would be attempted. Certainly, the proposition had not been denied by the Home Secretary in his speech of the previous evening. The right hon. Gentleman had said that England would be absolutely impartial in the war between Russia and Turkey, that Turkey was suffering for her faults, and that he had not a word to say for her. If so, why was the House to be precluded from pronouncing that Turkey did not deserve moral or material support from this country? So, again, in the Instructions given to Lord Salisbury it was stated that Great Britain was resolved not to sanction misgovernment and oppression, and that if the Porte by its obstinacy opposed the efforts then being made to place its Empire on a more secure basis, the responsibility for the consequences that might ensue would rest solely on the Turkish Government. Again, in the Blue Book issued a few days ago, there was a very interesting despatch from Consul Holmes, which expressed very clearly what the view of the English Government was as to the claim of Turkey to the moral support of England. He said—

"I have therefore thought it my duty to explain to them, that in the conduct of the British Government there has been no question of hostility to Turkey, or of friendship for Russia. That the efforts of Great Britain have been employed to bring about a peaceful solution of difficulties which endanger the very existence of Turkey, and that the only manner to do this was to go with Russia, as far as was just and reasonable, so as to be able to restrain her from action, and persistent in what was neither desirable for Turkey, nor Europe in general. I have pointed out to them that their Government and themselves have, by their conduct, rendered the position of their friends almost impossible, but that even now the desire of Great Britain is to see them, if there is yet any hope, prosperous and powerful; but that this is utterly impossible so long as their Christian fellow-subjects are oppressed and ill-treated, and the character of their Government remains the same."

"I have reminded them of the long years during which England has steadily supported and befriended them, and asked them whether, in private life, they would continue to do the same to any person whose promises of good conduct were never fulfilled, who was always affording justification for the assertions of his enemies, who ill-treated his dependents, who borrowed money which was squandered, and of which repayment was refused, and who, finally, repudiated advice given for his own safety and reinstatement. I added that they and their Government had one chance more, and that was to avail of the present to show that there was a real determination to reform their wretchedly corrupt and unjust system of administration, and substantially improve the condition of their Christian subjects, in which case I felt convinced that they would have no cause to complain of the attitude of Great Britain towards them."

And if it were said that this expressed Consul Holmes's view, not that of the Government, it was only necessary to read a few pages further the despatch distinctly approving Consul Holmes's language on this occasion. In fact, Her Majesty's Government, in the strongest possible manner, had told Turkey that she had forfeited all claim either to the material or the moral support of this country; and that was all that the second Resolution expressed, and expressed in unmistakeable terms. He now came to the question started by the Mover of the Amendment last night—namely, that of British interests. It was suggested that the passing of that Resolution would in some way tie the hands of the Government so that they would not be able at the proper time, if it ever came, to give due attention to the protection of British interests. Now, on that point he had heard with very great satisfaction the statement of the Home Secretary. If ever there was a statement which dispelled a whole cloud of popular and vague theory as to British interests it was the one made last night by that right hon. Gentleman. It had been dinned into their ears for weeks, if not for months past, that they were to do something to prevent Russia from going to India. Now, he did not think that the Home Secretary even alluded, unless it was very distantly and parenthetically, to India. We had lately heard that unless we stopped the progress of Russia she would get to the Euphrates Valley, from the Euphrates to the Persian Gulf, where she would build a naval station from which fleets would come, imperilling our interests in the Indian Ocean. He was happy to find that the Home Secretary gave no countenance whatever to those alarms. But the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the points at which they ought to be careful about British interests in that or in any war which might break out, and had referred to the Suez Canal and to Alexandria—a town which he had been rather surprised to hear a Minister speak of as a French, an English, or an European town, in oblivion of his own declarations about the independence of the Ottoman Empire of which it formed a part. However, there was no question that if our great interests at Alexandria and the Suez Canal were endangered we should be entitled, and every English Government would be bound, to protect them. But which was the great naval Power against which we had to protect them? Was it Russia? Why, they heard continued boasts about the greatness of the Turkish Fleet, and of its power to give a good account of any squadron which Russia could send into the Mediterranean against it. Certainly, British interests ought to be protected; but against whom was it within the bounds of possibility that they would have to protect them unless it was against Turkey, which had the more powerful fleet, and not against Russia? Interference with the freedom of passage in the Suez Canal was far more likely to come from Turkey than from her enemy. The same remark applied to the Dardanelles, where, the right hon. Gentleman said very truly, this country had great interests. Therefore, all they came to, when the protection of British interests was brought before them by the Home Secretary, was the probability of Turkey, rather than of Russia, taking steps which might interfere with the undoubted liberty we ought to have for trade at Suez, Alexandria, and the Bosphorus. [Mr. ASSHETON CROSS: I did not say so.] No; but he was describing what were the realities with which we should be faced, if the right hon. Gentleman's account of our interests were true, and as to those interests themselves there was practically no dispute between them. The protection of British interests would be, in his opinion, first rendered necessary, not in consequence of an attack by Russia, but from complications arising through the action in the Suez Canal or the Dardanelles of Turkey. So far, therefore, as to the appeals for immediate action against Russia which had gone up and down the country for the last few weeks, they had been set aside, and they might take it that the right hon. Gentleman attached their due importance to them, though he was not sure that that was the view taken by the Members of the Government as a body. The House had delivered to it within the last day or too a despatch from Lord Derby to Lord Augustus Loftus, dated May 1, in answer to Prince Gortchakoff's Circular, announcing that the Russian Armies had been ordered to cross the Turkish frontiers; and he was bound to say—and he said it with all sincerity—that he thought a more ill-advised, more violent, and more provoking despatch had been rarely laid before them. There was hardly a paragraph in it which did not contain language which a Power like Russia could not but feel to be a direct or indirect attack upon her; and hardly a paragraph which was not a distinct encouragement to Turkey—a mitigation of all that Turkey had done, and an encouragement to her, he did not say to walk in the same course as she had done, but to expect sooner or later the moral support at least of Her Majesty's Government. Whoever had written that despatch must have been singularly forgetful of what he had been writing a few days before. Lord Derby in that

despatch, referring to the expressions used in the Protocol, said—

“The Porte no doubt has thought fit—unfortunately in the opinion of Her Majesty’s Government—to protest against the expressions in question as implying an encroachment on the Sultan’s sovereignty and independence. But, while so doing, and while declaring that they cannot consider the Protocol as having any binding character on Turkey, the Turkish Government have again affirmed their intention of carrying into execution the reforms already promised.”

The despatch went on to refer to the presence of Russian Forces on the Turkish frontiers as standing in the way of the execution of the projected reforms, and spoke in terms of condemnation of the action of Russia generally. What could that despatch mean? It could only mean that while Her Majesty’s Government admitted that Turkey had committed some error of judgment, they desired it to be understood that the offence of Russia was infinitely greater. Compare this with what Lord Derby had said a few days before, when, on the 15th of April, writing to the Chargé d’Affairs at Constantinople, he pointed out that if Turkey recklessly refused to assent to the proposals on the part of the Powers, she would give Russia the opportunity of putting her in the wrong in the eyes of Europe. Now, there was nothing about “reckless refusal” in the despatch of the 1st of May, and nothing about her being “put in the wrong.” He would also refer hon. Members to that remarkable despatch describing Lord Derby’s interview with Musurus Pasha, and the description he then gave the Ambassador of the conduct of the Porte. Altogether that despatch was an unworthy despatch to have emanated from any Government. It was highly provocative to Russia in every sense of the word; but there was one remark in it which he could not help noticing—namely, that the course on which the Russian Government had entered involved serious considerations, and was “in contravention of the stipulation of the Treaty of Paris.” These were serious words. They implied that the Treaty of Paris had been violated by some act originating with the Russian Government; but he would remind the House that Lord Derby, in September last, expressly declared that war with Russia, which Her Majesty’s Government could do nothing to prevent, would bring this country into opposition with its previous engagements. That was an assertion that if Turkey persisted in the conduct it was then pursuing, it would compel this country to violate her Treaty engagements. Well, Turkey did persist in the course she was then pursuing, and now Russia was told, not that we were violating our Treaty engagements, but that she was doing so, and doing so not by the fault of the Porte, but by her own act. When that despatch was penned some one ought to have reminded Lord Derby of his previous language. The despatch, he presumed, emanated from the Cabinet, and they could know nothing of Cabinet secrets; but he could not help thinking that, though the hand was the hand of Lord Derby, the voice was Lord Beaconsfield’s. That being the case, such a temperate Motion as had been brought forward by his right hon. Friend, and such a debate as was now taking place, were, in his humble judgment, not only opportune, but most necessary; thoroughly consistent with that definition of the duty of an Opposition which had been stated with such force lately in another place—namely, that when a Government appeared wavering between two courses, one wise and the other unwise, to impress the former on the country by a Parliamentary Vote in a manner alike temperate and unequivocal. No one could deny that there had been during the past few days a powerful endeavour on the part of the Press to mark the difference which existed between the two sections of Her Majesty’s Government. In the Press which represented the Conservative Party, both in the daily and weekly organs, those differences had been accentuated in the clearest possible manner, and it was to those differences that he would refer hon. Members who thought the recent conduct of Her Majesty’s Government consistent with the Blue Books. He had recently read in the principal organ of what he might call the intellectual Conservatives an article which, referring to the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), put the case admirably, and he would read a sentence from it. The article said—

Mr. Childers

"The question at once arises of confidence in the British Government—a Government which can accept a Resolution like the Resolution of the noble Lord—one which professes to be concerned, in the first instance, for the future safety of the Christian populations. On a matter so serious as this the country will not much longer endure to remain in ignorance, whether we are governed by Lord Beaconsfield or Lord Salisbury, or whether or not the control of the foreign policy has or has not passed from Lord Derby to Lord Salisbury."

That extract was taken from The Pall Mall Gazette, a paper which hitherto had been the consistent supporter of the Foreign Office. It was from friends like those that they were doing their best to protect Her Majesty's Government; it was from friends like those—not isolated, not to be found only here and there, but pervading all society that the real danger arose. From that point of view he could not help thinking his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) had done a good work in bringing forward his Resolutions. They would, at any rate for a time, save the country from being dragged into the fatal policy of which the despatch to Prince Gortchakoff was the latest expression.

VISCOUNT SANDON: If I had felt uneasy at any period as to the future of the Conservative Party, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down I should have felt very considerably relieved. The right hon. Member has talked of the "intellectual Conservative Party," a very different name from what was formerly applied to us by hon. Gentlemen on that Bench—and beyond this, he has been kind enough to say that the Opposition were willing to protect Her Majesty's Government. What with such an acknowledgment of our intellectual position, and with an offer of such doughty aid, I must conclude that the dark days of the Party are over. We have, in fact, been promoted, and I hope the Party is duly thankful for the kind things that have been said. Now, I am free to confess that on one point I agree with the right hon. Gentleman when he says that the proposal of the right hon. Member for Greenwich is one of vital importance. I will tell you why; but before dwelling on this point, I will briefly run over some of his remarks which seem to call for a reply. And in doing so, I must take exception to the extraordinary feeling of suspicion with which we have been treated in reference to the Bulgarian atrocities. What have we done in word or act to lead people to suppose that we lack, any more than the rest of the country, the common feelings of humanity? I would not yield to anyone in the feeling of utter detestation of those abominable transactions which so deeply touched the heart of England last Autumn, and, indeed, horrified the whole civilized world. But I confess to a sense of some humiliation, or rather, I should say, of strong indignation that anyone should have dared even to hint that anything but detestation could have been entertained with regard to this subject on the side of the House on which we sit. The right hon. Gentleman has expressed satisfaction that a hundred curious little stories, which were the product of London drawing-rooms and London clubs, have been blown away by the manly speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary; and it is to be hoped that now, at any rate, people will cease to believe all these floating stories, which long ago they ought to have known had not a shadow of a foundation in fact. It seems to me the right hon. Gentleman has taken rather a curious course with regard to the despatch of Lord Derby of the 21st of September. That despatch, the right hon. Gentleman says, was not the despatch of a Ministry, but the despatch of a nation. I need hardly say that Government appreciates the compliment paid to them, and I, for one, am prepared to endorse all that the despatch contained. But then the right hon. Gentleman says that, if the attention paid to such a despatch of a nation is insufficient, the nation ought to reply. Surely it is a new doctrine to lay down that when the Foreign Secretary has written over and over again about the neglect with which the recommendations of a despatch have been treated, the nation should use some other mouthpiece. The whole responsibility of a Foreign Minister is gone if other persons, or even a Committee of this House, are to dictate to him his despatches. Then the right hon. Gentleman says it is generally acknowledged that Turkey is not really independent; but surely he could not have forgotten that the Representatives of all the Great Powers took as the basis of the Conference only last year the maintenance of the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire? [Mr. CHILDERS: Lord Salisbury denied it.] Well, granting for a moment that the right hon. Gentleman's view is correct as to Lord Salisbury, in a case of this kind I must decline to accept the dictum of a Secretary of State, however distinguished, if it is in opposition to the formal assertion of the Six Powers of Europe, of which our own country was one. It is satisfactory to find that the right hon. Gentleman at least has some feeling about some British interests. He says he thinks Her Majesty's Government are bound to protect those interests. But British interests, he adds, are, as far as he can see, at present confined to the Suez Canal and Alexandria. That is a very curious statement. The right hon. Gentleman appears to forget altogether that there is such a place as India. India, according to him, is so trifling a spot on the map of the world that it is not worth mentioning. The right hon. Gentleman has had the advantage—and I wish I was able to say as much—of having lived in another Colony of England, and that marvellous Colonial Kingdom of Australia is so large, and its future so great, that I cannot but conclude that his long acquaintance with that Continent has made him overlook India and its vast interests and responsibilities. Such, however, is not the opinion of Her Majesty's Government. We have—is it necessary to avow it?—some regard for the Indian Empire, and for other British interests not included in Alexandria and the Suez Canal. Whether I am right or wrong as to his view of British interests, when I consider the whole bearing of his remarks as to the position taken up by Russia, I can only interpret the speech of the right hon. Gentleman—who spoke with the grave responsibility of a former Cabinet Minister—as meaning that he gives his approbation to the course which Russia is now following. I am sure that the country is by no means aware of the conversion of the front Opposition bench on the subject of Russia. It is high time it should be known, so that the country should ponder well the results likely to follow from this extraordinary state of things. Now, surely I am justified in my remarks. For I confess I was no less astonished than alarmed when I heard the observations which fell the previous night from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, who expressed the opinion that Russia "has made itself the organ of the collective will, the united judgment, and the solemn conclusions of Europe." These words seem to bear one meaning alone—namely, that Russia is justified in going to war. Then, looking to another section of the House, I find an hon. Member below the Gangway—the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain)—saying that he did not see how Russia could have refrained from taking further steps in order to attain the object she had in view. In this, again, is distinct approval of Russia going to war. These views of hon. Members may be right or may be wrong; but it is certainly an important view of foreign affairs which is coming out before the country, which these declarations coming from the right hon. Member for Greenwich, from the front Opposition Bench, and from the Radical section below the Gangway, show to be the opinion of the Leaders of the Liberal Party—namely, that contrary to the formal judgment of France, of Germany, of Austria, and of Italy; contrary to the declaration of Her Majesty's Government and of the rest of this nation generally, if we may judge from the almost unanimous opinion of the Press, that Russia was justified in going to war. Now, the House is not only discussing the observations of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, but is also more especially considering the very grave propositions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. I will therefore pass away from the speech of the right hon. Member for Pontefract, and I would entreat the House to weigh well what are the real as well as the ostensible objects of the two Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman. I suppose I may fairly pass over the third and fourth Resolutions, though I must say I am still a little puzzled—and I believe I am not the only Member who is puzzled—as to whether they have really been dropped. I am inclined to believe that the position is pretty much this—that they are physically dropped, but morally retained. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Materially dropped, but morally retained.] I thank the right hon. Gentleman for the word materially—it is just what I was looking for—they are materially dropped, but morally retained—but it seems to me it is a very awkward position to assume—both for the right hon. Gentleman and for the House. It is very difficult to understand the material dropping of these Resolutions; but still more difficult to understand their moral retention. Now, are they or are they not really and seriously dropped? The right hon. Member for Greenwich said that “the first and second Resolutions were, in his mind, introductory to the third and fourth;” that he “looked upon the entire argument as one:” and that, “logically and morally, the Resolutions were connected in his mind.” The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) said he did not see how they could be separated. The right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), moreover, spoke of them in a laudatory manner, and held that, although the third and fourth Resolutions are not actually to be moved, Members are entitled to refer to them. So far, then, I understand the wish of the Opposition to be to enjoy the luxury of discussing all the points raised in the Resolutions without incurring the slightest responsibility attaching to an expression of a definite policy upon this most dangerous question. I cannot think I am wrong, when I look at this group of Resolutions, if I say that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) in proposing them, ought, if followed out logically, to be first a Vote of Censure upon Turkey, and then a Vote of Censure on Her Majesty’s Government. I cannot understand why the right hon. Gentleman, with the opinions he has expressed, does not move such a Vote of Censure. He may have felt a difficulty in getting numerically a majority to upset the Government; but, holding such opinions as the right hon. Gentleman holds, and feeling so strongly as he appears to do their importance, I cannot understand how the right hon. Gentleman—remembering the great position he has held as Prime Minister and as a leading Adviser of the Crown during many years, during periods of great difficulty—can justify his conduct in abstaining, in the face of the country, from proposing such a Vote of Censure. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that, by passing his Resolutions, he undoubtedly contemplates bringing about an alteration in the policy of the Government. That is to say that, as he declines to move a Vote of Censure, the Government is to be kept in power simply to do his bidding. Surely I need not remind the House that that would be a state of things which would be unprecedented in our Parliamentary history. The right hon. Gentleman has not hesitated to say that there has been no chapter in the history of our foreign policy since the Peace of Vienna so deplorable as the history of the last 18 months. Why does he not at once propose a Vote of Censure; or, rather, how can he reconcile it with his duty, as a former principal Adviser of the Crown, to refrain from endeavouring to drive from office Ministers whom he considers guilty of such misconduct? He has asserted in so many words that England has been the sole obstacle to the success of the Conference. That, if true, is a proper cause for the impeachment of the Government. Again, he represented Her Majesty’s Government as playing the part of “the evil genius of Europe”—those were his very words: now, holding such opinions, the very least thing the right hon. Gentleman could do would be to move a regular Vote of Censure on Her Majesty’s Government; and, at any rate, to give the nation an opportunity by their Representatives of expressing their judgment on such a grave position of affairs. But no; he refuses to put the question to a test; and let the House think what a position the right hon. Gentleman has tried to put the country in. Surely in the conduct of its foreign affairs there can be nothing more fatal to a country’s influence in the councils of the world, and consequently to its safety, dignity, and prosperity, than the suspicion that it is under a dual Government. Now, what does the right hon. Gentleman do? He scatters insinuations of dissensions within the Government, and he throws these supposed dissensions, of his own imagination, which every Member of the Government knows to be groundless, in our teeth as the most damaging charge he can make. He proceeds to declare that not only is there a dual Government in the Cabinet; but also that the country is divided—one Party supported by a majority of the House and by the Sovereign, and another—in his opinion the larger one—supported by large public meetings and by the general public out-of-doors. This is surely an intolerable position. The public ought to settle, aye or no, whether there is this division of opinion in the nation, and whether, in such a momentous crisis of the world's affairs, there is to be a dual Government—not as the right hon. Gentleman most recklessly asserts within the Cabinet—but whether he himself, shrinking from proposing a Vote of Censure, without responsibility, is to wield the foreign policy of this country; or whether it is to be still entrusted to the full responsibility of Her Majesty's present Advisers. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman cheers me; why does he not then boldly, and in a straightforward way, propose a Vote of Censure? No one can suppose that these attenuated Resolutions assume anything like the proportions of a Vote of Censure. I agree most cordially with the right hon. Gentleman that the position of affairs in the East is very grave and serious, and is enough to make anyone familiar with those countries, as I am, very unhappy. But I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he thinks that the social and municipal reforms which are urgently required are likely to be successfully started in the face of an insurrection in a country honey-combed by foreign emissaries and threatened on every frontier by the large embattled hosts of its hereditary and relentless foes? I beg the right hon. Gentleman to give his best attention to what I am about to say. Since the settlement of 1856 there have been many years of profound peace in Turkey and also in Europe. There were years of peace—years of the greatest importance to Turkey—during which the British nation stood justly high in the opinion of the people of the East and the West. The Party with which the present Government was connected had no real share of power during those 20 years. They were occasionally in office; but, owing to circumstances, they had no substantial power during their short tenures of office, and being weak in support at home, could not influence to any sensible extent the foreign policy of the country. The right hon. Gentleman, on the other hand, was a leading personage in every Government—except the Conservative Governments—since 1856. Well, what was he doing, and what has he done for the Ottoman Porte during that time? Was he using the name of England to support sensible reforms in Turkey? Was he trying to use his influence with the Turkish Government that the taxes should not be farmed, that the police should be improved? Has he been endeavouring during those years to establish a European concert of the Great Powers? I do not refer to the events in Syria and the disturbances in Crete, because these were periods when the European Governments, as a matter of self-preservation, were obliged to do something. But I am talking of the quiet years between 1856 and the time when the right hon. Gentleman went out of office. He praises Lord Stratford de Redcliffe as a man of masterly ability, of iron will, and he acknowledges that some few improvements were made in Turkish administration during those two short years after the Crimean War, during which Lord Stratford was able to remain at his post. But why, I want to know, did not the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends search out for such men as Lord Stratford, whom he so highly praises, and man every Consulate and Embassy in the East with persons of that type and calibre, so as to assist in producing in times of peace those reforms which he now seeks to impose upon the Turkish Government by force of arms in a time of terror and distress? It is clear to me that the right hon. Gentleman is not without certain regrets in this matter, and that his conscience is constantly calling him to account; and I quite understand the plaintive tone in which the right hon. Gentleman admitted that, although there had been remonstrances in these years from his Government when he was in full power, these remonstrances were, as he says, "not very numerous." The golden opportunity was missed, those years of peace were neglected by the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends, the real time for reforms was quietly and calmly allowed to pass. No, Sir, the more you examine the matter, the more clearly does it come out that Turkey received very little friendly advice from the right hon. Gentleman; and, forsooth, the present Government are now to be condemned because they cannot introduce large domestic reforms in a time of disquietude and trouble, when Turkey is torn to pieces by internal dissensions and threatened by foreign war. What does the right hon. Gentleman really ask the Government to do? I have picked out a few of the salient phrases from the right hon. Gentleman's speech of last night. I would beg the House to give them their best attention while I read them. He said—

"But if I am to look at the tone and tenor of the declarations of the Government for the last two or three months, I am sorry to say that they seem to me to be relapsing into a position in which the outrages inflicted by the Government of Turkey are to be contemplated as matters of sentimental regret, and for idle and verbal expostulations."

He proceeds to ask—

"But the question remains, How are these terrible evils, which afflict Turkey and disgrace Europe, to be met? Are they to be met by remonstrances and expostulations only? The answer echoed back from the Ministerial benches is, 'By remonstrances and expostulations only.' Now that, I believe, human nature, the conscience of mankind, and the civilization of the nineteenth century, will no longer bear."

And he declares that—

"It is time to remonstrate against remonstrances, and to protest against protestations."

All this surely means that there ought to be no more words, but deeds. The right hon. Gentleman added that this state of things required an effectual remedy. And the right hon. Gentleman did not hesitate to conclude his remarks of this nature by complaining that—

"We ought to view with regret and misgiving anything that puts a single Power in a position to take such a charge upon herself."

As far as I can interpret the right hon. Gentleman's words—which it is sometimes difficult to do, when the House is carried away by the charms of his rhetoric—undoubtedly the right hon. Gentleman requires further action, and—I cannot think that I misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman—that further action only means war against Turkey in concert with Russia. I should be only too charmed to find I am wrong in this impression; but, after the failure of the European Conference, and every conceivable negotiation between all the Powers during the last 18 months, can any reasonable man suppose that this further action can mean anything else but war? The House thus comes face to face with the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman that we are to join Russia in fighting against Turkey. What, I ask, is to be the position of this country in the great war in which we are to take part? Are we to go into it without any allies except Russia? As far as I can judge from the Blue Books, Italy is by no means to join us in war against Turkey, Germany refuses point blank, France assures us she has no notion to take part in the crusade, and Austria repeats as emphatically the same tale. The country, then, would be put in this very serious position, that we were to go to war—at the bidding of the right hon. Gentleman—against Turkey in concert with Russia, and with no other ally. ["Hear, hear!"] I am, indeed, surprised to hear that cheer from hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway—for what, I ask, is to be the object—what are to be the hopes—of this joint war with Russia against Turkey? Are we to fight under the standard that has been raised by Russia "for Faith and Fatherland?" The right hon. Gentleman surely does not wish to raise that dangerous war cry of the Cross, which either has been or may most probably be raised by our supposed ally? Or does the right hon. Gentleman propose to fight it out on the proposals which the European Conference originally laid down? Or are Her Majesty's Government to arrange simply that the Governors of certain provinces north of the Balkans should hold office for five years, that the police were to be reformed, that an International Commission should sit, and that the taxes should be no longer farmed? Surely the right hon. Gentleman does not want this country to enter into a great war, to sacrifice countless valuable lives, and to waste its treasures for such a cause as this. What does the right hon. Gentleman wish England to fight for? I have shown that it is war clearly to which the right hon. Gentleman would commit us; and, even at the risk of wearying the House, I desire to make out what we are to fight for. I want, in fact, to unravel the policy of the right hon. Gentleman before hon. Gentlemen opposite and the nation are committed to it. I am told he wishes us to fight for autonomous States north of Constantinople. What, then, I say, does the right hon. Gentleman mean by "autonomous States north of Constantinople," and why are we to fight, and can we expect to fight only for autonomy north of Constantinople? These States have been sketched in the right hon. Gentleman's early works on this subject, where he alludes to them as States from which all Turkish officers should be banished. If once we began to establish autonomous States there, all the other nationalities of Turkey will at once ask for them. Now, I have wandered through all the countries between Syria, Persia, and Armenia, and have dwelt with most of the ancient and various races which people these strange and interesting regions; and from my own knowledge of them, I can say that every one of these nationalities aspires after autonomy; but, at the same time, I must express my conviction that, high though the qualities of some of them are, autonomy would be a fatal gift to them, would involve them in endless feuds with their neighbours, and would plunge their country into such a state of anarchy as would be ruinous to all concerned. If, then, we go to war for autonomous States north of Constantinople, we have a most serious flight of demands for similar changes from the other nationalities. If England should plunge into this war, everyone must see that she would, by so doing, reverse the whole of our ancient policy, would astonish Europe, and disturb all the Mahomedans of India. For what purpose, then, should we go to war? I cannot see any sufficient reason or purpose in those I have hitherto discussed for this war with Russia, without any European allies, against our ancient ally; but it must be for some large—some world-wide purpose. But, granted there is sufficient reason, and suppose we do go to war, and suppose that Turkey is overcome, and her fleet is destroyed, what difficulties should we still have to face? The real difficulties would then begin. England and Russia would have, in fact, to settle between them the great question of the East. A dual Government, as we have already said, is mischievous in a single country; what would dual management be in determining this great problem? "Can two people walk together unless they be agreed?" After what type are the constitutions of the new States all over Turkey to be formed? England prides herself on free representative institutions, freedom of speech, on the toleration of every creed, on her free Press, on her free trade. Is it likely that Russia and England would be agreed in those respects? I do not wish to say anything against the domestic policy of other States. They are perfectly free, of course, to select their own line in these matters; but is it not a matter of notoriety that the Russians, or the ruling classes in Russia, are devoted to a military and despotic Government? They closely supervise the Press; they do not allow the toleration of other creeds; they are in favour of the strictest Protective duties. Is it in the slightest degree likely that these two Powers, England and Russia, could agree as to the government of the States that were to be torn from unhappy Turkey? But when we have torn up Treaties, disturbed Europe, and astonished Asia, should we have a chance of establishing a series of free States? Could Russia permit the establishment of such States either on her European or her Asiatic frontiers? Certainly not. We should have then to be parties to the establishment of States after the model of Russia, and that will be a pretty position in which the Liberal Party, following the lead of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, will, after infinite bloodshed and heavy taxation, find themselves landed. The question involved is so very serious that when once it is considered I can hardly believe that many hon. Gentlemen will be found to follow the lead of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich in a course which will lead to such a prospect of future evil and peril, with hardly any compensating good in view; and I am confident the country, in any case, will not support him. The right hon. Gentleman, I may fairly say, has shown us no tenable alternative policy to that of Her Majesty's Government. I think, therefore, we have a right to demand that we should no longer be subject to these semi-Votes of Censure; and that we should ask the House, with one accord, to suspend all Party feeling, and to accept the proposal of my hon. Friend (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), and to declare that they decline, at such a critical moment as the present, to embarrass Her Majesty's Government by any fanciful Resolutions, however eloquently they may be submitted to the House and with whatever noble sentiments they may be surrounded. Now, the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions, beyond being a censure on Her Majesty's Government, are also a censure on the Government of Turkey, and is it Parliament's business to pass such a censure on a friendly State? Is it generous and right to do so when that State is in the very agony of a foreign invasion? During the Franco-German War we heard a great deal about neutrality, and England was asked by both sides to observe a benevolent neutrality—which I confess has always appeared to me to be a contradiction in terms. Now we are asked to observe a benevolent neutrality towards Russia, and to pass a Vote of Censure upon Turkey, and by so doing we are clearly invited to commit a breach of that neutrality which Her Majesty has only recently, with the general assent of the nation, proclaimed. What, I would once more ask, does the right hon. Gentleman's Motion mean, even if we accept it for the moment merely as a Vote of Censure not upon the Government, but upon Turkey? The right hon. Gentleman himself explained it when, in reference to Lord Derby's despatch, he said—

"Now, Sir, I pass from this general argument to the first Resolution, and to Lord Derby's despatch. That despatch involved one of two things. It was either a declaration that ought to have been followed up, or else it was a gross and unwarrantable insult to Turkey. There is no escape from the dilemma. You have no right to go about flinging those violent words in the face of any Power, unless that Power has made itself a criminal before Europe; and if that Power is to have your moral support, you have certainly no right to use such language. You were bound either to tear that despatch into shreds, or to go further in your own vindication."

What does that word "further" mean? It means action; and action I have already shown can, under present circumstances, only mean war. The right hon. Gentleman blamed the Secretary of State for having penned in his despatch words which either intimated that England would, in certain circumstances, go further—that is to say, go to war—or, if not, for having insulted Turkey. What is the meaning of his present proposal but to pledge not the Secretary of State, but the House of Commons, to sanction language which, by his own confession, ought to be either followed up by action—that is war—or to be destroyed, to be torn to shreds by the House of Commons as an unwarrantable insult to Turkey? This passage of the right hon. Gentleman's speech throws a great light on the proceedings in which the House is now engaged; and I cannot imagine how any hon. Gentleman opposite who ponders over it can fail to see that if, in the sense the right hon. Gentleman proposed it, he votes for the two Resolutions, emasculated though they have been, he is voting for going to war with Russia against Turkey. It evidently must mean this—that the passing of the Resolution should be followed up by material intervention on the part of Her Majesty's Government. Nobody admires more than I do enthusiasm such as that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich and his followers, when they believed that the grossest oppression and the foulest crimes had been perpetrated. Real enthusiasm is always a noble thing, and seems to have something of the divine element in it, and, when true and genuine, lifts us above the sordid motives and petty calculations of ordinary life; but much though we honour such feelings, it is surely the business of a Government to see that they are not carried away by such sentiments, however noble, and look at affairs with the calmness which the great interests entrusted to them demand, for it is an enormous charge which Her Majesty's Government has to bear. Instead of talking of British interests, of which hon. Gentlemen opposite have thought fit to speak in contemptuous strains, I prefer to speak of British responsibilities—those heavy responsibilities which belong to us as the very heart of an enormous Empire. The question is not one of sordid interest, lust of pelf, desire of conquest, or pride of possession. We find ourselves at the head of an extraordinary confederation of the Anglo-Saxon race, that rules in every quarter of the globe, that has under its sway the swarthy millions of India, and has marked out for its own, by its commerce and Colonies, all the most favoured regions of the civilized world. When we glance at the map of the world, and mark how there is scarcely a commanding cape or beautiful island on which our flag does not wave, and when we remember—not without some pride and gratitude—that these possessions are for the most part centres of freedom and justice and Christianity, how is it possible that we should not feel that it would be a grievous loss to the world at large if these fair regions were scrambled for by the nations, and were turned into scenes of turmoil and war? It is surely, then, from no sordid sense of British interests, but from a deep and overwhelming sense of British responsibility, that we look with the deepest anxiety upon any steps by any foreign Power—be they great or small, be they in the East or in the West—which threaten to break up that British Empire, or in the remotest degree to weaken that power which alone preserves to these vast and widely-scattered possessions the blessings of a peace and a prosperity such as other nations have seldom known. Whatever may be the opinion of hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the present danger of that Empire being assailed, we believe it to be our duty to watch and to guard it with the greatest jealousy. No apprehension of temporary ridicule, no dread of misrepresentation, no fear of attack from opponents, will shake our view as to the grave responsibility of our position, or will deter us from doing our best in our day and generation to hand down to our posterity the great charge we have received of the United British Empire—the most wonderful Republic of nations which the world has seen united under the most ancient and most beautiful of Crowns.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that no policy would come from that (the Opposition) side of the House which would diminish the glory and the splendour of the British Empire. He denied that the Party with which he was connected had ever sacrificed British interests; and, in his opinion, those interests would always be safe in the hands of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, who was the foremost statesman of the age. He (Mr. Vivian) was one of the few Members now in the House who had the honour of a seat at the time of the declaration of the last war with Russia, and he honestly confessed that he had regretted the vote he had given on that occasion. England and France had intervened on that occasion to prevent the Turkish Empire being destroyed; and, consequently, he thought we were both responsible for the outrages which had since been committed by that nation. He was afraid that unless we took great care and did not speak out we should drift into war now as we drifted into war then, especially if some great Russian victory took place, and the troops of the Czar overran European Turkey and Asia Minor. The noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) repudiated the idea that there was a dual influence in the Government; but when they contrasted the speeches and actions of the head of the Government with what was said yesterday by the Home Secretary, they had a right to suspect and believe that a considerable difference of opinion existed in the Government. If this country had, at an early period, declared its determination that the system of misgovernment in the Turkish provinces should be reformed, at this moment no war would exist. If England had supported the Berlin Memorandum, Turkey would not have been insane enough to repel its proposals. He had heard with the greatest satisfaction of the appointment of Lord Salisbury to the Conference at Constantinople; but he proceeded to that Conference with such a weight hanging round his neck as precluded the possibility of success. In connection with Lord Salisbury's Mission to Constantinople it was very desirable to remember the circumstances in which his Lordship was placed. Did hon. Members suppose that the utterances of the Prime Minister exercised no influence upon the Turkish mind? Did they think that the declaration of the Premier that no more unjust war was ever waged than that which Serbia declared against Turkey passed unnoticed by the Porte? Did they imagine that the Guildhall speech had not had its effect in encouraging the resistance of Turkey? All that being so, he must say that he was astonished at a man with the statesman-like knowledge and power of Lord Salisbury accepting, with a dead weight around his neck, what could hardly fail in the circumstances to prove a thankless office. He would not call the policy of the Government puerile, because he did not think any boy would say to a bully at school—"I wish you would stop ill-using those little boys, but if you do not stop it is not my intention to give you a thrashing." He would not therefore call it puerile. It was senile—it was nothing but the outcome of old age—to say to Turkey—"I will remonstrate with you, but I will not coerce you." The Home Secretary had stated the other day that it would have been most improper to have gone to the Conference and said—"If you do not do that which I recommend I will then be prepared to make war upon you." He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman; but was that the alternative? Surely, when we had a dispute with a man, and entered into negotiation with him, we did not necessarily say—"If you do not give way I will not go to law with you." We endeavoured by every means in our power to get the man to do what we wished; but, while acting in that manner, we did not inform him that we would not go to law with him. That, however, was in effect what the Government had told Turkey; and with what result?—that England had been insulted by the Porte. Our Ambassador had been sent away from Constantinople without even having the opportunity of taking leave of the Sultan, under the miserable pretext that the Sovereign of the country had the toothache. Such an insult had never before been heaped upon any country, so far as he was aware; and yet we continued to pay Turkey "delicate attention." That certainly was not a vigorous foreign policy, and that was the policy which had led to the war which was now in progress. He had the firm conviction that if the Members of Her Majesty's Government had said at once they so detested and abhorred the misrule of Turkey, that they would not allow it to continue, and that if necessary they would be prepared to join with others in insisting upon such measures being taken as would cause justice again to rule in that unhappy country, the present calamitous war would never have occurred. It was because the Government had not taken such a course that he believed the war lay strictly at their door. With reference to the Bulgarian horrors, he was very glad to hear the speech delivered on the previous evening by the Home Secretary. That right hon. Gentleman had expressed his detestation of those atrocities in terms which, so far as he knew, had not been used before by any Member of the Government; and that appeared to him to be a matter for congratulation. His right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich spoke at length on this important point, and a considerable portion of his most able and eloquent speech—the most able and eloquent he had ever heard fall from his right hon. Friend's lips—was directed to fix on the Turkish Government the absolute responsibility for these massacres. This he thoroughly succeeded in doing; and it was rather extraordinary that neither the Home Secretary nor the noble Lord who had just spoken, after 24 hours' reflection on the speech of his right hon. Friend, had attempted to answer the case which he had so elaborately made out against the Turkish Government. He was glad to see the Chancellor of the Exchequer taking a note of this particular point, for he should be happy to hear any defence of the Turkish Government, if any defence could be made; which, however, he did not think possible. The portion of the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich to which he referred had been passed over by the Home Secretary and the noble Lord, and he, therefore, assumed that they considered it unanswerable, and that they regarded the Turkish Government as responsible for the crimes which had been committed. Well, if the Home Secretary and the noble Lord so detested and abhorred those atrocities, they must equally detest and abhor the Turkish Government. The two things followed as a logical sequence; and there was no escape from the position. What, then, was the policy of Her Majesty's Government? Did they mean to support Turkey? Were they now as fully bent upon upholding the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire as they had been during the past year? Or did they not think that the time had come when some arrangement might be made by which the oppressed provinces might be better governed than they had hitherto been or were now by the effete and worn-out administration of the Ottoman? The noble Lord who preceded him in the debate had asked what was the policy of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich? but his right hon. Friend was not bound to have a policy. The Government, however, were bound to have a policy; and what was it? He had not the smallest conception of what it was. He had certainly been somewhat relieved by the speech of the Home Secretary; but what was the policy of that speech? It was a policy of strict neutrality. Well, strict neutrality was a very good policy for the time being; but what of the future? He wanted to know whether Prince Bismarck was spoken to, and if he entertained those fears of Russia which hon. Gentlemen opposite appeared to entertain. Did they suppose that this was the only country which had cause to fear Russian aggression? Austria and Germany were as much interested in the Danube as we were in the Bosphorus and Dardanelles, and they might be certain that neither Austria nor Germany would ever allow Russia to take possession of Constantinople or the northern provinces of Turkey. The Government knew what Prince Bismarck had said on this subject and ought to give some intimation of it to the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated some time ago at Edinburgh that all private Members were utterly ignorant of foreign politics.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I did not say so.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will inform us what he did say then.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: What I said was that a great many of them did not understand foreign politics.

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that when he read the statement attributed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer it struck him as a very strong one. He had sat in that House for 25 years, and had never before opened his mouth on foreign policy, yet he took a great interest in the subject. He admitted that private Members had not access to the documents to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had access; and therefore he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would give the House some insight into them, and tell them what were the opinions of Prince Bismarck with reference to Russia and the northern provinces of Turkey. Syria and the coast of the Mediterranean were matters of deep interest to France and Italy as well as to England. What was the policy of the Government as to them? Were they going to uphold the Turkish Empire inviolable with all its terrible consequences? If not, and if the knell of the Turkish Empire had sounded—which, for his part, he fully believed was the case—what was their policy?

Mr. Hussey Vivian

Egypt and the Suez Canal were of great interest to this country. He went further, and said that the Mediterranean shores of Asia Minor and the Euphrates Valley were also of great importance to us. Russia could not be allowed to take possession of Turkey. Were they prepared to re-establish the old Byzantine Empire? The Emperor Nicholas always said he was not prepared for that; and the Emperor Alexander had pledged his word, in the most solemn manner, that he had no desire for conquest; and surely our Government, if they did not desire to uphold the Turkish Empire, should be prepared with some policy in the event of that Empire being broken up. What was it to be? Did they propose to establish an Empire, a Kingdom, or a Confederation of States? He saw no reason why there should not be a Confederation. It worked well in Switzerland. They might depend upon it that they could not maintain the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire, and the country would never allow them to go to war again for Turkey. They were a strong Government and a united Party. He admired their unity; and it was only by unity that Parties were successful, and the sooner that was recognized by all the better. He had spoken strongly upon this Eastern Question; but whatever his convictions might be, he was not prepared to divide his Party on them. The Home Secretary had challenged them to say whether the people who attended the meetings held in support of the Resolutions of the right hon. Member for Greenwich were informed that the logical consequence of them was that a war would ensue between this country and Turkey? Now, he had attended a public meeting of his own constituents, very near the place where such heroism had lately been displayed by the miners, and he told the meeting that the logical consequence of the course recommended might be war. No resolution for war was put to the meeting; but he was firmly convinced these gallant men would, if the necessity arose, back any Government in this country in a war to prevent the recurrence of the inhuman massacres and the horrible condition of things that had subsisted for so many years in the Turkish Empire. If, on the contrary, the Government should ever be desirous to go to war in favour of Turkey, he wished to let them know that there was a Party in the House of Commons which would prevent them getting one farthing until they had taken the sense of the country on the subject. If the Conservatives wished to send the Liberals to the other side of the House with such a majority at their backs as they had never had before, they had only to go to the country with a policy of that kind.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down surely could not desire that the Government should have used threats to Turkey which they did not intend to carry out. Such conduct would neither have been honourable or conducive to the interests of the country, nor would it have had any effect on the attitude which Turkey had determined on all along, if Russia had gone into the war with Allies or not. The hon. Gentleman belonged to a Party which, for the last 15 years, had been preaching the doctrine that this country should not go to war on any consideration, however great the moral obligation might be, unless the individual defence of this country was concerned. [MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN: I beg pardon. I do not belong to any such Party.] Well, he (Mr. Percy Wyndham) had had the honour of sitting in that House for 17 years, and those were the sentiments which he had invariably heard from the opposite benches. Moreover, only two Sessions since, at the instance of the hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) that House affirmed a Resolution, supported by hon. Members on that side, that no dispute should henceforth be settled by war, but by arbitration alone. It would be a matter of regret if, owing to the Resolutions being brought forward in a mutilated form, it had not been open to the House to discuss the question in its entirety; but he was relieved from any apprehension of that sort by the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) and the right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), as the speech of the right hon. Gentleman went beyond the Resolutions in their present restricted form. The country desired the discussion of the question in its entirety, and the time had come when its discussion might take place without harm, and even with public advantage. The time for mediation and advice had gone by; negotiations had ceased, and therefore a debate could not interfere with them. Such a debate, too, would show that while some in this House could not sympathize with Russia, there was no Party or section of a Party anxious for war. Although it had been challenged in that House, he believed the conduct and policy of Her Majesty's Government had been in its main features consistent. They had stated distinctly that they would mediate and give advice, but that they would not go to war to enforce their advice; and therefore the policy which had acceded to the Andrassy Note, which implied advice and not coercion; the policy which had refused to join in the Berlin Memorandum, which implied the enforcement of its provisions; and the policy which had led to the Conference, had been all one and the same. Although, however, the Constantinople Conference had been in accordance with the policy of the Government, he thought it an unfortunate manifestation of their policy, and forced upon them by the action of Parties out-of-doors. The idea of the Conference was, that the family of nations could treat one of their number as a Government treated one of its subjects, and oblige it to give security to keep the peace, and bind it over to good behaviour. He denied the truth of that assumption. No Treaty or Convention had ever given such a power, and it was entirely fatal to the principle of nationalities; and it was to remove the assumption which Russia had set up 20 years ago that the 9th Clause of the Treaty had been passed. The Conference had proposed that the Government of the Sultan should be superseded in his own capital—but only so far as to divorce power from responsibility. But that was not all, for autonomy, in the Provinces had been proposed. We had no exact definition of the meaning of that word, as applied to Turkey, and he doubted whether even Lord Salisbury himself had ever really thought out how it was to be applied to the Christian Provinces. Now, if there was anything on which hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to be perfectly agreed, it was in maintaining that the Turks were morally effete; and if that were so, to endow such a people with autonomy would be absurd, for the moment the existing form of government was removed, the whole fabric must fall to the ground. Indeed, the great hope of Turkey lay in a few of her upper classes, who had reform in her administration at heart, and in the great bulk of her middle and lower classes, who were as honest and as fit for good government as any people in the world. Then there were the Christians, who were wanting in every quality which was usually found combined with governing power, and in whose case nothing but evil, in his opinion, could result from trying a scheme of autonomy which would entirely ignore the changes and past history of the country. It was all very well to take such men, and to propose, as had been done, to set them on their legs again, to see how they would get on; but whenever such a policy had been tried it had ended in failure. He denied altogether that this question could be decided on moral grounds alone. The right. hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had alluded again and again to the Bulgarian massacres, which every one deplored; but he had himself shown that even the most civilized nations, under the influence of panic, might commit cruelties which they afterwards deplored. With regard to the charge that the Turkish Government had employed irregular troops in order that the insurrection might be put down in the most cruel and effective manner, there was the evidence of Sir Henry Elliot to show that that course was taken by Mahmoud Pasha, acting upon the advice of General Ignatieff, who tried to persuade him that there was no insurrection, or danger of insurrection, in Bulgaria; and who, although he (Mr. Percy Wyndham) believed he would have hesitated to give such advice if he could foresee the cruelties to which it would lead, yet gave it as the enemy, not as the friend, of Turkey, knowing that the result of employing irregular troops would probably be to bring it into greater difficulties. A great deal had been said about the public meetings in this country: but he did not think public meetings, though largely attended, any great index of the feeling of the people in this country. There was a type of people who attended public meetings—a type found in all classes of society, and a great number of them in the Upper House. But the main body of the people did not care for public meetings. They disliked listening to speeches—and there was only one thing they disliked more, and that was making speeches themselves, and they never drew the inferences from them which hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to draw. No word more true was ever uttered than when the noble Earl (the Earl of Beaconsfield) declared that the war was the work of secret societies; a statement which they might well believe when they remembered that one society had an annual income of £50,000, one-sixth or one-seventh of which was contributed by the Russian Government, and that at its head was a Russian Prince of the Blood. It was a rule, moreover, of the Panslavonic society, that no man could receive aid unless he had first made himself politically obnoxious to the Government to which he owed allegiance. Not very long ago, under the Government of Lord Palmerston, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) was driven from office, merely because he allowed letters sent to a foreign refugee, who had made himself politically obnoxious to his country, to be addressed to the residence of the right hon. Gentleman. But while Russia was at peace with Turkey, a Prince of the Blood of the former Power presided over a society whose sole object was to subvert the Government of Turkey. Mr. Baring in his Report said—

“The deeds of blood I have spoken of and the misery I have witnessed must rouse just indignation in every mind; but the infamous conduct of those agitators, who, to serve selfish ends of States whose only object is territorial aggrandisement, have not shrunk from exciting poor ignorant peasants to revolt, thus desolating thousands of homes, and leaving a fine rich Province a legacy of tears, should not be allowed to escape without their share of execration.”

He was surprised to hear hon. Members opposite declare that Mahomedan feeling in India was indifferent from what was going on at the theatre of war. Had they not seen but lately that two contributions of £5,000 had come from Hyderabad and from Delhi towards the relief fund for the benefit of Turkish soldiers? But such questions must not be decided on small and perhaps accidental matters of that kind, but by the rules which prompted the action of communities under such circumstances; and if the force of Christian principles was strong enough to bring the Powers of Europe together at Constantinople, how could they venture to deny that the Mahomedans were uninfluenced by precisely the same feelings? He advised hon. Gentlemen opposite to take care lest, by their present course of action, they brought about the rise of a Mahomedan Power in India. He denied that this question ought to be decided by a comparison of Russia and Turkey. But if it was to be considered a moral question, he denied that we could not go into the past history of Russia and ask what she had done. Only the other day a Member of Parliament in his place had protested against any Papers being published that told against Russia. Russia, red with the blood of Poland, was the very last country in the world to whom should be entrusted the destinies of a weak people. In 1863 pickets were posted in some parts of Poland, and domiciliary visits were made, and 30 or 40 young girls were carried away in one night, children were massacred before their parents' eyes, and the wounded living were buried in one grave with the dead. If this matter was to be regarded only as a moral question between tyrannous Russia and wretched Turkey—whose sins, although great, were rather sins of omission than commission—that was a strong reason why we should look to our own interests as long as they were consistent with the interests of the world. If one talked of the interests of one's own country, one was regarded as deficient in humanity; but that was not his sentiment. Just as the best patriot was the best cosmopolitan, so that nation which respected its own interests and, if necessary, was prepared to defend them, was the best member among the family of nations.

Mr. LEATHAM: Mr. Speaker, although I do not aspire, Sir, like the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, to solve the Eastern Question in a five minutes' speech, yet, if the House will permit me, I should like to say a very few words upon one or two of the points which have been raised in the course of this debate. The hon. Member has not expressed much sympathy with the agitation of the Autumn; but the noble Lord (Viscount Sandon), who spoke with so much ability earlier in the evening, did express that sympathy, and so did the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in his powerful speech last night. Well, that is just what I should expect from the humane natures of the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman. But I think they had another sufficient reason for speaking warmly of this great outburst of public feeling, and it was this—that outburst of feeling was a perfect Godsend to the Administration of which they are distinguished Members, for it first gave the Government that lead of which up to that time it had stood sorely in need. For what up to that moment had been the course of the Government, if course we may call that which stands still? A mere blind clinging to phrases which had lost their meaning. The ancient philosopher made the discovery that the only thing he knew was that he knew nothing, and if we were to turn to the speeches delivered by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite during the Recess we should find one burden in them all—"The only thing we can decide is that we can decide nothing." [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen did not perhaps say so in so many words, but they enlarged and enlarged upon the difficulties which beset this question until they had proved to their own satisfaction that we were in the midst of a perfect labyrinth, and then they proved that the only way out of it was to remain just where we were. It was the people of England, "most of whom do not understand questions of foreign policy;" it was the "malignity" and "criminal folly"—those were the phrases—of the right hon. Gentleman who moved these Resolutions which created a policy for the Government—and when the policy was created, when it had been accepted by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, when he had decided to send Lord Salisbury to Constantinople in order to carry out that policy, and when he had abandoned the "integrity and independence of Turkey," he turned round, like the Parthian in his flight, and, as he galloped away, he shot them both in our faces! Now, Sir, I wish to express my regret that the Party to which I have the honour to belong, having achieved so much in conjunction with the popular voice, did not stop here. I venture to think that our true line at the beginning of the Session would have been to have said to the Government—"We have given you a policy—the policy of complete neutrality in case of war, the policy of an absolute renunciation of Turkey, and we intend by all the means in our power to hold you to it." Instead of that, what have we been doing? From the first day of the Session, at stated intervals, and at the hands of irrepressible Members, we have been making desultory and abortive attacks upon the Government; we have been nagging at the Government, we have been asking innumerable questions, which no one cared to answer, we have been making Motions about which no one cared to divide, and now we have a string of Resolutions, the most important part of which everyone rejoices to have been withdrawn. I say everyone, and I speak advisedly; for will it be contended that those who might have followed the right hon. Gentleman into the Lobby would have done so with very cheerful countenances? And, as regards those who felt compelled to vote against the right hon. Gentleman, why they would have given the most painful vote of their lives. I have sat in this House a good many years—longer than I like to think of—and during that period the right hon. Gentleman has had no more humble but no more steadfast adherent than myself. But I could not permit my admiration of the right hon. Gentleman, which has been unbounded, to blind my eyes to the fact that the third and fourth Resolutions of which he had given Notice were—I will not say mischievous, but—inopportune; more than that, they were dangerous. They were inopportune because they were sure to have been misconstrued abroad, and because they would have divided and weakened what I cannot but regard as the real party of peace and neutrality in this country. They were dangerous because there was war in them—possible war against Turkey, possible war against Russia; possible war against both! I desire not to misrepresent the right hon. Gentleman in any way; but I think I am right in saying that under certain contingencies the right hon. Gentleman contemplates armed intervention, and for armed intervention under the contingencies contemplated by the right hon. Gentleman I, for one, could never have voted. Granting everything which he dreads, and I dread it as much as the right hon. Gentleman; granting, if you will, that the war may terminate without any satisfactory arrangement for securing the liberties of the Christians; granting, further, that Russia may seek to recoup herself for the sacrifices which she has made by absorbing under her rule—a rule which I admit to be hateful—Provinces which I should desire to set free, what then? Are we to go to war to prevent it? and what, under such circumstances, would such a war be—call it by any fine name you please—but a war of mere sympathy? And when has mere sympathy been held to be an adequate motive for going to war since the evil days when we went to war in order to replace the Bourbons on the Throne of France—an instance which escaped the memory of the right hon. Gentleman last night. Sir, our whole attitude towards Europe has long ceased to be one of military menace—our whole military economy is planned for purposes of defence; and if there be one man in the country who is responsible for this state of things, it is the right hon. Gentleman himself. We have disenthralled ourselves from entering with a high hand into the councils of Europe. We have disqualified ourselves from taking part in great military wars, because under the guidance of the right hon. Gentleman we have refused to augment our Army in competition with the enormous armaments of the Continent. To interfere upon the Continent as we ought to interfere, if we interfered at all, we must become as Russia has become, as France and Germany have become—a nation of soldiers; but knowing that a nation of soldiers is never very long a nation of free men, we have made our deliberate choice between liberty at home and authority abroad—a choice which the right hon. Gentleman appears to me to have entirely ignored.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE observed, that simultaneously with the unseemly discussion carried on in the House last night a meeting was held at St. James's Hall, in consequence of the Notice the right hon. Member for Greenwich had given of his Resolutions. That meeting was called together in the interests of peace, and one of the speakers (Mr. Cohen) said—

"You know many of us hold that it was England's duty, as it would not have been contrary to her interests, to have put pressure upon the Porte not by mere useless words, but in a far more forcible manner. The Government actually opposed the only means that could have been effectual—namely, active coercion on the part of the Powers to carry out that which they demanded from the Porte.”

That meant, in plain English, that censure was to be cast upon the Government by members of the Peace Society for not having declared war with Russia against Turkey. He regretted that the right hon. Member for Greenwich was not in his place to explain whether he approved the language held at a meeting almost convened on his authority [“No”], or, at any rate, in support of his Resolutions. The right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) ought, with his opinions, to have moved a distinct Vote of Want of Confidence in the Government. These frequent discussions, which raised no direct issue, tended neither to the dignity of the House nor to the advantage of the country. Let him state briefly his own view of that Eastern Question. They had existing between Europe and Asia a Power alien in creed and in habits from the other Powers of Europe, and also a Power ruling over Christian subjects, whose rule, he admitted, frequently violated the feelings of humanity. It might be asked why, then, did he advocate a policy different from that of hon. Gentlemen opposite? His answer was that the most eminent statesmen of past and present times had always seen that there was a very great difficulty in the position of Turkey; and he warned those who, in that House or in St. James’s Hall, denounced the Turks and talked of a new crusade to exterminate them that they had not sufficiently considered what the Eastern Question really was. Turkey must be supported, to prevent any other nation from filling the place she occupied. What were the views of all thinking and responsible statesmen who had given their attention to that important subject? Even Lord Russell, whose humanity was not exceeded by that of the right hon. Member for Greenwich, said in October, 1867—

“The Crimean War was not a war for the defence of Turkey, but to oppose the designs of Russia. It is well known that the Emperor opposes all civil and religious liberty. I wish to see the people of Turkey entrusted with the government of their own country.”

In 1828, when Europe was placed in pretty nearly the same position as now, the Duke of Wellington wrote to the Comte de Ferronaye—

“The invasion of the Turkish dominions in Europe and the occupation of Constantinople must not be viewed in the same light as other invasions and occupations which we witnessed in our days. I am convinced your Excellency feels as strongly as I have already expressed it, that we are all interested in the continued existence in a state of independence of the power of the Porte in Europe. We are not prepared for its destruction.”

Again, writing to Lord Aberdeen, he said—

“If we look a little further at the case, we shall see still stronger reason for adhering to our Treaty. We mean to maintain the power of the Porte; and although we were ready to agree to the adoption of a mode of executing our purpose in Greece, consistent with the respect due to that Power, our concurrence in that mode was founded upon the necessity of coming to some settlement in Greece for the sake of the Porte itself. The independence of the Porte is important to all the Powers of Christendom. Its maritime independence, and particularly the independent exercise of sovereign authority in its own waters, is important to all the Powers of the Mediterranean and to all maritime Powers. The deprivation of this independent exercise of power, and the transfer of the responsibility for its exercise from the Sultan to the Emperor of Russia, is an alteration of the state of power in that part of Europe which is very important to the interests of this country.”

Surely that opinion would have some weight with hon. Gentlemen who thought that we ought not merely to stand aside and allow a blow to be struck at Turkey, but to join with the Russians in attacking her. Now, he came to a still greater authority—namely, Lord Palmerston, who, according to the admirable biography published by the hon. and learned Member for Poole (Mr. Ashley), “hated war, but hated humiliation more, and thoroughly understood the character of Russia.” Lord Palmerston wrote to Lord Clarendon in 1863—

“The policy and practice of the Russian Government has always been to push forward its encroachments as far and as fast as the apathy or want of firmness of other Governments will allow them to go, and always to stop and retire whenever it was met by decided resistance. In furtherance of this policy the Russian Government has always had moderate language and disinterested profession at St. Petersburg, and active aggression by its agents on the scene of operations.”

Lord Palmerston also referred to the expulsion of the Turks from Europe and the establishment of a Greek Empire in European Turkey. He said—

“Such a scheme would be diametrically opposed to the principles of policy on which we have acted. I have no partiality for the Turks

as Mahomedans, and should be very glad if they could be turned into Christians; but as to the character of the Turkish Government and its treatment of Christians, I am well convinced that there are a vast number of Christians under the government of Russia, Austria, Rome, and Naples who would rejoice to be as well treated and to enjoy as much security for person and property as the Christian subjects of the Sultan."

In 1828, it was proposed to found a powerful Greek Kingdom, and the Crown was offered to Prince Leopold, of Belgium, a man of rare sagacity, who might be described as the guide, companion, counsellor, and friend of other Sovereigns. Had he accepted the Greek Crown, what was called la grande idée might have been realized, and many subsequent difficulties averted. But who prevented that? The Russian Government of the day, who strongly advised Prince Leopold not to accept the Crown of Greece. With regard to the Eastern Question with which we were now confronted, it was to be borne in mind that the events out of which it arose were not the growth of a day. They had been growing ever since the Crimean War. The right hon. Gentleman himself (Mr. Gladstone) had been in office during the greater part of that period and nothing was done, although he must have been perfectly well aware of the state of things. By the recent agitation in this country Russia had been encouraged in her traditional policy. No one had a higher feeling of respect for the right hon. Gentleman than he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane), and he, for one, never supposed that the right hon. Gentleman was actuated by any mean or personal motive. But when the right hon. Gentleman stirred up the country by his speeches and pamphlets, he did not sufficiently consider what he was doing, and the result was, Russia was misled as to the real feelings of the English people with regard to affairs in the East. The right hon. Gentleman had, no doubt, acted from the best of motives, but the blunder he committed was a grievous one. All were agreed in sympathizing with the sufferings of the Christian population. Where they differed was as to what should be done. Language had been used that night which seemed to approve the course Russia was taking in making war against Turkey. That war was carried on in the name of humanity. It was well, however, to consider the character of the Power which, if Russia was successful, would take the place of Turkey. Was it a Power which had displayed such humanity as to justify the expectation that under it the races whose condition it was desired to ameliorate would be better governed and enjoy a greater amount of liberty than at present? The House had heard from the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) of the persecution which peasants in Poland underwent a few years ago, and had been told on the authority of Reports published in a Blue Book how men received 50 lashes, women 25, and children 10, because they would not change their creed. It was said that several Polish ladies had been sent to Siberia for using what was deemed audacious language with respect to the Imperial Government, and had been compelled to march part of the way barefooted. About the proceedings of the Russians in Central Asia, a good deal had been learnt from books which had lately been published. General Kauffman had issued orders that when tribute was not paid, every man, woman, and child should be put to the sword and their villages burnt. He would appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite to say whether the cause of humanity in Turkey was likely to gain much by the ascendancy of a Power which was guilty of such acts? Unfortunately, he could not say with regard to Turkey—"Let well alone;" but they ought at any rate to know, before the Turkish Power was destroyed, what sort of Power was likely to take its place. If they found from history that Russia had not been governed on those principles of humanity and liberty which they all cherished, they would do well to hesitate before they encouraged her in her present undertaking. The Opposition asked—"What are your views of the course that ought to be taken?" and this was a question which it was of course more easy for an independent Member than for Government to answer. For his part, however, he would say, without hesitation, that he thought Her Majesty's Government ought to interfere when they calmly and reasonably believed that British interests were threatened. It had been said that other European Powers were as much interested in the Mediterranean and the

Mr. Baillie Cochrane

Suez Canal as England. Had Austria, or Germany, or Italy, an Indian or Colonial Empire, and was it not the case that three-fourths of the shipping that passed through the Suez Canal was English shipping? He maintained that English interests were bound up with the independence of the Mediterranean, and that England would find it necessary to oppose any Power which threatened that independence. It was ostensibly for the sake of the Christian races in Turkey that Russia had gone to war, and as those races were only on one side of the Balkan range there would be no necessity for Russia, in pursuing her ostensible object, to set foot on the other side of the mountains. If she did, it could only be with the view of marching to Constantinople. But if she crossed the Balkan mountains, it would be the duty of this country to stop her. In 1853 Lord Palmerston wrote to Lord Aberdeen—

"I hope you will order the Fleet to go up to the Bosphorus as soon as it is known that the Russians have entered the Principalities"—for his part he (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) did not go so far as to say that—"and also to go into the Black Sea if necessary, for the protection of Turkish territory. This will relieve England from the disagreeable and not very creditable position of not venturing to the back as friends when forcible possession has been taken of the front wall by enemies."

And writing to Lord Russell in the same year, Lord Palmerston said—"We must defend England in Asia as well as in Europe." It was said there was really no danger. He heard it asserted on all sides that Russia had really no intention of going to Constantinople. In answer, he would quote the words that the Emperor Alexander himself had used in replying to a deputation. The Emperor said—

"There is not a single Russian but dreams of the capture of Constantinople, and I would sacrifice my last rouble and my last man to prevent Constantinople becoming the capital of a Greek Empire or belonging to any nation but our own."

Could it be said, after that, that there was no danger? Without saying, like Lord Palmerston, that the country ought to take action whenever the Russians crossed the Pruth, he was certain that England ought to interfere if they crossed the Balkan. Sometimes he heard people speak of compensation for the occupation of Constantinople by Russia. There could be no compensation for it, and any Government worthy of the name would rather spend their last shilling and shed their last drop of blood than suffer such an occupation—an occupation which would be disastrous to the interests, not only of England, but of the world.

MR. BAXTER said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had made a very strong attack on his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, in regard to what he chose to call the agitation of the Autumn. The hon. Gentleman, however, forgot that that agitation had altered to a very large extent the policy of Her Majesty's Government; so much so that the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) than whom he could conceive no better authority, had stated in the House that his right hon. Friend had reason to be proud, inasmuch as during the Recess he had dictated the policy of Her Majesty's Government. He (Mr. Baxter) was also proud of having done his little part during the Autumn and Winter to open the eyes of this country to the frightful misgovernment of the Ottoman Porte. He was astonished to hear the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) say to-night that the sins of the Porte had been those of omission rather than of commission; and that, after the atrocities in Bulgaria, and after all we have been reading now for a year past. He had taken part in some of the meetings which had taken place, and he had addressed his own constituents on the subject. He had also taken pains on the spot to investigate some of the causes which had led to the present lamentable state of affairs. He was not going to make a Party speech; he had been in the House over 20 years and had never made a purely Party speech. He had another reason for not doing so now, because he thought that in a matter of this sort they ought as far as possible, to show a united front to Europe. And, besides, he was not so wholly dissatisfied with the new policy and the present attitude of Her Majesty's Government as many hon. Gentlemen who sat on his side of the House. He could not agree with many of the remarks which had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) in the very warlike speech he had made.

Though he had not taken an active part in foreign politics he had paid a great deal of attention to this Eastern Question, and he claimed the right to say a few words to-night, as he was almost the first man in this country who had brought the state of Turkey before the House of Commons. On the 18th of June, 1875, he took advantage of a Motion made by the hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. J. R. Yorke) to implore the House of Commons and the people of this country to look into the dreadful state of things existing in Turkey, and he warned them of three things—first that the Ottoman Porte was bankrupt, and would never pay one shilling of the interest or principal of her Debt; second, that some of the Provinces of Turkey were ripe for revolt; and, third, that there was a general impression over the East that massacres were impending more dreadful than those which some years ago had disgraced the Government and population of Damascus. He admitted that those warnings were treated at the time with a good deal of ridicule, but he did not give utterance to them without some foundation. He was simply relating to the House the nearly universal testimony of men of all nationalities, of all creeds, and of all professions he had met on the shores of the Levant, many of whom had begged and entreated of him to bring before the House of Commons the rottenness of the Turkish system and the imminence of a great disaster. When he was in Turkey he did not see Sir Henry Elliot. Everyone told him he was a much greater believer in the Turks than the Turks were in themselves; but he saw a good many Turkish Pashas, and all those gentlemen went out of their way to tell him in the freest manner possible, that no one of them believed in the permanence of the Turkish Empire, and that they had not invested their money in Turkish bonds. Something had been said by the noble Lord opposite (Viscount Sandon) about our traditional policy in Turkey. He thought it high time that we should once for all change our traditional policy in the East. He was not one of those who thought they ought to throw stones at the Government in this matter. His hon. Friend the Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Grant Duff) said, we had been acting on imperfect information, and his remedy was to have more Consular authorities on the spot to keep them better informed. With all deference to his hon. Friend, he did not think it was there that the shoe pinched. It was very generally believed that proofs of Turkish misgovernment were never very welcome, however well-founded, either at the British Embassy at Constantinople or at the Foreign Office in London. It was a great mistake to suppose that it was only the Christians who had been oppressed in Turkey. The Mussulman peasantry, especially in the Asiatic Provinces, complained equally with the Christians of the undisguised venality and oppressive taxation of the Constantinople Government. That this was so was amply proved by the Report of Mr. Calvert, Her Majesty's Consul at Rustchuck, and the Special Correspondent of The Times at Bucharest, the latter authority speaking of the complaints of the Mussulman peasantry at being taken from their homes and driven to fight for the Constantinople Government. When the Resolutions were first laid upon the Table he felt at once he could not support them. The condition of the Ottoman Empire was, to his mind, so irretrievably bad that the second Resolution, as originally proposed, might have been objected to on the ground that by calling upon the Porte to give guarantees we were giving a moral and material support to the Ottoman Empire. That was a course to which evermore after this he would not be a party. Therefore, he gladly welcomed the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), who, he thought, expressed the sentiment of a great portion of the people of this country. So far from giving any moral or material support under any possible circumstances to the Ottoman Porte, firm and decided steps should be taken to get rid of all engagements, of whatever kind, which bound us to a corrupt, a promise-breaking, and a tottering Power. After the speeches of Lord Beaconsfield and of the Secretary of State for War in this House, he read with great satisfaction the speech, delivered "elsewhere," in which Lord Derby declared that Treaties were not supposed to be binding for all time. They were not like the laws of the Medes and Persians, which could not be altered, but should be revised or abrogated when no longer applicable to the situation of affairs. He, for one, had a complaint to make against the Government, which would be remedied if they would accept the second of these Resolutions as altered. They had never told the Ottoman Porte in language firm and decisive enough that their conduct in putting aside all Treaties, in condoning, if not sanctioning, the Bulgarian atrocities, and in assuming a tone of insolent defiance at the Conference, had put them beyond the pale of English sympathy. His criticism, founded on the Papers presented to Parliament, was not that the Government had not gone far enough in coercing Turkey, but that they had complimented the Turks, and had paid them what had been called "delicate attentions"—that they had spoken continually of the interest felt in this country in the preservation of the Ottoman Empire. Holding these sentiments, he could not defend the policy of the action, or rather the inaction, of Lord Derby, and much less the speeches of Lord Beaconsfield, which he very much deplored, and which had given great joy at Constantinople, and had done irreparable harm all over Europe. But the moment he read the first and second Blue Books presented to Parliament, and found the Instructions sent to our Ambassador at Constantinople, and especially the able and statesmanlike letter written by Lord Salisbury, dated, he believed, the 4th of January, he felt at once that he could not support a Vote of Censure, no matter from what quarter proposed. He wished to say emphatically—though he knew in that matter he differed from many hon. Members on his own side of the House—that he was not in favour of coercion of any kind. So far, he entirely approved the position of Her Majesty's Government. He was not in favour of coercion either with or without allies. His position for years had been that the armed interference of this country in the affairs of other countries had never turned out either to the advantage of oppressed peoples or to the benefit of ourselves. We had fought for the liberties of Spain, and every hon. Gentleman who had travelled in that country knew how we were regarded by Spaniards. We had never fought for the unity of Italy, yet every enlightened Italian regarded Great Britain as their firmest friend and their most valued ally. He was not prepared to support any Resolution which, under any possible circumstances, might cause the sacrifice of British life and treasure in a war in the East. More than that, he was satisfied that in the long run the Christian subjects of Turkey would suffer from any such action. He entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich with regard to the autonomy of the States on the Danube. The noble Lord the Vice President of the Council had said that if autonomy were granted to the States on the Danube, it would not stop there, because it would be claimed by populations in other parts of Turkey, and also in Asia. So much the better; because, satisfied as he was that the Turkish Empire was tottering to its fall, he believed that the creation of autonomous States was the only way out of the difficulty. He was not at all sorry that the Conference had failed, for he believed that the guarantees proposed by the Great Powers in that Conference would not in the long run have given satisfaction to the European Provinces which had been in revolt. He admitted that converting them into tributary States might prolong the existence of the Government at Constantinople; but every thinking man must look forward to far greater changes in the East than any which had ever been proposed in the Conference. A great deal had been said to-night about Russia; but he declined to follow the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) in regard to what he had said about the designs of Russia. That was not the question now; but it would be ridiculous for an advanced Liberal to profess any enthusiasm or admiration for a paternal despotism which had within its own bounds evils of great magnitude to redress. But he was not one of those who were either afraid or jealous of Russia. That great Empire had sources of weakness within her. She was greatly embarrassed by her great and injudicious conquests in Central Asia; she was embarrassed by her mighty armaments, which had emptied her Treasury and drained her resources; and also by the stifled, but ever increasing, demands of a part of her population for a free Press and for liberal institutions. Great Britain stood in far too high a position to be afraid of anything Russia could do; and he did not envy those politicians and those conductors of newspapers which were hounding on the people of this country, without any provocation, to consider Russia as an enemy. Indeed, he should find difficulty in properly characterizing the responsibility they had undertaken. It was easy to excite people's passions, and unfortunately the British public were bellicose enough without these journalistic incentives. His principal reason, however, for addressing these few observations to the House to-night, was to express an earnest hope that Her Majesty's Government would take no steps whatever, and yield to no temptation which would be inconsistent with their policy of absolute neutrality.

LORD ESLINGTON said, we had to consider to-night two lines of policy, and it was a matter of the gravest national importance that we should take our choice between them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had laid down, in the clearest language, the great object he had in view in recommending his Resolutions to the House. The right hon. Gentleman said that one of his main objects was to clear the position of the Government, and one of the points he would strive to establish was that that position was ambiguous. But he would say, without fear of contradiction, that in the policy of Her Majesty's Government there was no ambiguity. In speaking thus he confined himself to the policy enunciated by the Foreign Minister, because it was he who was the responsible Minister of the Government, and who had been charged with the conduct of those delicate and difficult negotiations. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary when he entered upon his difficult task was guided, as might be gathered from the study of his despatches, by three great principles, the first of which was that he would do nothing to interfere with or lessen the independence and integrity of Turkey. That was not a welcome expression to the ears of many hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. But who was it that rivetted upon the archives and the policy of the Foreign Office that great diplomatic principle? It was the right hon. Gentleman, who had invited the House to debate a new line of policy, and the Government over which he had so ably presided, when they re-established and re-sanctioned solemnly the principle of 1856 in 1871. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary when he entered upon his task felt that the honour, dignity, and good faith of England were pledged to that principle, and by it he was absolutely precluded from coercing Turkey, which some hon. Gentlemen said was the cause why the negotiations failed. The next principle which guided the noble Lord was the maintenance of the peace of Europe. Every honest man in the House agreed that the noble Lord had spared no effort to preserve the peace of Europe. The third point at which the noble Lord aimed was, so far as he was able to do so, to curb the ambition and to counteract the pretensions of Russia. That was the most difficult and most delicate task in which he had to engage, and it was most unjust to him that those who attacked the foreign policy of Her Majesty's Government should entirely ignore that difficulty. He did not for himself hesitate to say—and he believed there was not one Englishman in a hundred who did not think with him—that Russia as a Power was not to be trusted. Starting then from that position, he would proceed to notice what fell from a Gentleman who was not apt to fence his words. He meant the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain). That hon. Gentleman had studied politics; but he had not studied the published utterances of the Foreign Secretary. The hon. Gentleman had stated that Her Majesty's Government had "changed its policy in obedience to public opinion." He could disprove that statement, and would refer the hon. Gentleman to a speech made by the Earl of Derby not yesterday, not last year, but at a time long antecedent to this agitation. The noble Earl 13 years ago, when addressing his constituents at Lynn, had said that he could not understand, unless it were from the influence of old diplomatic traditions, the determination of our older statesmen to stand by the Turkish rule, whether it were right or wrong, and that it could not be desirable to make enemies of men who would soon be the dominant race in the East. These were the sentiments on which Lord Derby had acted ever since he had been Foreign Minister. Could anyone deny that his first thought had been the amelioration of the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte? The Government was now asked to state its policy. That was impossible. Their policy was in abeyance. They advocated neutrality absolute and distinct; but so soon as the war cloud passed away the amelioration of the Christians in Turkey would again become the object of the foreign policy of the Government. When hon. Gentlemen asked what was the foreign policy of the Government, he would ask them to consider what was the present condition of Turkey. Turkey was engaged in a deadly struggle, and that was his reason for refusing to be any party to a Vote of Censure upon her. The natural feelings could not be got rid of altogether; and if generosity was a trait of Englishmen, it surely would be ungenerous in her hour of peril and trial to pass a Vote of Censure upon our oldest and most faithful Ally. But, besides, it would be very impolitic for us to cut ourselves absolutely adrift from Turkey. What could we substitute for her in the event of her destruction? Such an event was possible; but those who regarded it without apprehension were very neglectful indeed of its consequences. It had often been said that we had paid Turkey many delicate attentions, but the despatch of the 21st of September last could hardly be regarded as a delicate attention; and if he had wished to say a word against Lord Derby's foreign policy, he should have thought that no friendly Government could have addressed such a despatch, which was, in truth, one of the severest possible condemnations of Turkey, but, perhaps, not uncalled for. He deprecated and thoroughly hated the system of outrage which it condemned; but he would ask those who preferred Russian rule to Turkish rule if they were prepared to compare the state of religious freedom in the two countries? It was due to Turkey that it should be stated in the House of Commons that religious freedom was as absolute there as it was in England or in America. The evidence of the American missionaries was clear on this point, and the Report of the Bible Society in 1873 said that everyone in Turkey might belong to his own religious community, Christianity might be taught without any molestation, schools were free, and Christian workers might adopt any method they pleased in their labours. That was good evidence as to religious freedom in Turkey. There was one grave charge against the rulers of Turkey—namely, the inadmissibility of Christian evidence into their Courts. Why was Christian testimony inadmissible? It was because the Legal Profession throughout the length and breadth of the land absolutely ignored it; and why? because it was absolutely contrary to the principles of the Koran. But people were to be taken as they were, and judged fairly; and it was but natural for a Mahomedan nation to be guided by the Koran. He listened very attentively to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich last night, and noticed one passage in it which had a dangerous tendency to counteract the action of the Foreign Secretary. For his own part, although the House of Commons might talk for a month, he did not believe in the pure intentions of Russia. The right hon. Gentleman, when he spoke of Syria and Bagdad, as much as said to Russia and her Generals—"Go on and conquer, and do not mind us." This afforded another reason why he should not vote for the Resolution, as he must decline to vote for anything which would give the slightest incentive, stimulus, or encouragement to Russian ambition. The policy of Her Majesty's Government had, in his judgment, been as clear as day all along—namely, the maintenance of peace and the protection of the oppressed communities. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) said last night that a nominal exercise of force would have been sufficient to influence Turkey. Now, he should like to know what was the meaning of a nominal exercise of force? A challenge of that kind was thrown out by the Home Secretary last night; but nobody had replied to it. It could only mean one thing, because whenever the mythical action failed force must be resorted to. He knew this country was not prepared to go to war for Turkey; but, on the other hand, it was equally prepared not to go to war for Russia. This was the reason why he designated the alternative policy proposed in the Resolutions as being much more ambiguous than the line of policy which Her Majesty's Government had pursued. He cordially joined in the sentiments expressed by his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary last night and reiterated to-night from the front bench opposite—that hon. Members should be calm and guarded in their expressions. They knew to their cost that the character of Englishmen was eminently bellicose, and required but little encouragement when war was waging to rise up in a warlike spirit on one side or the other. He trusted, therefore, that in the present and future discussions they would guard themselves against any expressions that would interfere with the position of neutrality which this country had so nobly and wisely taken up. For the reasons he had stated he preferred the policy, which had been consistent, manly, and prudent, of the Foreign Secretary to the ambiguous and, he thought, the dangerous policy contained in the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich.

MR. ROEBUCK: During the long period which I have passed in this House it has never been my fortune to take part in a debate more important than the present one. There is raging at this time a war, which may spread not over Europe only, but the world. A great Empire is at this moment on the brink of ruin, and the lives and fortunes of many millions of people are in the scales of fortune, and may be made most wretched in the result. That being the state of the case, a man whom this country has believed to be one of its greatest and most deserving and most patriotic Ministers at one time or another—that man, endowed with great ability, with vast power, with a winning manner, and whose influence in this House has been almost illimitable—has thought fit upon the present occasion to bring forward in this House a debate on which the interests of this country and of the world at large, as connected with the present crisis, are mainly dependent. He put upon the Table of the House many days ago five Resolutions as the result, I suppose, of patient consideration, and also as the result of great experience. He put those Resolutions on the Table of this House to discuss them. The Government, feeling the great difficulty of the position—the importance of the right hon. Gentleman who put forward these propositions, and the intense interest which the country took in them—gave him a day for their discussion. We all came down yesterday fully prepared to meet and discuss those Resolutions. Those Resolutions contained much that was very important, and which I, among the rest, believe to be vital in their influence on the interests of this country; and we were startled on entering the House to find that three out of the five Resolutions had been withdrawn from the Paper, or, at least, that there was an understanding come to between the Parties in this House that they should not be put to this House. In these circumstances, what is this House to do? Is it to maintain the feeling that it has hitherto held, of great respect and confidence in the opinion of that right hon. Gentleman? Is it to be said that a man who has lived his life in politics, who upon so great an occasion puts forth such important Resolutions as these, should upon a sudden find that he had made a most lamentable mistake? [Cheers and counter cheers.] If he has not made a mistake, why has he changed the Resolutions? But I am told that the conduct of the Government throughout all the matters connected with this Eastern Question has been very ambiguous. Now, when that is said by the right hon. Gentleman, has it never occurred to him to ask himself whether his own conduct will not bear the same epithet? What do these Resolutions mean? I read them carefully—and I studied them before coming down to this House to discuss them—and in the midst of a world of words and of much ambiguity I came to the conclusion that there was one thing which they did propound, and that was that the Ministry should determine to go to war. There can be no doubt upon that matter; and if there were a doubt before the right hon. Gentleman's speech last night, could there be a doubt after it? He did indeed say that he did not intend to propose the Resolutions; but he did not say that he would not discuss them. He, under the guise of having withdrawn them, and having told the House that he did not intend to propose them, felt himself relieved from a vast world of responsibility; but, nevertheless, he expressed his opinion. And what was that opinion? He cannot get out of the responsibility of that, if he can get out of the responsibility of the Resolutions. What he recommended to this House and to the people of this country—what he put forth to the world at large, was that the great people of

Lord Easington

England should upon the present occasion go to war with Turkey; and in alliance with Russia. Why did he come to that conclusion? Because Turkey, being a despotic country, acted as despots usually do, and maltreated its subjects. And upon whom were we to depend in our action against Turkey when we set forth in this battle of humanity? Upon whom did he tell us to depend for support? On a despot who did exactly the same thing as the right hon. Gentleman complains the Turks have done. ["No!"] I hear an hon. Gentleman say "No." Now, during the sitting of the Conference there were Petitions presented to the Conference from a large body of Mussulmans who were under the control of the Russian Government; and what did they describe as their condition under that Government? Our humanity is not, I suppose, confined to the Christians. I suppose if you saw a man at that table treated flagrantly, beaten, scourged, and maltreated in every possible way, you would not ask what his creed was; but you would say at once that the man who inflicted such punishment was a despicable person, and whether his victim was a Christian or a Mussulman, or anything else, you would pass the same condemnation on the oppressor. Now, these remarks apply, I maintain, to the conduct of Russia towards four of the Provinces under its control. I have the names in my pocket, and I will not trouble the House by reciting any passages from the Blue Book. It is said there that four Petitions were tendered to the Conference at Constantinople of 1876 and 1877 by Mussulman inhabitants of the Crimea and the Provinces of Kazan of White Tartary, Kurdistan, and the Circassians, in the West. The substance of these Petitions is given, and if any hon. Gentleman will read them—I do not know whether they appear at length in the Blue Book or not—he will find in them a description of horrors quite equal to any which have been committed in the Crimea.

MR. WHALLEY: I rise to Order, Sir. The House is engaged in discussing the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich; but the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield is now entering on a statement consisting of an attack on Russia, of which he has given no Notice. I ask, Sir, whether the hon. and learned Member is in Order under the circumstances in making a charge against a friendly ally of this country?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member is decidedly in Order.

MR. ROEBUCK: The interruption, Sir, deserves no further answer than that which you have given it. I was endeavouring to show that we are invited by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich to go into a war of humanity with persons who are as guilty as those who are attacked. Now, my argument against that advice is twofold. In the first place, it runs counter to the many Treaties which we have made; and secondly, if we begin a war of humanity we can have no end to our crusade. Now, as to Treaties. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Baxter)—he will perhaps allow me to call him my right hon. Friend—spoke of Treaties in a very light way. He said they depended upon circumstances, and that they ought to be abrogated on occasions when the occasion called for it. If that be our rule with respect to Treaties, the sooner we leave them off, I think, the better. When I enter into a contract I intend to fulfil it. I do not say that I shall change it when it suits my convenience; but having put my hand to it I am bound to perform its obligations. Now, this is the effect of the Treaties into which we have entered. We have bound ourselves to regard Turkey as an independent nation. We have bound ourselves to be no parties to any attack upon her independence. Now, I ask, Sir, as an honest people, not a people led away by any artificial excitement or any oratorical display, or by any attack upon our feelings—I ask if we, as an honest people, as one bound by our word of honour, whether we are at the present time justified in breaking that Treaty? But it will be said—"Those people do things which are abhorrent to humanity." True it is they have; but where, I would ask, is the nation in the world that has not done so? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) himself pointed to our conduct in the Indian Mutiny. I do not at all agree with what he said upon that; but I can very well understand that people under the control of a Government like that of Russia, if we were assailed, could have made these attacks upon us. What can we say of the conduct of the White Man to the Red Man in America? Is not that as atrocious as anything which has been recited in these debates? Our godly ancestors who left England for freedom's sake, the moment they got to America began to exercise every possible form of despotism. Among other ways in which they outraged the laws of humanity, they drove before them the poor Red Man, slaughtering him with their muskets, running him through with their swords, burning his wigwam, and actually starving him to death. They drove him from his hunting-grounds, and took possession of his patrimony. Have the Turks done more? And are we going in our crusade of humanity to address the Government of Washington and say—"Your conduct now to the Red Man is such as we humane people cannot possibly in any way permit; we intend to go to war with you because you have been inhuman?" To act in that way would, I contend, be just as wise and as justifiable a course to take as to break our faith and go to war with Turkey. The Blue Books have been quoted, and the conduct of the Government has been criticized in a small, narrow, pitiful way, somewhat more like that which takes place at Nisi Prius than as great contests are usually conducted here. We are supposed to be statesmen. We are called upon to take large statesmanlike views of questions, and in doing so we fulfil our duties. But when we desert this end and become mere pettifogging criticizers of the conduct of a Government under difficult circumstances such as the present Government are placed in, we no longer deserve the name of statesmen. Now, I have studied my countrymen for many long years, and tell those right hon. Gentlemen that they must not be afraid as to the results of their policy on the present occasion. When England understands that their object has been to maintain intact the interests of England, the interests of the world, and the peace of mankind, they need not fear the proposal of 4 or 20 Resolutions such as those which have been placed on the Table. On this occasion I feel I am not able to longer continue my argument; but I am convinced that if in this present occasion the Government opposite were to be weak—shamelessly weak—enough to submit to be dictated to by Resolutions of this sort, they would deserve to be hooted from that bench, and would no longer have, or deserve to have, the confidence of their countrymen. But let them fearlessly pursue the line of conduct which they have hitherto adopted, and the people of England will not fail to give them all credit. I have sat for a great number of years on this side of the House, and I found that on these benches there used to be a Peace Party. I recollect that during the Crimean War some gentlemen, representing the peaceful Quakers of this country, went to the Emperor of Russia, and of all the people in the world they used language which induced that great man to go to war with England. If it had not been for their conduct I feel pretty sure that the Czar of that time would not have done so—if he had not been misled about the feeling of this country. And of this I am quite sure—that upon the present occasion, in consequence of the great faith a large body of the people of this country have in the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich they have been entirely misled. I feel, however, confident that they will very shortly see how wise, how prudent, how just, how bold, has been the conduct of Her Majesty's present Government.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he should not have intruded himself upon the House had it not been for some observations which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) thought proper to make against himself personally. He had been sitting some time in the House listening with entranced attention to the eloquent and interesting speech of the right hon. Gentleman, when all of a sudden, to his great surprise, the right hon. Gentleman caught sight of him and directed against him one of the most vehement attacks to which he had ever been subjected, complaining in no measured terms of observations he had made about the right hon. Gentleman when addressing his (the Attorney General's) constituents at Preston. The right hon. Gentleman gave him a severe castigation, and the only consolation he had was that the right hon. Gentleman had had the kindness to elevate him to another sphere and had lectured him on the way in which he must then perform his duties. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman read the speech he made.

Mr. Roebuck

He did not make many. If the right hon. Gentleman did, he did him a great honour; and if he read that speech he hoped the right hon. Gentleman read some other speeches which he made previously to last Autumn; and if he did he (the Attorney General) thought he could not consider that of those speeches made previous to last Autumn he had any reason to complain. Indeed, he had set up the right hon. Gentleman in his own mind as an idol, which he might at a humble distance bow down to and worship; and he had told his constituents, not once, but frequently—not always to their extreme satisfaction—that he had the greatest admiration for the brilliant genius of the right hon. Gentleman, and that he was a man of most earnest and sincere convictions, and most desirous of accomplishing ends beneficial to mankind. But he said that previous to last Autumn. He had, however, like other people, studied the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the Government, and he supposed he was at liberty to form his own opinion as to the taste and temper which the right hon. Gentleman displayed. He thought he had fair ground of complaint of the tone of the right hon. Gentleman towards Her Majesty's Government. He could not forget that the right hon. Gentleman described in glowing terms, which made them all thrill with excitement, the horrors which had taken place in Turkey; and he could not forget that the right hon. Gentleman said that the Members of the Government were morally responsible and that they were culpable as well as the Turks.

MR. GLADSTONE: When and where did I say that?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was in the recollection of the House when he stated that the right hon. Gentleman made those accusations.

MR. GLADSTONE: When and where?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, if the right hon. Gentleman would have a moment's patience with him he would satisfy him. It was impossible for him to bring into the House all the right hon. Gentleman's speeches, to select all the paragraphs in which he made that accusation.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Give one.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he wished to draw the attention of the House, not to a speech made in a moment of passion and excitement, but to some extracts from a letter the right hon. Gentleman wrote to a meeting, which he believed was presided over by the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), on the subject of the Bulgarian atrocities. The right hon. Gentleman said he had described the conduct of Turkey with regard to her Christian population, he had described the horrors that took place, the massacres and the outrages practised upon the Christians, and he went on to say that the Government were deliberately using the power of the nation to frustrate its wishes. The right hon. Gentleman then said that—“After disparaging European concert for 12 months the Government had within the last few weeks begun to recommend it, and we were told of the necessity of bringing into union the views of all the Powers. When it was a question of favouring the Turkish Government against the Christian subjects we heard nothing of this necessity. Now, however, that the strong resentment of the country has made a continuance in this course impossible, a change of form seems to have been adopted without any change of aim, and the views of the other Powers began to be pleaded with a view of securing that the amount of good done to the oppressed should be as small as possible.”

The right hon. Gentleman said he did not impute motives. What was that but to say Her Majesty's Ministers were determined that the smallest amount of good should be accomplished for those subject-races? [Opposition cheers.] He supposed, from those cheers, that view was still entertained. And this letter was written, not in a moment of passion, but in the calm deliberation of the study, in which the right hon. Gentleman wrote so many letters. He (the Attorney General) was a follower of the Government, and he naturally felt indignant when he went to address his constituents that the right hon. Gentleman should have used such language. He regretted that he did make use of expressions stronger than he ought to have used. He did say that there was malignity against the Ministry in the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the Government. If he had to do it again, he certainly should not use such strong language, and he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman did not mean that the Government were aiding Turkey in her horrible oppression of the Christian population, or that they were desirous of doing nothing for Turkey. He believed that the right hon. Gentleman since he wrote that letter had come to the conclusion that it did not express the real state of the case; and that being so, he (the Attorney General) was sorry he made use of that expression. A great deal had been said about the withdrawal of the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions, and it must have cost him a severe pang to withdraw them. He admired the right hon. Gentleman's frankness when he told the House that, although he withdrew the third and fourth Resolutions, he believed that if anybody adopted his first Resolution, he would, by implication, adopt the others. He was not going to argue whether that was a fair inference or not, but one thing was clear and had been demonstrated—in fact, the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) made it perfectly plain—that what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich advocated was war against Turkey. There was the greatest possible distinction between the policy of the Government and the policy of the right hon. Gentleman—should he say of the front Opposition Bench. The policy of the Government was one of strict neutrality; the policy of hon. Gentlemen opposite who supported the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich was war and dismemberment of the Turkish Empire. What was the ground for that? Why did the right hon. Gentleman advocate it? He said there had been misgovernment—that in the Autumn, or, rather, in the Spring of last year, there were grievous massacres in Turkey—horrible deeds which made one shudder to think of them. It was perfectly true. He did not for a moment mean to mitigate the guilt of those who perpetrated those horrors, although they were instigated by those whose intrigues brought about the revolutions which had been made. Turkey had beyond doubt misgoverned her Provinces and made promises which she had not fulfilled, and, therefore, said the right hon. Gentleman, we ought to go to war with her. It was easy to make that assertion, but were there no objections to urge against it? In the first place if we went to war, would we not break our plighted word—infringe a solemn Treaty and interfere with the internal affairs of a foreign nation? A word as to our Treaty obligations. What he understood the right hon. Gentleman to endeavour to establish was this: that Russia had a Protectorate, or something like a Protectorate—he might call it a quasi-protectorate—over the Christian inhabitants of Turkey. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the Treaty of Kainardji, and said he could read it in Russian and Turkish, and he (the Attorney General) supposed in Greek and in Arabic. He read them a little bit in Italian, and stopping at a comma, he said the Treaty gave them the right of interference. In addition to that he cited the statement of a historian of Turkey and the opinion of a jurist whose name he (the Attorney General) did not remember. [An hon. MEMBER: Bluntschli.] Well, but they had the Treaty in English, and there were but two clauses in it which referred to the circumstances in which Turkey was now placed, or was placed in the year 1856, when the Treaty of Paris was entered into by the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a distinguished Member. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] Well, if not a distinguished Member, at least a strong supporter. What did the Treaty of Kainardji say? By the 14th clause Turkey gave Russia permission to establish in Constantinople, in addition to a chapel there, an additional church of the Greek Ritual under the protection of the Ministers of Russia, and undertook to secure it from all outrage. The 7th clause was—

“and it also allows the Ministers of the Imperial Court of Russia to make upon all occasions representations, as well in favour of the church at Constantinople, of which mention is made in the 14th clause, as on behalf of its officiating ministers, and that these representations will receive due consideration, as being made by a confidential functionary of a neighbouring and sincerely friendly Power.”

He (the Attorney General) had read the clause, which, it was said, gave Russia the right to interfere with the Christian population of Turkey, and what did it come to? Why, that all Russia was entitled to do, was to make remonstrances. He saw the Benches opposite bristling with lawyers, all well able to construe that Treaty, and he asked them whether any one of them would pledge his opinion that it gave Russia any right to interfere? There was an end of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. But there was more. In 1856, after the Crimean War was concluded, a Treaty was entered into, which had cost much blood and treasure; and that Treaty, instead of transferring any Protectorate or right of interference with Russia had to the Six Great Powers or any of them, expressly, distinctly, and positively excluded such right of interference. If that was so, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich on this point was perfectly futile. Was the Treaty of Paris, by which we engaged not to take any action which would interfere with the integrity of the Turkish Empire, binding or not? It was. You might go to war with Turkey if you liked—and the right hon. Gentleman would have his forces marshalled at once for that purpose. But do not let us go to war with the notion that Turkey had broken that Treaty, or that this country was absolved from her obligations under it. For his part, he had no other sympathy with Turkey than that which naturally arose from the fact that a weak Power was attacked by a strong Power. She had made promises which she had broken. She had not exerted herself as she ought to have done to prevent the atrocities which had been committed; but was that a sufficient reason why we should embark in a war with her? Was it, he would ask, the true policy of this country to interfere in the affairs of other nations and dictate to them how they were to control their own affairs? Englishmen sympathized with those who were oppressed and were struggling for their liberty; but those who were seeking liberty and deserved it could achieve it. If England was to embark upon this policy of interfering with every country that was guilty of misgovernment, where was she to stop? There were many nations, in addition to Turkey, which had made, and failed to keep, promises of reform, and which had trampled out insurrections by barbarous violence and brutality; but England had not interfered with them, and he failed to see why she should interfere now. If she did, she would find herself involved in a crusade which would have a tendency to embarrass her in every part of the world.

MR. LOWE: The House has just had the advantage of being addressed by two Gentlemen of the long robe; but I must say that I do not think they have treated us very fairly. I think the least they could have done under the circumstances would have been to treat the House as a special jury; but instead of doing that, they have addressed to us arguments of a character which are accustomed to be addressed to the very commonest of common juries. They have both told us, without the slightest attempt at proof of any kind, that my right hon. hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) is in favour of Her Majesty's Government going to war against Turkey. It may be so. My right hon. Friend, however, has himself said no; but the Attorney General may have, in the recesses of his legal subtlety, some means of proving what is thus denied. However, when learned Gentlemen make such statements as we have had to-night, I think they ought to be prepared with their proofs. As a specimen of the way in which the Attorney General has considered his case, he says that we want to go to war with Turkey, because of these questions about the churches. I will not go into that part of the case, but the relevancy of this question about the churches is this—it is contended that before the Crimean War Russia had some sort of right of protection over some bodies of Christians; that that right was abolished by the Treaty of Peace made after the Crimean War, and it is argued therefore that we ought to have taken care that that right was vested in some other Power. Whether Russia had that power or not is no part of my argument. I only mention it in order to show how the Attorney General has considered his case. I find myself in considerable difficulty with regard to the Resolutions of my right hon. Friend, because, after the splendid oration in which they were brought forward, I can add little in support of them; but, at the same time, I feel that, unless something is said from the bench from which I have just risen, a false impression may grow as to the feeling entertained by the usual occupants of that bench concerning them. My opinions have always been identical with those Resolutions. I took some share in the movement of last autumn, which caused Lord Beaconsfield to compare me with Chefket Pasha and Achmet

[Second Night.]

Aga. I would say now what I said then, that what we have to do is not by any means to go to war with Turkey or to interfere with her in any way, but to wash our hands of her, and to let her drift where her destinies may carry her. I now pass to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), which declares that the House declines to entertain any Resolution which may embarrass Her Majesty's Government in their efforts to maintain the peace and for the protection of British interests. This Amendment contains more than appears at first sight. It is pregnant with the assertion that Her Majesty's Government is at this moment, or has been hitherto, engaged in the maintenance of peace and in the protection of British interests, and that those interests are perfectly safe in their hands. I am very sorry that that is a proposition that I at least am unable to agree in, and I will give the reason why I am unable to agree with it, and it appears to me that the fairest way to do this is to examine what has been the conduct of Her Majesty's Government hitherto, and to ask whether they have so acted as to promote British interests, and if they have not I cannot agree in the assertion that they have done so. Now, the best way to test this is a very vulgar and a very coarse one, and that is to take the criterion of success. What has been the result of the labours of Her Majesty's Government? What is it they have wished to do; and what is it they have accomplished? As to the objects they have had in view, I think they have had a wish to maintain the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire—at least, they have often said so; and I think they have desired to maintain peace in Europe. They have had a wish, probably, to keep together the combined action of the Six Powers, so that they could all act together. I think that they wished probably to obtain guarantees for the future. I think that they had in view to take the lead of Europe, and to direct its councils, and I cannot doubt that they desired to maintain peace. Now, it does so happen that in all these things Her Majesty's Government have signally failed. There is not one of them in which they have not entirely failed. The next question I ask myself is, why have they failed? Giving them credit for all good intentions, which I am quite willing to do, why have they failed? I think it is not difficult to show what are the causes which have led to the failure. I cannot say I think the failure can be traced to any particular perversity of fortune or circumstances. All the circumstances were very favourable. I cannot doubt that the Emperor of Russia was very sincerely disposed if he could to maintain peace. We could judge that by his character and all the incidents of his reign. I cannot believe that Turkey, on the other hand, in her bankrupt state, and other difficulties, could have had any real desire to go to war. It is quite certain also that no other of the Great Powers of Europe—neither Austria, France, nor Italy—could have had the least wish to break the peace. Therefore, I think Her Majesty's Government started very fairly on their enterprize, and that they had a fair chance, as far as the circumstances would permit, of an ultimate success. Then, why did they not succeed? I trace their want of success mainly to the fact that they have always had, as it appears to me, at least three policies going at the same time. I trace it further to the fact that they have carried on a system of concealment, and kept their conduct back from the public in a manner exceedingly injurious to their own interests. I trace it further to a certain want, as I must say, of ability and care in the negotiations which they have conducted. I admit that these are all mere assertions; but I will now go on to see whether the facts do not bear them out. There is one other cause which has assisted to bring about a failure of their plans, and that is their persistent hostility and animosity towards Russia. Now, when I say the Government had three policies I mean this—There was the policy of systematic friendship for Turkey and animosity against Russia—that was the policy, I think I may fairly say, which represents the Prime Minister. Then there was the policy—well, I will not say so much of hatred to Russia—but a policy which consisted very much in doing as little as possible, and when anything was done, doing something to counteract its effect, always leaning to Turkey against Russia: I think that was the policy of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. I think there is one very much like that advocated by those who sit on this side of the House, and that the Marquess of Salisbury represents. These three policies have been alternately surging up to the top, and have proved a great power for mischief. Let us now see if events which have happened do not bear out what I say. In the first place, there was the Andrassy Note. Lord Derby agreed to the Andrassy Note, but he took care to couple with it a statement that he only agreed to it because the Turks concurred in it, and that took all the grace out of the concession. The next step was the Berlin Memorandum, and this seems to me have been the turning point in this matter. It contained all the principles upon which a sound and fair settlement of this matter might have been arranged. Everything was provided for, the union of the parties, pressure on the Porte, and the demand for sufficient guarantees. That, again, was refused, and it was refused on grounds which, so far as I can find, took no notice of any of the great principles involved in that document; it was rejected upon small and technical details. Then broke out that kind of animosity towards Russia which I am sorry to see has continued so long after. There was a separate despatch, devoted to a querulous sort of complaint of the manner in which this matter had been brought before this country. That was an opportunity lost which never returned. Then the next thing that happened was what were called the Bulgarian atrocities. I do not mean to dwell upon them at any length. They were treated in this House with a levity which shocked every one. ["No, no!"] It was only reluctantly, inch by inch, that the truth was admitted, and, of course, when once established, it could not admit of any levity. The matter, however, was arrayed in such a way as to convey the idea that the sympathy of the Government was not with the unfortunate victims of these horrible atrocities. The result of that was that the country rose in that spontaneous movement and made such a demonstration that the Government felt themselves obliged to yield to it. They did yield, and on the 21st of September we find a letter written by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the Porte, sufficiently strong in denunciation of these atrocities. But look at the curious perversity that was going on all this while. While this was being done, while these accusations were being made, the Government seemed to be at the utmost pains to conceal the whole matter from the public mind. The Prime Minister spoke at Aylesbury, in bitter defiance of public opinion, at the very time that Lord Derby must have been engaged in preparing that document, which protested in the most indignant language against those outrages. Lord Derby himself received deputation after deputation without giving them the least reason to suppose that he felt any cordial sympathy in the matter. What was the possible use of all this concealment I cannot conceive. It went on not merely till the 21st of September, but it went on up to the very time of the celebrated Guildhall speech. Up to that time, everybody who took an interest in the matter was under the supposition, created by the speeches of the Prime Minister, that it was the intention of the Government to take up arms in defence of Turkey against Russia. ["No, no!"] That was the predominant feeling throughout the country, and it was due entirely to the reticence and concealment on the part of the Government. Look at the Guildhall speech. That was made at a time when Lord Salisbury's instructions, which contained everything that the most ardent admirer of the oppressed nationalities of Turkey could desire, were being drawn up. But how did Lord Beaconsfield behave? He went down to Guildhall with a letter containing the most conciliatory overtures from the Emperor of Russia in his pocket, which letter he never chose to mention to the public at all. He referred then to the mission of Lord Salisbury. We find that the noble Lord was told that his business was to go to Turkey, not to hear and right the wrongs of the oppressed Christian subjects of the Porte, but to maintain the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire. Lord Beaconsfield then spoke in a manner which cannot be easily forgotten of the military resources of England, and upon our capacity for continuing successive campaigns in a manner which everyone understood to be a menace to Russia. I do not say it was so, for I speak as an outsider, who could not know the noble Earl's sentiments; but every one understood it as a menace, and I believe to this moment that it was meant as a menace to Russia. That was the conduct of Lord Beaconsfield; but his policy was much better than he pretended it to be, for while they were acting the part of violent enemies of Russia and as the friends of Turkey, the Government were really taking praiseworthy measures for trying to remove the evils of the Christian subjects of the Porte. I and Gentlemen on this side have no right to complain of being kept in ignorance on this point. Of course when I fall into the hands of my enemies I must bear the injuries they inflict upon me; but those sheep, what have they done? There were a number of hon. Gentlemen who, with the best intentions, and with great eloquence, and great research, were making speeches exactly in a contrary sense. There has been nothing like it since the story told by Sidney Smith; "they sang the wrong song, they drank the wrong beer, they made the wrong speech, they cracked the wrong heads." They went against their own policy. Why did they make their best friends ridiculous in this way? I cannot answer the question. I have no idea what they meant. Then came what I may call the lucid interval in the conduct of the Government. That is the period when Lord Salisbury was sent on his mission to Constantinople. His demeanour was worthy of a great British Envoy, and he comported himself with the utmost dignity and propriety in the whole matter. But when he returned, and the whole thing was over, although it had been said that guarantees would be given for what was required being done, it was found that no guarantees had been given, and that the whole thing had fallen through. Soon after that, the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) challenged us all to move a Vote of Censure on the Government; but at that time I, for one, never felt less inclined to move a Vote of Censure on Her Majesty's Government in my life. They seemed to me to have been making really praiseworthy efforts to set matters to rights, and to be by no means worthy of censure; and if anyone, acting on the suggestion of the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire, had proceeded to move such a Motion, I, for one, should certainly not have voted for it, and I believe many other hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House were of the same way of thinking; because the Government had come round to our way of thinking, that the Bulgarians had suffered cruel injury, and because, moreover, the Government had done their best to remedy these wrongs. It is only an instance of how greatly people may be deceived, and puts me in mind of nothing so much as the story, in Victor Hugo's Notre Dame de Paris, of the man who, in his anxiety to save a person's life, kills all those who come to the rescue. So much for what I have termed the lucid interval of the Government; but somehow or other they soon began to retrograde, and speedily returned to a state of things worse than ever; and the next point to which I wish to call attention is the episode of the Protocol. Now, I have quoted one instance of the treatment of Russia at the hands of Her Majesty's Government; but here is another even more striking than that. Russia induced Her Majesty's Government to sign a Protocol for the purpose, if possible, of averting war. Well, Lord Derby agreed to sign it, but he immediately annexes to it a statement "that inasmuch as it is only in the interests of European peace"—just what I have before said, that whenever the noble Lord does anything which might be productive of good, he immediately follows it up by some act likely to destroy all benefit from what he had previously done, and in this case I contend that nothing could have been more insulting to Russia than his action in that matter—"that Her Majesty's Government had consented to sign the Protocol. In the event of the object not being attained of reciprocal disarmament"—a matter which had not been stipulated at all in the Protocol, but which was merely a suggestion proposed by the English Government for the acceptance of Russia—"that then the Protocol shall be null and void." Lord Derby must have known perfectly well that by putting his signature to that it was in his power to destroy and make null this Protocol, and I contend that not only was that an insult to the feelings of Russia, but that it would actually frustrate the effect of any document, the most important that could possibly be signed by the Powers of Europe. From that moment war was decided on, and there was no more hope of making peace, mainly, as I contend, on account of this act by which we entirely cut off all prospect of any further common action between the Powers. Once more the concert of Europe was broken by our act, all possibility of reconciliation put an end to, and an offence given to Russia which very naturally she must feel very deeply. Then, the last thing, and, probably, the worst, is the document we have just seen published as the Answer to the Circular of Prince Gortchakoff declaring war. It says—

“With the view of enabling Russia the better to abstain from isolated action, the Protocol affirmed the interest taken in common by the Powers in the condition of the Christian population of Turkey.”

What an invidious way of putting it. It is quite enough that the thing was done. Then it went on to say—

“Her Majesty’s Government cannot admit, as is contended by Prince Gortchakoff, that the answer of the Porte removed all hope of deference on its part to the wishes and advice of Europe, and all security for the application of the suggested reforms. Nor are they of opinion that the terms of the Note necessarily precluded the possibility of the conclusion of peace with Montenegro, or of the arrangement of mutual disarmament. Her Majesty’s Government still believe that with patience and moderation on both sides these objects might not improbably have been attained.”

In their Instructions to Lord Salisbury they had declared that nothing could be done without guarantees; and yet when there was no guarantee whatever, but merely a vague and general statement as to the wishes and hopes of the Powers, they taunted Russia with having broken off from the European concert, stating their belief, for which I see no foundation, that they saw no reason why the thing should not have gone on, and that still the matter might have been brought to a successful issue—that very issue which they themselves had so fatally disturbed by the Declaration cancelling the Protocol, as far as England was concerned. Then they went on to say of Russia’s action—

“It is in contravention of the stipulations of the Treaties of Paris of March 30, 1856, by which Russia and the other signatory Powers engaged, each on its own part, to respect the independence and the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire.”

Well, we have had the advantage of hearing the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War on that subject when he told us that it would be absolutely wicked if we deviated from these Treaties; but when he addressed us on another occasion he changed his note—he was still very strong on the point of wickedness, but then the wickedness would be solely if we do not consult our own interest. They seem to have forgotten the statement of Lord Derby that Treaties are not immortal, they grow old like everything else, and the idea of Treaties being binding for ever is quite obsolete and absurd. And yet this is made a bitter ground of complaint against Russia. Then, again—

“The Emperor of Russia has separated himself from the European concert hitherto maintained, and has, at the same time, departed from the rule to which he himself had solemnly recorded his consent.”

This is very strong language to be used by one Sovereign to another when we are supposed to be in amicable relations. And when it was alleged that Russia had separated herself from the European concert hitherto maintained, who was it that had really separated themselves from that concert? Why the Six Powers signed this Protocol, and then one of them signed a declaration to the effect that it would be void under certain contingencies? And that Power was England; and then they turn round and use that bitter and insulting language to the Emperor of Russia, adding—“It is impossible to foresee the consequences of such an act.” What was that but a direct threat against Russia? A war has broken out between Russia and Turkey, and what further consequences can it be supposed were there intended, unless it was that we were to go to war against Russia? Lastly, Her Majesty’s Government said—

“They feel bound to state, in a manner equally formal and public, that the decision of the Russian Government is not one which can have their concurrence or approval.”

They were never asked for their concurrence. There was not the slightest necessity for their answering that Circular at all. It was issued to all the Powers. None of the other Powers, I believe, have answered it; and there was no occasion for our Government to have answered it. Unless it was intended to embroil us in our relations with Russia, why it was answered in that peculiar, bitter, and insulting manner, I cannot understand. Well, I have now gone through my reasons, and I ask the House whether I have not shown them a universal failure in everything that has been undertaken by the Government. It has not been a fortuitous failure, owing to matters that could not have been controlled; but it has been the result of a series of blunders, of mistakes, of faults of temper and of judgment, of useless concealment, without calling in that much-abused power, Fortune, to account for it. Well, Sir, in this state of the case, how can any man of good sense vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff)—that is, to abstain from stating opinions in regard to the state of Turkey for fear we should interfere with the the management of the foreign affairs in the hands of Her Majesty's Government. Why, if there was any possibility of interfering, bad as things are, there might be some hope for us. At any rate, if we cannot alter it, do not let us do ourselves the absurdity of saying we are satisfied with the management that has brought us to this pass, and are so satisfied that we all forbear from stating what we know to be a true and righteous opinion, for fear that by doing so we might derange the admirable state of management and organization which has brought us to this pretty pass.

LORD JOHN MANNERS remarked that in supporting the Resolutions of the right hon. Member for Greenwich, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had done so on the ground that they ought to wash their hands of Turkey, the very thing which the author of the Resolutions had himself argued they could not justifiably do. Those Resolutions had been supported by Gentlemen who wished to plunge this country into a war against Turkey, and to interfere forcibly in the internal affairs of that now distracted Empire. Having, however, summarily disposed of the Resolutions of his own right hon. Friend for which, nevertheless, he was going to vote, the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last had devoted the rest of his speech to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), which he had opposed, as he said, for three reasons. The first was that Her Majesty's Government during the whole of those protracted and troublesome negotiations had pursued three policies, and he had been kind enough to name the three Members of the Government who were severally responsible, as he had alleged, for those three different policies. It struck him that, as there were 12 Noblemen and Gentlemen in Her Majesty's confidential service, the right hon. Gentleman might just as well have said that during the negotiations they had had 12 policies, and might have proceeded to name the 12 Members of the Cabinet. The right hon. Gentleman's second reason was that they had concealed their policy. That was one of the most extraordinary charges ever heard of. Why the Government had been taunted with having made their policy so plain that it was impossible for the country to overlook it or to support it—that of maintaining the independence and integrity of Turkey—and at the same time hankering after peace, which was considered in the eyes of some a grave offence. The right hon. Gentleman said there was a very general belief in this country that they intended to take up arms in favour of Turkey, and they had carefully concealed from the country that they had no such intention. But what was the fact? From the first the Turkish Government was informed that England did not intend to give them any material assistance, and the whole country was aware of it. There could not be a single person in the Kingdom who did not know that the Government had no intention of taking up arms for Turkey. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the speech of Lord Beaconsfield at the Guildhall as a menace to Russia, but that was not a just construction to put upon it. Lord Beaconsfield commenced by some most graceful compliments to the peaceful disposition of the Emperor of Russia; and if at the close of his speech he alluded in no boastful manner to the power of England, and said that if called on to wage war it would not be in one or two campaigns that her resources would be exhausted, he should like to know what threat was there contained against the Emperor of Russia? He met the statement of the right hon. Gentleman on that point with a distinct denial. The right hon. Gentleman's third point was that they had displayed an inveterate hostility to Russia. But, if there was one thing more than another which people were disposed to find fault with during the latter months of the year, it was that while the Conference at Constantinople was going on, very great deference indeed was paid to all the wishes and propositions of Russia. There was, in fact, nothing approaching hostility to Russia, and the English and Russian Plenipotentiaries were on a most cordial and harmonious footing during the whole of that trying period. But the right hon. Gentleman found hostility in the Protocol and the Declaration which Lord Derby appended to it. The answer to that was that the Protocol was a Russian document, submitted to them by Russia with the express object of enabling her to retire without any self-felt disgrace from the armed position she had so unfortunately taken up, and that the Declaration was perfectly well known to the Russian Ambassador as part of the whole transaction. Moreover, did the English Declaration stand alone? There was the Italian Declaration and the Russian Declaration; and if they were to be told that the English Declaration manifested hostility to Russia, to what, he should like to know, did the Russian Declaration manifest hostility? It might be that the terms in which the Russian Declaration was drawn up were so haughty, so unsatisfactory to the Ministers of the Sultan, that it brought about the failure of the Protocol; but certainly, as far as the English Declaration was concerned, the Protocol never was in the slightest jeopardy. Then the right hon. Gentleman pronounced Lord Derby's answer to Prince Gortchakoff's Circular to be insulting and severe, and said Her Majesty's Government ought never to have answered that Circular at all. But, considering the part England had taken in all these transactions, it was impossible for her to pass by that Circular without taking due and legitimate notice of it; for in that document Prince Gortchakoff claimed to act for England and the other Powers of Europe in the war she had already declared against Turkey; and if Her Majesty's Government had not taken occasion to deny that claim, they would have been held by the country and by Europe at large to have authorized Russia to go to war with Turkey on their behalf. That was his vindication, if vindication was necessary, of the terms of Lord Derby's answer to Prince Gortchakoff's Circular. Now, he wished to discuss for a few moments the Resolution and some sentences in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. First of all, he desired to make a short personal explanation. In the course of his speech the right hon. Gentleman asked why the Government had not produced Papers showing the atrocities that had been committed in the suppression of the Indian Mutiny? He also asked why Government had not produced a certain despatch detailing the cruelties with which a revolt in Cephalonia had been put down. With regard to the latter, he wished to say that he had since found that a Paper which he handed over to the right hon. Gentleman, under the impression that it was the one to which reference had been made, was a despatch from the Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, but not one received from the right hon. Gentleman when he held that office. The right hon. Gentleman accused Her Majesty's Government of "shabby" conduct, inasmuch as they had placed on the Table, at the instance of an hon. Gentleman who sat on the other side of the House, Papers relating to cruelties perpetrated by the Russian Government on its own subjects in Poland, and had not also laid on the Table Papers connected with the cruelties of which this country was guilty in the suppression of the Indian Mutiny. If any Government were to be called "shabby" for not producing those Papers, it could not in justice be Her Majesty's present Government. The right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues were in office when those cruelties were committed, and when, no doubt, the despatches on the subject were received; and they might subsequently, when in office for many years, have produced the Papers if they had thought fit. But was it to be understood that it was "shabby" for a Government to produce Papers which were called for in the ordinary transaction of business by an hon. Gentleman who owed them no official support, because they detailed cruelties committed by a Christian State upon its Christian subjects, and that it was not "shabby" to produce every tittle of tale and rumour that could be extracted from Consul or Vice Consul, provided the Government to which it related was Mussulman, and not Christian? The shabbiness of the transaction was certainly not to be found in the description given of it by the right hon. Gentleman. Now, with regard to the arguments which the right hon. Gentleman employed in moving his first Resolution, it seemed to him they ought to have culminated, not in a Vote of Censure on the Government of Turkey, but in a Vote of Censure on the Government of England. The whole speech leading up to the Resolutions was one long arraignment of the Government of this country; the product was a censure of the Government of Turkey. But how was this Resolution, this Vote of Censure, to be conveyed to the Government of Turkey? Why, it would remain another of those dead letters, another of those pieces of waste paper upon which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich bestowed so much sarcastic eloquence. With regard to the second Resolution—for he supposed the first must be looked upon as in reality only a Preamble to the second—it pledged the House, as he understood it, for all time, against rendering any material or moral support to Turkey. As to material support, Her Majesty's Government had said from the first that it was not their intention to offer any. There had been, and could be, no mistake on that point. As to moral support, it would have been well if the right hon. Gentleman had defined what it meant. It was proposed to pass this Resolution and tie it, as it were, round the necks of Her Majesty's Government, to hamper their actions for the future, although the House had had no definition of the "moral support" which was never, in any circumstances, to be rendered to Turkey. But the right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his speech, seemed to suggest what was in his mind when he talked of moral support. Mr. Layard had been sent to Constantinople as an Ambassador, and the right hon. Gentleman seemed to find great fault with that appointment. Was the sending of Mr. Layard to Constantinople an instance of the moral support from which Government would have been debarred, if this Resolution had been accepted previously by the House of Commons? Was good advice tendered at Constantinople by an Ambassador, be he Mr. Layard or anybody else, moral support? He concluded that it was. The sending of the Fleet to Turkish waters had been a great offence. The right hon. Gentleman had never forgiven it. Well, it might be that in the discharge of their duty to the country Her Majesty's Government might have occasion again to send a British Fleet, if not to Besika Bay, at any rate to Turkish waters. Would that be the moral support to Turkey which was condemned by anticipation in this second Resolution? It was a curious thing that in Lord Palmerston's "Life" there was a private letter of his, written in 1849 to Sir Stratford Canning, in which he spoke of sending a Fleet to Besika Bay as moral support to Turkey. There was reason, then, to ask right hon. Gentlemen opposite to define a little more clearly what they meant by withholding all moral support from Turkey. These two Resolutions, even if the third and fourth were abandoned, were entangling and insidious Resolutions, calculated, if not intended, to weaken the hands and impair the action of Her Majesty's Government, in contingencies which could not be foreseen, but for which the Government should be left free and unfettered. Had the debate shown that the third and fourth Resolutions were absolutely and morally abandoned? Quite the reverse. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) had shown that three-fourths of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich referred to these third and fourth Resolutions, and there had been no attempt on the part of the subsequent speakers to deny the inference deducible from that fact. The speeches of the hon. Members for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian), Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), and Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), all stated distinctly that these Resolutions intended war against Turkey. The third and fourth might be technically withdrawn, but in spirit they were alive; the Resolutions might be sent to a Parliamentary purgatory, but their flavour still permeated the walls of this Assembly. Quo semel est imbuta recens servabit odorem Testa diu. While talking about the Protocol which was rendered harmless by Lord Derby's Declaration, let them look at that which was held up for their admiration in the four suspended Resolutions. The Protocol of 1826 had no safeguard attached to it as had that of 1877; the Protocol of 1826 led to the Treaty of 1827, that to the untoward event of Navarino, and that to the campaign of 1828-9 and the disastrous Treaty of Adrianople; and it was that Protocol of 1826 and the Treaty of 1827 they were now invited to imitate, emulate, and copy. When this was made clear to the people of England there would be no outcry in favour of imitating the Protocol of 1826. The Protocol of 1877 having lapsed through the action of Russia, aided by the unfortunate obstinacy of Turkey, Europe found herself once more free—England, Austria, Turkey, Italy, and France were free. Countries that agreed to the Protocol were also free in their Legislative Assemblies; but in neither Austria, Hungary, Italy, nor France had any right hon. Member for Greenwich proposed Resolutions to goad or hinder the action of the Government; and it was reserved to the right hon. Gentleman to attempt to fetter and humiliate the Government of his own country, which he did not seem disposed to challenge in a more direct manner. He had mentioned Hungary, which seemed to have lost the sympathy of the right hon. Gentleman; but Hungarian patriots owed a deep debt of gratitude to the “anti-human Turks;” and it might be that the Hungarians of 1877 were not thinking merely of their own interest, but were actuated by the nobler sentiment of gratitude. The position in which we found ourselves was this—that by the obstinacy of Turkey and the fatal precipitancy of Russia, the concert of Europe was destroyed and war had broken out. What, then, was the duty of the English Government? According to the right hon. Gentleman it was to follow submissively at the heels and beck of Russia, and join our forces in coercing Turkey. That was not the view which the Government took of their position and duty. They had throughout maintained, in spite of all that had been said by the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), the utmost frankness. Russia had no cause to complain of their having concealed one jot or tittle of their policy from her. She knew what interests of theirs it would be their duty to maintain and defend. It was clear to the House and the country that, in a great war of this kind, commenced, as they thought, without any justifiable cause—a war which was embracing a great portion of Asia as well as of Europe in its scope—with our vast Empire and our varied and ramified interests in three quarters of the globe, it was the primary and paramount duty of England not now to be thinking, as these Resolutions would bid them think, of more guarantees, more Protocols, more Conferences, or the minutiae of autonomy here or there, but to see that in this great and mighty contest none of the interests of their Empire that might be affected by the war were jeopardized or sacrificed. That was the duty to which Her Majesty's Ministers were devoting themselves. The issue was plain before the House. If the House was of opinion that the policy adumbrated in the first two Resolutions, and carried to their legitimate extent in the last two—a policy of coercive interference in the wake of Russia with the internal concerns of Turkey—was the just and wise policy for this country to pursue, let them say so. But if, on the other hand, the House was of opinion that the policy which the Government had uniformly pursued since these unfortunate events occurred—the policy of respecting the Treaties to which they were parties, the policy of struggling to maintain European peace and European concord, and the policy of vindicating, by peaceful means if possible—God grant they might be peaceful to the end of the chapter, but by any means if necessary—the essential interests, rights, honour, and integrity of this great Empire—then he asked that these Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman might be rejected by a majority so decisive that neither in this country nor elsewhere could there be any mistake as to the predominant and paramount opinions of the Representatives of the people of this great country.

MR. MUNDELLA moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought that as many Members who desired to speak had not yet had the opportunity, the debate might be adjourned.

CAPTAIN NOLAN hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would allow the debate to be prolonged two more days, seeing that some of the Irish Members were desirous to speak.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no right to speak again; but it rested with the House to prolong the debate if it should be thought necessary, and the Government would not offer any opposition to their wish.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

MR. JAMES DEMPSEY.

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

MR. BIGGAR moved for

"Returns of the decisions of the Justices at Quarter Sessions for the county of Antrim, and the grounds of same; of the decisions of the Recorder of the Borough of Belfast, and the grounds of same, in the matter of the several applications for Certificate to enable Mr. James Dempsey to obtain transfer of, and removal of, spirit licence to premises situate on Shore Road, Belfast; and, of the decision in Queen's Bench in relation to refusal of said transfer, and the affidavits relating thereto, between the first application at October Quarter Sessions in 1874 and the present time."

The hon. Member said, Mr. Dempsey endeavoured to obtain a transfer of his licence, and it was opposed by a person who did not even live in the same road. The transfer was not granted, and no reason was assigned for it. He believed the real reason was the jealousy of the magistrates to granting another licence in the district. He could not see how the Government could refuse the application of Mr. Dempsey to have the reasons given for the refusal of the transfer, nor could he understand that there could be any ground for refusing the affidavits relating to the matter. According to law and fairness Mr. Dempsey should know the grounds of refusal. One result was that for two miles there was not a public-house. If public-houses were for the accommodation of the public they should surely be placed at a less distance than two miles. In this case there was no pretence that Mr. Dempsey was not a fit person to receive a licence, and the grounds of the refusal he (Mr. Biggar) did not know.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That there be laid before this House, Returns of the decisions of the Justices at Quarter Sessions for the county of Antrim, and the grounds of same:

"Of the decisions of the Recorder of the borough of Belfast, and the grounds of same, in the matter of the several applications for Certificate to enable Mr. James Dempsey to obtain transfer of, and removal of, spirit licence to premises situate on Shore Road, Belfast:

"And, of the decision in Queen's Bench in relation to refusal of said transfer, and the affidavits relating thereto, between the first application at October Quarter Sessions in 1874 and present time."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. WHALLEY objected, as a matter of principle, to printing such Returns, and suggested that the hon. Member should be allowed to inspect the documents at that Department.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, he could not see how the House could go into the matter when the licensing sessions, having considered the whole question, exercising their discretion in the matter, had decided against Mr. Dempsey. The matter was twice investigated again, and the Court of Queen's Bench on the first occasion decided a point in favour of, and on the second occasion in Ireland decided against Mr. Dempsey. The Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, as in England, acted as a Court of Appeal in licensing cases, and he did not see how the House of Commons could entertain such an application, which would practically constitute the House a Court of Appeal from the Queen's Bench. The inquisitorial investigation asked for was one he could not accede to.

CAPTAIN NOLAN pointed out that public-houses in Ireland were important for electioneering purposes, and the people were jealous of such power being exercised in an arbitrary manner by the Government, as in some cases licences had been refused because of the political opinions of the landlord.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not ask for an inquiry, but simply a Return, and hoped the House would grant it. He believed it to be of great importance, and should certainly divide the House.

Question put.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BURT said, that after the statement which had recently been made by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, that the Government had a Bill ready drafted to deal with the question of breach of contracts and the discipline of seamen, he should best consult the convenience of the House by moving the discharge of the Order for the second reading of the Bill which he had introduced. He trusted that the Government measure would be introduced on an early day, and if it should fulfil the promise made by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary last year, and assimilated the laws for breach of contract in the case of seamen with the provisions of the Employers and Workmen Act of 1875, he should not find it necessary to propose any measure on the subject. If, however, the Bill of the Government should not go far enough in the direction which he thought desirable he should have an opportunity of moving Amendments in Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged: Bill withdrawn.

EXTENSION BILL.—[BILL 110.]

(Sir Eardley Wilmot, Mr. Forsyth.)

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that he had had the honour of being a Judge of County Courts for 20 years at Bristol and Chelsea, and therefore he had considerable experience of their working. He had also had many opportunities of conferring with men of experience upon the subject. The Bill proposed in all actions of contract or tort to give the plaintiff the opportunity of bringing his action in the County Courts. The jurisdiction of these Courts was at present limited to £50, except by the consent of the parties, for debt, and £500 in administration actions; but he now proposed that they should have unlimited jurisdiction, with power to defendant to apply to remove the action to the Superior Court on giving security for costs. He pointed out that Lord Brougham, who might be described as the founder of the County Courts, was, up to the time of his death, the zealous advocate of the change proposed to be made by this Bill. The Judicature Commissioners had also approved of it. After receiving evidence from various Courts in the Kingdom, they, in 1872, made their Report, and among other things recommended the extension of the County Court jurisdiction exactly in the way his Bill advised. It might be argued that he was proposing to extend the jurisdiction of these Courts far beyond what they were originally intended to cover; but if this were the first time that their jurisdiction had been increased something might be said on that point. The fact, however, was, that the jurisdiction of these Courts had been very considerably enlarged since their formation in 1846. He contended that the County Court Judges might be safely entrusted with the extended jurisdiction proposed to be given to them. Bankruptcy cases in the provinces were now dealt with by the County Courts to any amount, and only the other day a case involving liabilities to the amount of £100,000 was brought into one of the County Courts. They had now jurisdiction in Admiralty cases and salvage cases to the extent of £300 and also in certain cases of title. The time had now come to extend their jurisdiction, and to give the plaintiff what he might call free trade in law. It was rather hard, if a man living in a distant part of England had an action for £51 just after the Assizes, that he should be compelled to come to London at a great expense and considerable delay. In support of this Bill he would just refer to two cases to show what the costs were in each. In one case at Huddersfield, which occupied 28 days, and when the verdict was for the plaintiff with 40*s.* damages, the costs were £10; and in the other, which occupied about 11 months from beginning to the end in a Superior Court at Westminster, and where the result was 40*s.* damages, the costs were £540. He thought it was clear that suitors would be spared the expenditure of large costs if their actions were tried in the County Courts. It was, moreover, desirable to relieve the block of business in London, and this Bill would have a tendency to lessen the pressure upon the Superior Courts. He regretted to find that the Bill was to be opposed by the hon. and learned Member for Beaumaris (Mr. Morgan Lloyd), as it was a Liberal measure and was accepted by the country generally. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

MR. FORSYTH seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Eardley Wilmot.)

MR. MORGAN LLOYD, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, that as a matter of feeling he would have been glad if he could have agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for South Warwickshire, but he could not, as he conscientiously believed that the passing of this Bill would be very injurious to the country generally. No doubt the County Court system required amendment, and he would not object to see a thorough amalgamation of the High Court of Justice and the County Courts, but that would be a matter which would require very serious consideration, and could not be dealt with at present. The County Courts were originally established because it was found inconvenient and expensive to have cases of great importance and also actions to recover small debts disposed of by one and the same tribunal. In their working the County Courts had proved to be most beneficial to the country. The expense to the suitor was comparatively small, and justice was not only cheaply, but speedily obtained. If, however, the jurisdiction of those Courts was greatly extended—and the extension would be unlimited under the Bill before the House—they might as well abolish the County Courts altogether, and leave all cases, great and small, to be determined by the Superior Courts. The ordinary business of the County Courts would be set aside if the Bill were passed and the system recommended carried out, and thus their peculiar value and usefulness would be greatly impaired, if not altogether destroyed. If the subject was to be taken up at all it would be better to create additional Judges at Westminster for the purpose of facilitating the despatch of the legal business of the country. Local Courts were good for local purposes; but if Parliament attempted to make Superior Courts of them they would ruin them for all time. What was really wanted was an improvement and extension of the Circuit system and the localizing of actions in the Superior Courts. If that were done the County Court Judges would be more trusted, and would be more responsible to public opinion. Those Judges should not always go to the same places, but should go through the districts as strangers, and then they would not be disposed to show any undue favour to suitors. He trusted that that subject would not be lost sight of by Her Majesty's Government, more especially having regard to the present press of business in Westminster Hall. He begged to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. COLE said, he had much pleasure in seconding the Amendment as he had seldom seen in such a few lines a Bill which if passed would do more injury. He believed that one consequence of the passing of the Bill would be the practical repeal of the Judicature Act of 1875, as by it any action might be brought in a County Court, and could not be removed into the Superior Courts unless the damages claimed amounted to £50, while some of the most important actions were not brought to recover damages at all. To extend the jurisdiction as proposed by the Bill it would be necessary to have fresh machinery, because the office of Judge of a County Court was not generally filled by the most distinguished members of the Profession. Nothing could be more valuable in the shape of a Court of Justice than the County Courts, as tribunals for the recovery of small debts; but to make them, in effect, Superior Courts with a widely extended jurisdiction would be to create delay in the obtaining of justice, to greatly increase expense, and generally to interfere with the proper function of an excellent institution. The Bill was not made to apply to proceedings in Chancery. Why? He should give the Bill his most strenuous opposition.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Morgan Lloyd.)

MR. FORSYTH said, that he believed that the principle of the Bill was good, and that the measure if passed would be of great benefit to the country. The arguments he had heard urged against the measure had been used against the original proposal to establish County Courts. All kinds of evil had been predicted to the Bar and to the country as likely to arise if the new system were set up; but he ventured to say that no more useful measure had been adopted within the present century than the County Courts Act had proved to be. The original Act limited actions to £20, but in 1856 the jurisdiction was extended to £50 in all cases of contract, and by agreement it was unlimited, except as regarded some particular actions. He maintained that the House would be proceeding in the right direction by now enacting that cases of contract and tort should be tried in the County Court without limit as to amount, except in such cases where a Judge thought the case should not be tried in the County Court. It seemed to be thought that County Court Judges were not fitted to try cases where large sums were involved, but the Recorder of London could try such cases, and they were tried at the Passage Court at Liverpool, and he believed at the Toolsey Court, in Bristol, if the cause of action arose within the jurisdiction. He did not wish to praise unduly the County Court Judges; but from the reports of cases which he had read in The Law Times he was much impressed with the great ability which they displayed in dealing with the cases that came before them. He thought that the County Court Judges should be paid higher salaries. The arrears in our Courts were appalling, and unless something was done to relieve the congestion of the Superior Courts our judicial business would come to a dead-lock. If more important cases were brought before the County Court Judges he believed that greater care would be taken in selecting men to fill the office of Judge. At present, a great deal of the work of the Courts in undefended cases had to be disposed of by the Registrars, and he thought that their jurisdiction might be extended in small cases. It seemed so he thought by some that justice existed for the Bar of England; but he believed that the Bar of England existed for the purpose of allowing justice to be administered to all alike. He would never allow that the Bar should stand in the way of what he considered a boon to the public—that of obtaining cheap and speedy justice. He looked forward to the time when the great mass of the legal business of the country would be begun in local centres, instead of being brought up to London. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that the House would sanction the principle of the Bill by affirming the second reading.

MR. NORWOOD said, that the County Courts were a valuable institution, as they dispensed even-handed justice at a small expense at the doors of the humblest suitors. He had endeavoured to enlarge their jurisdiction, and would have no objection to see it still further extended, but he did not approve of this Bill. It was not sufficiently comprehensive, and it contained some objectionable propositions. He complained that the Judges were not selected for their legal attainments, but as a means of patronage for faithful services. He thought that the Registrars had too much power, as every subject of the Queen had a right to have his case tried before a Judge, and not by a Registrar. This was a sweeping and revolutionary measure, and he should vote against the second reading.

MR. GREGORY said, that if he regarded the Bill solely in the interests of his Profession he should support it, but in the interests of the public he must oppose the second reading. The Alpha and Omega of the Bill was to give unlimited jurisdiction to the County Courts. The present law in respect to County Courts had several defects. He objected, for instance, to the power which the Judge possessed of appointing another person to act for him, who might be more or less qualified. The Registrars, again, who might be practising solicitors, had too much power. It was said the County Courts were a cheap tribunal; but, according to his calculation, the costs amounted to fully 40 per cent of the amounts recovered. This Bill would not amend these defects, but would take away from the defendant his Common Law right of having the plaintiff against him tried in a Superior Court, for that was what the provision calling on him to give security for costs amounted to. The tendency of litigants was more and more to have recourse to the Superior Courts. This, he thought, was a certain test of the confidence reposed by the public in those Courts, where cases were tried in a more satisfactory manner than they were by the inferior tribunals. This was a good reason for not extending the jurisdiction of the County Courts. If they now gave that unlimited jurisdiction they would have to pay the Judges much higher salaries than at present.

MR. HIBBERT said, that while he was ready to support any fair proposal to extend the special jurisdiction of the County Courts, he could not vote for so sweeping a measure as that which was now under the consideration of the House. He hoped that the Government would fully consider the whole question, either by reference to a Committee or in some other way. A Bill might, with advantage, be brought in to extend the jurisdiction of County Courts from its present limit of £50 to £100, or thereabouts. Whether the Bill passed or not, he thought the Government would do well to take into account the additional work which had been thrown upon many of the Judges of late, and propose that their salaries should be increased. Since those salaries were fixed in 1865 the amount of their judicial work had been doubled. When the Bankruptcy Bill was before the House in 1869 he brought forward an Amendment which had reference to the increase of the salaries of County Court Judges. He had the assistance of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cross), now the Home Secretary, who seconded the Amendment; but they were not able to carry it, as the question was then under the consideration of the Judicature Commission. Since that time various Acts had been passed throwing additional duties upon County Court Judges, but no addition had been made to their salaries. He did not say that a case could be made out for the increase of the salary of every Judge, because there was a great difference in the amount of work which they had to perform in the various circuits of the country, but he thought it deserved the consideration of the Government whether they could not reduce the number of the circuits, and out of the saving to be effected give increased salaries to the remaining Judges.

MR. WHEELHOUSE assured the House that it was not without something like pain he felt himself obliged to oppose the Bill of his hon. Friend; but he had come to the determination—one well considered, moreover, before he arrived at it—that so far as County Courts were concerned, and so long as they were constituted as they at present were, the jurisdiction they now possessed was amply sufficient for them. In the first place, it must be remembered that there were, really, two very different classes of County Courts in this country. In the Courts of the metropolis, and of the large manufacturing centres, there was an enormous amount of work, consisting of commercial inquiries, bankruptcies, Admiralty jurisdiction in the port towns, and Equity, more or less, in all of them. On the other hand, there were the country districts, with large territorial interests and acreage, in which the Courts had certainly but very little to do, in the sense of having the larger inquiries referred to them. But while he bore that distinction fully in mind, he, for his own part, could not think it desirable to extend the County Court jurisdiction either in the one case, or the other. It was certainly undesirable to extend it in the larger centres, because, at present, the County Court Judges in those localities had, already, more than enough to do. He was also bound to say—speaking with all due respect for the Judges in the Superior Courts—that in former years it had been the practice of the Courts above to send down to the Judges sitting in the large centres a number of records to be tried which did not belong, properly speaking, to the County Courts as such, but which the Judges of the Inferior Courts were obliged to take, because because they had been sent down to them under statutory order. By these means, the time and opportunities of the Judges, which ought to be at the disposal—or rather for the use of—the poorer class of County Court suitors, for whose cases these Courts, be it always remembered, were introduced and intended, were displaced to make provision for the trial of these records. He was quite aware that of late the Judges of the Superior Courts had been somewhat more careful than formerly in sending down cases to the County Courts, because they knew perfectly well that the County Court Judge generally had more than sufficient work of his own to which to attend. There was another reason why he thought it very undesirable that the jurisdiction of the County Courts should be extended in the direction towards which the present measure seemed to point. The reason had been slightly glanced at before, but it was one which, with all due respect to those hon. Members who had spoken on the measure, he ventured to think they could not, and did not, appreciate as fully as those who had had a large practice in the County Courts. The objection was this, and it went far deeper than the mere 'superficies'—In many localities, a sort of family feeling pervaded, not merely the Court itself, but the people in attachment with the tribunal, from the Judge down to the lowest official, and this feeling rendered it very undesirable to extend the jurisdiction of the tribunal. It was far better, indeed, absolutely necessary, that these things should be thoroughly and widely known. He himself was personally acquainted with one instance, where a County Court Judge, almost simultaneously with his own appointment to office, brought down and established his own son, then a mere boy, as one of the practitioners in his own Court. It was, of course, in a case like this, scarcely possible to put a finger upon any particular instance in which absolute wrong could be proved to have been done to any named suitor; but there was the Judge, and there was the advocate, and it must inevitably be considered desirable to get hold of the latter as counsel wherever it was practicable. It was almost more than mortal to imagine that such should not be supposed to be the result; and, even if there were no reality in the proposition, there was, at least, an undesirable semblance of truth about it. He need not endeavour to impress upon the good sense of the House that this feeling not only might be, but actually was, of more evil consequence than the reality itself. He repeated, there was the father sitting as Judge, and there was the son constantly engaged before him, in the small, and—if he might venture so to name them—the half irresponsible local tribunals of the country districts, and, it was needless to tell the House that, though the justice administered there might be absolutely pure, nothing would induce the litigant who lost, and scarcely anything could convince the outside public, under such circumstances, to believe it so. He would only ask—Could such a state of things be desirable or conducive to the public welfare? For his part, he had no hesitation in pronouncing, from his place in that House, that such occurrences as these were a living scandal. There were, he believed, other instances to which the same principle applied, although, perhaps, not so strongly. Still, however, it did apply, and he was desirous, therefore, that under no circumstances whatever, should there be any chance of such family influences henceforward being allowed to permeate our local Courts of Justice, or that it should be possible, by any accident, to suppose that the fount from which justice sprung was tainted in the slightest degree. He also further objected to every Bill which gave any such power as the present measure sought to do—namely, that of enabling a suitor to throw unreasonable expenses in the way of a defendant. A suitor by a Common Law proceeding—whatever that might be—in a County Court could, at his own instance, although he had not the shadow of a ground of action against a defendant, set the law in motion, and the unfortunate defendant, before he could remove the hearing from the County Court jurisdiction, in order to take the opinion of the Court above, must be provided with the means of offering security for the payment of costs. Was that fair? Was it just? For example, suppose he himself chose to bring an action against any one of his fellow-Members in that House? It was perfectly true, thank goodness, that he had no right to do so, and had, most assuredly, no wish or expectation of doing it to the extent of one single farthing; but if, under such circumstances, he thought fit to do so, under this Bill the defendant, if he were desirous, for any reason, of seeking the opinion of a Superior Court, must first find security for costs. Why should such a system prevail? It was suggested that every plaintiff had some right, and that if he had not some grounds for suing, he never would proceed. His experience told him that this was by no means always the case. A man was too often dragged into a Court to defend something which he ought never to be called upon to answer. Then, there was another objection to this Bill. If anyone supposed that when a man sued, in the first instance, in a Court of limited jurisdiction from which there was an appeal—and in the event of enlarging the extent, they could scarcely do so without granting the right to appeal in such cases as these—he was at all likely to save expense, he counted sorely without his host. The moment the jurisdiction of a County Court was exercised, one side or the other was sure to be dissatisfied with the views expressed by the Judge, or taken by the jury. It was bad enough that any man should be at liberty to sue another really causelessly; but the hardship was intensely magnified when he was enabled to drag his opponent through a long series of Courts, and at no end of cost. But, even that was not the whole of the evil. In the language of this Bill, he did not see exactly how they were to make out the County Courts in which the plaintiff was entitled to sue. Surely a defendant had a right to know where he was to be sued, and under what circumstances he was called upon to answer. It was said this Bill intended that you should confine yourselves to debts and damages; but what about those other cases, the number of which was very great, where debts and damages did not enter. These points ought to be better defined than they were in this Bill. He thought that if this Bill was passed, they would not only repeal the present Judicature Act, but upset the whole system of judicature, and introduce a totally new state of procedure. If anyone knew what these County Courts were like—what they were—what Registrars did—how often there was just the opinion of one person to guide a decision—they would feel that it was not desirable to extend the system as it was at present. If they had a jury in all cases, that, indeed, might mitigate the evil. Then there was another matter arising out of this Bill. He had long thought it was necessary to increase the Judicial power in this country. The sooner they did this, so much the better; but he did not hesitate to affirm that, in his opinion, it was to be done by increasing the Judicial Staff in Westminster Hall. In the meantime, if any action was to be taken, let them, if they so pleased, go to a Select Committee. Instead of having any extension of the County Courts as they existed at present, let them go on totally different lines. There were three or four other matters with which he might deal, but he thought the limit had already been reached in respect to County Court jurisdiction under present arrangements. He hoped that limit would not be extended; but if there was to be any extension, he hoped it would be in an altogether different direction from that proposed in this Bill.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN hoped that the hon. and learned Baronet who had brought forward the Bill would withdraw it and not put the House to the trouble of a division, as it was impossible that he could go to a division with any chance of success. The matter had better be left in the hands of Her Majesty's Government. The hon. and learned Member for Leeds had expressed an opinion that the jurisdiction of the County Courts ought not to be increased. He, on the contrary, thought it ought to be increased very considerably. In matters of debt he would give the County Courts both in England and Ireland an unlimited jurisdiction, as was the case as regarded the Sheriffs' Courts in Scotland. One fatal objection to this Bill was that it contained a clause which would compel a defendant to give security for costs in order to get the opinion of a Superior Court in a case in which he thought he ought to get such an opinion. That clause, no doubt, might be removed in Committee; but the principle of that clause was so much interwoven with other parts of the Bill, that the House ought not to give it a second reading. He certainly thought the salaries of the Judges ought to be increased, and recommended the Attorney General for Ireland to bear in mind in the preparation of his Bill in reference to the Irish County Courts what had just fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oldham.

MR. MELLOR denied that the County Court Judges were underpaid. They received £1,500 per annum for two and three quarters' days' work in each week, with travelling and subsistence allowance. He thought they were scandalously overpaid. In fact, the Registrars did all the work, or, at least, a large percentage of it. This Bill emanated from lawyers. He always looked with suspicion on members of that class in the House, because the tendency of all their legislation was to swell our annual expenditure; and unless the measures of lawyers in the House were checked, instead of having a national expenditure of £78,000,000 a-year, it would rise to £90,000,000 in no time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the hon. and learned Gentleman who introduced the Bill did not seem to have had enthusiastic support even from those who, according to the hon. Member who had just spoken, were always ready to support anything that would cause an increase of expenditure. While many hon. Members were in favour of the extension of the jurisdiction of the County Courts, it was admitted that this Bill contained grave defects. In the first place, he questioned if, since the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, in which Common Law had been swallowed up by Equity, if any such thing as a Common Law action could exist. He considered, too, that the provision calling upon the defendant who might wish to have his case tried in a Superior Court to give security for costs was one in favour of the rich and adverse to the poor client. The principle of the Bill, as he understood it, was to give extended and exclusive jurisdiction to County Courts in all cases where the defendant who was sued could not remove the suit to a Superior Court, and that was, in his opinion, a principle which instead of approving they should altogether discon-tenance. Reference had been made to the extent to which the business of the County Courts was now in the hands of the Registrars. However small the cause might be, he thought the parties had a right to have it decided, so far as possible, by the Judge, and not by the Registrar; and they ought not, by any Bill like the present one, to intensify the existing evil. If they passed this Bill the time of the County Court Judges would be occupied in trying important cases, and they would be overwhelmed with that business which now found its way into the Superior Courts. It was said that this would relieve the press of business which now existed in these Courts. No doubt that would, to some extent, be the case; and he was not prepared to say that it would not be desirable to extend the jurisdiction of the County Courts to a certain extent. He was not in a position to pledge himself or the Government to such a measure; but it was well worth considering whether, under existing circumstances, they should extend the concurrent jurisdiction of the County Courts to all cases exceeding £50 and under £100, as had been suggested by the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert). That was a very different thing from establishing an unlimited jurisdiction; and rather than take that means of relieving the pressure on the Superior Courts, he would support an increase in the Judicial Staff of the High Court of Justice.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT replied, answering in detail the various objections which had been taken to the Bill, and warmly defending the character as well as advocating the claims of the County Court Judges—a class to which he himself had had the honour to belong. He expressed his satisfaction that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had given his approval to the principle of extending the jurisdiction of the County Courts to £100. He was ready to withdraw the Bill, the main provisions of which, he believed, would sooner or later become law. That day's discussion, he was confident, would yield solid fruits; and he urged on the Government and the House the expediency of appointing a Select Committee to see how far and in what manner the civil business of our Courts could be more satisfactorily despatched.

MR. WHALLEY wished to call attention, by way of protest and warning, to the state of civil business in the Courts, which was becoming worse and worse, and which had been aggravated by the Judicature Act. The cause of the block of business and of the delay and confusion in transacting it was due in a large measure to the fact that Common Law had been swallowed up by her sister Equity.

BAR OF ENGLAND AND OF IRELAND BILL.—[BILL 80.]

(Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Mr. MacCarthy Downing, Mr. W. Johnston, Mr. Meldon.)

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its object was to enable a member of the Irish Bar to practise in England and a member of the English Bar to practise in Ireland. It did not propose to abolish either Bar, but provided that the Benchers of the King's Inns in Ireland should admit members of the English Bar to practice in Ireland and that the Benchers of the English Inns of Court should admit Irish Barristers to practise in the Courts of this country. It was an extraordinary thing that the distinction between the English and the Irish Bars should have been maintained so long. Any man having a medical or surgical degree in Ireland could practise his Profession in England, and our English medical man could practise in Ireland. An Irish clergyman could be appointed to a living in England, and a graduate of the Dublin University could obtain an ad eundem degree from the University of Oxford or of Cambridge. He could not understand, therefore, on what principle it was that a distinction such as now existed should be kept up between the Bars of the two countries, and why an Irish barrister should not be admitted to the English Bar, or an English barrister to the Irish Bar without the necessity of eating dinners or passing an examination. The Bill proposed that a roll of English barristers entitled to practise in Ireland should be kept at the King's Inns, Dublin, and that rolls of Irish barristers entitled to practise in England should be kept at the English Inns of Court. The Bill did not propose to give any absolute right to an English barrister to practise in Ireland, or an Irish barrister in England. It only provided that a member of either Bar might present a memorial to the Irish or English Benchers to practice in Ireland or England, as the case might be, and the Benchers would have power to grant this permission. The moment a man was so admitted to practise at the Bar of either country he would become subject to the Benchers of that country, and might be disbarred or prevented from practising in the same way as if he had been originally a member of the country in which he was allowed to practice. English barristers would have the same rank in Ireland as they had in their own country, and the same rule would apply to their Irish brethren practising in England. The Bill, however, provided that no member either of the English Bar admitted to practise in Ireland, or any member of the Irish Bar admitted to practise in England, should be allowed to hold office in the country of the Bar to which he was admitted ad eundem. Thus the measure did not amalgamate the Bar of the two countries—it merely conferred a right to practise, and he did not see why this right should be denied when it was granted in the case of all other Professions. He did not think for a moment the English Bar could imagine that a few barristers from Ireland could deprive the English Bar of any portion of their practice. Under the Judicature Act a right was given to sue an Irish resident in Westminster Hall, and although that had been protested against the fact remained. He thought it hard that an Irishman so sued should be deprived of the right to have Irish counsel for his defence. The Irish Bar generally approved the first part of the Bill, in favour of which a resolution had been passed by the Munster Circuit. But he must admit that the same unanimity did not extend to the second part of the Bill, which enabled Her Majesty, if she thought fit, to send an Irish Judge to go Circuit; or sit in banco in England, when from the press of business there was not enough of English Judges to dispose of it. It was often said that there were too many Judges in Ireland and too few in England. For this state of things this provision would supply a remedy. In like measure the Bill would give power to the Queen to send over an English Judge to go Circuit or sit in banco in Ireland; but, although this power was formally given, everyone knew that it would never be exercised, as the English Judges had quite enough to do to dispose of their own work. In this respect he admitted that the Bill would practically be one-sided. It was said that one effect of the Bill would be to abolish the Bar of Ireland. Nothing could be further than this from his wish. As the son of an Irish Judge he would be the last to propose as to advocate any measure that would abolish the Irish Bar. He did not believe that would be the effect of the measure, and he certainly thought the time had come when the distinction between the two Bars should be done away with, and that they and the Judges of the two countries should be rendered interchangeable. The right hon. and learned Baronet concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

SIR HENRY JAMES hoped his right hon. and learned Friend would be satisfied with the courtesy shown him by not entering Notice of opposition to his Bill, in order that he might be enabled at any time to obtain a discussion upon it, and that he would not be disappointed if he did not receive any further support from the Members of the English Bar in that House. If his right hon. and learned Friend's proposal were of equal advantage to the Bars of both countries, why was it that there was not the name of a single English Member on the back of the Bill? He found, however, it was introduced by four Members of the Irish Bar. His right hon. and learned Friend had, he believed, expressed a desire for Home Rule. He wished Irishmen to have the regulation of the internal affairs of their own country. [SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN: Hear, hear!] Why, then, was the right hon. and learned Gentleman not satisfied with the Home Rule which Ireland possessed in respect to her Bar, which was exclusively under the management and control of the Benchers of the King's Inns and of the Bar itself? He should have thought that the principle of Home Rule was altogether opposed to the introduction of English Judges and barristers into Ireland in the manner here proposed. He could assure the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the members of the English Bar were perfectly willing to allow Ireland Home Rule in this matter; they had no wish to intrude their rules or themselves upon their Irish friends. His right hon. and learned Friend said the Bill only enabled the Inns of Court here to admit an Irish barrister to a sort of ad eundem degree. As a matter of fact, they had perfect freedom to do that at present if they pleased; but what the Bill said was, not that the Benchers might admit a member of the Irish Bar to practise in the English Courts, but that they should do so; for under the 4th clause, if the applicant got a certain certificate from the Benchers of the King's Inns, the English Benchers must admit him. But, apart from these considerations, he was unable to give the Bill his support. He denied at once that he was speaking in defence of vested interests. He did not deny that he did not desire the competition with the English Bar which would be provoked by the migration of the Irish Bar to England in search of a larger area of practice and more lucrative practice. In consequence of the comparatively limited area of practice in Ireland there was little competition there, and a barrister obtained rank much more easily in Ireland than in England. It would be very unjust to allow a man who had obtained the rank of Q.C. in Ireland to bring that rank over to England, and there take precedence over English barristers who had made their way much more slowly and with more difficulty. Thus his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland would by this Bill take rank at the English Bar over everyone except the Attorney General for England. Then there were other objections to the Bill. The King's Inns in Ireland were voluntary bodies. They could make their own rules, and Parliament had no control over them. Supposing the King's Inns chose to diminish their time for admission to the Bar to one term, while the English Inns retained the three terms, as at present, the result would be that people would go over to Ireland to be called there in order that they might afterwards be admitted ad eundem in England. He repeated that the English Bar obtained no reciprocal advantages for those which the Bill would give to the Irish Bar. As for the interchange of Judges, the right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to have forgotten that the laws of the two countries were not the same, and that a Judge could not be expected satisfactorily to administer laws with which he was not familiar. He had a great many objections to the Bill in detail; but after the radical defects he had pointed out he did not think it worth while to mention them.

MR. MELDON said, that the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) was an instance of the manner in which Irish complaints and claims were received in that House. Whenever Irishmen asked to be put upon the same footing as Englishmen they were told—"English laws do not suit you;" and that whenever they asked for special laws they were met with the argument that no distinctions of that kind ought to be set up between the two countries. At present Irish Barristers did not enjoy reciprocal rights with English Barristers. If a Board of Trade, Revenue, or other inquiry was held in Ireland, it was always English barristers who were employed by the Government or the authorities in connection with it; while, on the other hand, Irish barristers were not allowed to attend Irish cases in England, with the exception of Appeals to the House of Lords. Therefore, he maintained that there was not equal justice done to the Bars of the two countries. A similar injustice was done in the case of the winding-up of assurance. Great injustice had been done in a recent case by preventing Irish policy-holders being represented by Irish barristers and attorneys before arbitrators employed to hear the several cases, and the same observation applied to proceedings before the Railway Commissioners when Irish counsel had not been allowed to practise even in cases relating to Irish railways. The truth was there was no reciprocity in the treatment of the two Bars, but quite the reverse. Everything was claimed for England, and the Irish Bar and solicitors were left out in the cold. He did not, however, wish to abolish the distinction between the Bars of the two countries, or to confer upon them the rights or privileges which it was the aim of this legislative enactment to extend to them. He consented to put his name on the back of the Bill upon the understanding that the principle of the Bill was that a member of the Irish Bar, if by his examination and from his having attended the required number of lectures he had shown himself perfectly competent and fit for the Profession, might come over to England and practise, or vice versa in the case of an English barrister. They did not demand that a man should come over to England and insist on being called. He would be admitted, of course, on the lowest round of the ladder; but he asked that proficiency in Ireland should be regarded as proficiency in England? In England the Inns of Court had control, but in Ireland there were statutable enactments which did not affect England. There was no reciprocity. Take, for instance, as an example the case of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan). He had just passed his examination and kept his terms, and had been called to the Irish Bar, having passed a most satisfactory and creditable examination, but coming over to England he had to turn about and commence again de novo. He would be extremely sorry that the Bill should go to a division, although the principle of it was one he was ready to support. He would, however, prefer if the right hon. and learned Member withdrew the Bill, and another was introduced by an English lawyer.

MR. PARNELL said, that with all respect for his right hon. and learned Friend (Sir Colman O'Loughlen), he regarded the Bill as thoroughly anti-Irish and anti-Home Rule in its scope. Remarking that, he should say, with great respect to the introducers of the Bill, it might shortly be described as for the purpose of converting Irish barristers into English barristers and Irish Judges into English Judges, and at the same time converting English barristers and Judges into Irish. Had its provision been restricted to the last operation, he should not have had so much fault to find with it, for on the principle ipsis Hibernis Hiberniores perhaps those Englishmen who were admitted to the Irish Bar might be converted into better Irishmen than, unfortunately, many of the present Irish barristers were. Prior to 1782, Irish barristers were a patriotic body of gentlemen, and in that year the most powerful eloquence in favour of Irish legislative independence came from the Irish Bar; and from the Cornwallis Correspondence he found that the most difficult task of Lords Cornwallis and Castlereagh was to overcome the opposition of Irish barristers to the Union. They were then so thoroughly Irish and patriotic that they enrolled themselves into a corps of Irish volunteers to resist, by force, encroachments on the liberties of the country, but unfortunately the Union occurred, and subsequently he found that their patriotism vanished away. He might mention as an example the case of Mr. Plunket, who was one of the most vehement opponents of the Union, but who, after it was carried, so far forgot—he would not say his patriotism—but so far forgot that he was an Irishman as to take the leading part in the prosecution of Robert Emmett, which led to the conviction and execution of that illustrious man. He mentioned this not to throw discredit on the memory of Lord Plunket, who afterwards served as Solicitor General and Attorney General for Ireland, but to show the necessary tendency of the Union to estrange the members of the Irish Bar from national feeling and national interests. The result was that there had sprung up in the minds of the Irish people a great distrust of that profession which under other circumstances would have been one of the most powerful upholders of their liberties. Hence since the Union they had gradually become the tools of successive English Governments, and since 1852 this had been exemplified in a remarkable manner. When, as some hon. Members might recollect, a so-called independent Party was formed in the House to advance the interest of Ireland, the Party was headed by Mr. Gavan Duffy, Mr. Lucas, Mr. Sadlier, and Mr. Keogh. But Keogh was not able to resist the bribe of a Solicitor Generalship, offered as the price of a betrayal of his cause. An Irishman of distinguished talent, he talked one doctrine to the peasantry of the West; but when the inducement of office tempted him, he forgot himself, and accepted what he declared he would never do. Similar instances of betrayal of the popular confidence followed to such an extent that it was scarcely possible for an Irish barrister to obtain a seat in the House of Commons without having previously shown that he was pure and beyond suspicion. The effect of the Bill would be to increase largely a system of place-giving in Ireland as the reward of political services. At present it had been said there was a place for every three barristers; but under the Bill that field would be enlarged to an almost unlimited extent—all the English places would be thrown open. He believed this Bill would not tend to improve the character or increase the patriotism of the Irish Bar. If there was any distinction between the English and Irish Bar it was this—that whereas in England barristers were made Judges because they excelled in their profession, in Ireland they were made Judges not because they were the best men, but because they were the best Party men, and the consequence of the passing of this Bill would be that Irish Barristers would be made Judges in England, not because they were better qualified than English Barristers, but because they had rendered some disgraceful political services to the English Government of the day. Considering these circumstances, he trusted the House would reject the Bill.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT protested against the unfounded attack which the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had made on Lord Plunket and Mr. Justice Keogh, two of the most distinguished ornaments that had adorned the judicial bench. The remarks of the hon. Member were really not germane to the Bill. The general principle of the proposal of the right hon. and learned Member for Clare was one which met with his entire approval. It was a mistake to suppose that any professional jealousy was felt by the English Bar in connection with this subject. For his own part, he would be very anxious to support any Bill which had for its object to establish a reciprocity between the Bars of the two countries. What he understood to be desired was that qualification in Ireland should be qualification in England, and to this he, for one, offered no opposition, always assuming, as he thought they might safely assume, that a proper qualification was required before admission to the Irish Bar. The Bill, however, in its present shape went further than that, and was open to objections. He therefore hoped the second reading would not be pressed.

MR. WHEELHOUSE said, if they were to take the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Clare, as it stood, it would admit Irish barristers to come to England and, acting upon the authority provided by the measure, claim, according to their standing, precedence of the English barristers, and vice versa, the English barrister might go to, and claim precedence, at the Irish Bar. Was it intended that Irish Judges should go Circuit in England and that English Judges should go Circuit in Ireland? If so, great inconvenience would necessarily arise, as the customs of the two countries were so dissimilar. There was no feeling of jealousy in the matter; and, for his own part, he would be glad if something could be done in the direction which had been indicated: but he thought it necessary, in the first place, that an entirely new Bill should be drawn up. He therefore hoped his right hon. and learned Friend would act on the suggestions given to him and withdraw the measure.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought they might at once sweep away all notions that there could be any professional jealousy between the English Bar and their brethren in Ireland. The right hon. and learned Member for Clare had said that his object in bringing this Bill forward was to have the question debated, and the course of the debate had clearly shown that there was not perfect agreement among the members of the Irish Bar themselves as to the particular mode in which the question should be settled. Moreover, the moment the effect of the provisions of the Bill was pointed out, it seemed to be admitted that they went a great deal too far. He might mention that although it was not a common thing or a matter of right, yet at present members of the Irish Bar might be admitted by the English Inns of Court to practise at the English Bar, and there was no reason to assume that if an application with that object was properly made, it would be rejected. It ought also to be borne in mind that at the present moment the members of the Irish Bar had the same right of access as any others to the English Bar. At the same time, he would be very glad to see arrangements come to by which the members of the two Bars would be brought more closely together than they were at present. He had listened, however, in vain to hear that this matter had ever been brought before the Benchers of the various Inns of Court, or that there had been any attempt made to get the Judges in Ireland and in England to give it their consideration. Before legislating on such a subject it seemed to him that some interchange of opinion on the part of the Judges and the Benchers was most desirable. He thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman would exercise a wise discretion if he withdrew the Bill, and in the course of the Recess sought to promote that interchange of opinion. Before sitting down he felt it to be his duty, holding, as he did, a position intimately connected with the administration of justice, to say a word in justification of the character of the Irish Judges. In his opinion, the charges which had been brought by the hon. Member for Meath against those Judges were entirely unfounded.

MR. SHAW said, this was a question in which the people of Ireland felt deep interest. He thought there might be some such improvements in the matter as suggested by the hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Meldon), without going the full length of the Bill of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Clare. He protested strongly against facilities being given to transfer Irish barristers to England. The effect would be that the business of Ireland would be left to second and third-class men, as all the first-rate men would be attracted to England. At the same time, he thought leading Irish barristers should be allowed to practise in England in business originating in Ireland and subsequently carried over to England. Some change might be made in that direction with great advantage. The area of practice at the Bar of Ireland was very small as compared with the area of the English Bar; and in great commercial cases, with which the Irish Bar had not much opportunity of obtaining experience, he thought it would be advantageous, when such cases came on for trial in Ireland, if English barristers, possessed of that knowledge which practice gave them, were to be called over to Ireland for the conduct of such questions. With regard to barristers becoming "patriots," he must say he never saw an Irish barrister yet who had good practice and became a patriot who did not lose his business. He hoped the Bill would be withdrawn, and some less pretentious measure introduced.

MR. PLUNKET said, he had been absent on Committee duty upstairs when the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) spoke, and therefore could not refer to the exact words used by him; but he understood the hon. Member had made an attack of an unjust and personal nature on one whose name he had the honour to bear. He did not know that if he had heard the attack he would have condescended to reply.

MR. PARNELL: I wish, Sir, to be allowed to set myself right. Certainly, I did not intend any attack on Lord Plunket or his personal character. In fact, I expressly stated I did not mean to do so. I merely cited his case as an example of the injury the Union did to Irish interests in depriving the country of the services of men on whom reliance was placed as patriots.

MR. PLUNKET: Then on that subject he need not say more. He deemed it right, however, to refer to the imputations cast by the hon. Member for Meath, as he was informed, on Mr. Justice Keogh. Such personal attacks were frequently made in that House, without Notice, on that eminent Judge, and were wholly undeserved and unjustifiable. He would only remark that when the charges had been fairly brought up in that House for discussion and decision they had been repudiated by large majorities. However, after what the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had said with reference to that subject, it was unnecessary for him, on the present occasion, to say another word. With regard to the Bill, he hoped the right hon. and learned Member for Clare would avail himself of the suggestion of the Home Secretary, and not proceed further with it at the present time.

MR. BIGGAR thought it possible that the majorities to which the hon. Member referred had been due to Party considerations, and he added that in the bond fide opinion of the people of Ireland Mr. Justice Keogh was not an impartial Judge.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that the character of Mr. Justice Keogh was not the Question before the House.

MR. BIGGAR said, what he wished to point out was that when Mr. Keogh's character was discussed it was decided by a Party vote.

MR. SPEAKER again reminded the hon. Member that that was not the Question before the House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, that after the temperate speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who had introduced the Bill, it was much to be regretted that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had made the speech they had just listened to, as Mr. Justice Keogh's conduct had been brought forward in the House of Commons and had been fully discussed and decided upon. The hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell) had not said a word which really related to the proposal which had been put forward, but had instead made an attack upon an eminent dead Irish Judge, and upon one of the most eminent Irish Judges now living.

MR. PARNELL rose to Order, wishing to know whether, after he had expressly repudiated any desire to attack that eminent dead Irishman, Lord Plunket, the right hon. and learned Gentleman was entitled—having heard what he then said—to charge him with having made such an attack?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON) said, he would leave the character of Lord Plunket to the history of the country; but with reference to the other distinguished person who had been named by the hon. Member for Meath and to the rest of the Irish Judges who had been alluded to, he would say that he did not think any body of men—

MR. BIGGAR submitted that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was not in Order in discussing the character of the Irish Judges.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. GIBSON) had only meant to say that he did not think it necessary to say a single word in defence of those eminent men, as their character was well known both in that House and elsewhere. The hon. Member for Meath in his remarks had made sweeping charges on the character of the Irish Bar; but he seemed to forget the great names that were connected with the history of the Irish Parliament. O'Connell himself was an Irish barrister, and the leader of the Party to which, he believed, the hon. Member belonged, was one of the most distinguished members of the Irish Bar. If the hon. Member had borne these and similar facts in mind, perhaps he would not have felt called upon to make the extraordinary observations he had made with reference to the Bar of Ireland. In conclusion, he would only express the hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Clare would accept the suggestions of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and withdraw the Bill.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN regretted that any such discussion as that they had just listened to had arisen, and he concurred in the observations of the right hon. and learned Attorney General. He was willing to agree to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that the matter should be left to mutual communications between the Benchers in Ireland and England. He would therefore withdraw the Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn: Bill withdrawn.

VOTERS (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 82.]

(Mr. Butt, Mr. M. Brooks, Mr. Sullivan.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BIGGAR, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said,

The Attorney General for Ireland

the object of it was, with reference to persons who were really entitled to the franchise, to prevent their being disqualified owing to their names not having been duly inserted in the rate book.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. MULHOLLAND, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, the Bill had come before the House in various forms and under various designations, such as a Town Rating Bill, a Borough Franchise Bill, and now as a Voters Bill. It had always been rejected. He contended that the Bill, instead of its being in reality a measure to prevent the disqualification of voters in Ireland who were now entitled to the franchise, owing to their names not being inserted in the rate book, was rather a proposal by which persons who were not entitled to the franchise would have their names so registered. He pointed out also that if the name of a voter were improperly omitted from the rate book, he might put in a claim which it had been decided would put him just in the same position as he would have been if his name had been inserted. The direct payment of rates was entirely ignored by the Bill. That was a damaging position. The Bill did not put the legitimate voter in a better position, and it proposed no remedy for the accidental omission of names from the rate book. The Preamble of the Bill was untrue, and its provisions were dangerous.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words, "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Mulholland.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA supported the Bill. He thought a more unfair reading of a Bill than that of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Mulholland) could not be imagined. The object of the measure was simply an attempt to assimilate the law in Ireland to that which prevailed in England with respect to conditions under which persons in Ireland should be entitled to the exercise of the franchise. There was no ground for saying that its operation would be to put the name of a single voter on the rate book who was not really entitled to have it placed there in case of an assimilation of the law for both countries. He hoped the Bill would be accepted by the House.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

INTEMPERANCE (SWEDEN)—MR. ERSKINE'S REPORT.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the inaccuracy of the information conveyed to the Foreign Office by a letter of Mr. Erskine to Lord Derby, dated 28th August 1876, and ordered to be printed by the House on April 7th, 1877, in which he refers to the language of the Report of the Committee of the Municipality at Stockholm as stating that "intemperance (at Gothenburg), with all its bad consequences, has not diminished;" whether he is aware that Mr. Erskine has written to the Foreign Office, since the 13th March 1877, explaining that the figures in Annex B, inclosed in a letter from Consul Duff, dated February 22nd, 1877, and quoted by the Under Secretary in the Debate of the 13th of March 1877, are inaccurate, and not to be relied on without explanation; whether he is aware of the great discrepancy between the statement in Inclosure No. 1 of Mr. Erskine's letter, and that of Consul Duff in Annex B, regarding the amount of spirits sold in the year ending 1st October 1875; and, whether he would object to lay upon the Table of the House any further correspondence that has been received from Sweden upon this subject, including a translation of the Report of the Committee of the Municipality of Stockholm?

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON: My attention has been called to the inaccuracy in the letter of Mr. Erskine to Lord Derby, in which, from carelessness, the words "at Gothenburg" seem to have been inserted instead of "at Stockholm." I see by the First Report from the Select Committee of the House of Lords on Intemperance, in which the letter is quoted, the error has been corrected in a marginal note. And I will have the Papers before this House reprinted with a similar correction. I am aware that a letter dated March 24, which I have only seen since I had notice of the Question, has been received from Mr. Erskine, inclosing a letter from Mr. Rubenson, in which the inaccuracy of the figures in Mr. Duff's letter which I quoted to the House is pointed out, the correction being that while that letter seemed to imply a steady increase in consumption and profits from 1866 to 1875, the important fact had been omitted that the company only gradually came into possession of the trade, and that in the earlier years the private establishments, whose returns were not included, had sold very largely. There is certainly great discrepancy between Mr. Erskine's letter and Consul Duff's as to the amount of spirits sold in 1875; but the calculations of the Committee of the Municipality of Stockholm give figures differing from either, and I am quite unable to reconcile these conflicting statements. I will, when reprinting the former Papers corrected, lay upon the Table of the House the further correspondence and the translation asked for by the hon. Baronet of the Report of the Committee of the Municipality of Stockholm.

CHIEF MAGISTRATE AT BATHURST.

QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Secretary of State has received a memorial from the merchants, traders, and inhabitants of the British settlements on the River Gambia praying his Lordship to appoint to the office of chief magistrate at Bathurst

"a gentleman who has been educated and trained to the legal profession, and is a member of one of the Inns of Court of the United Kingdom;"

whether the chief magistrate is not required to act both as judge of assize and sole judge in all civil and Admiralty causes; and, whether a gentleman has been since appointed to this office who is neither a member of the Bar of the United Kingdom nor has received any kind of legal education?

MR. J. LOWTHER: The facts are substantially as stated by the hon. Member. The gentleman to whom he refers, and who is considered fully qualified for his present position, was appointed previous to the receipt of the memorial by the Secretary of State; but I ought to mention that although not a member of the legal profession he has had considerable judicial experience, having been upwards of 20 years in the Colonial service, and during the last 12 years has held an important legal post in another Colony. After the recent discussion in this House on the subject of the financial position of the Gambia, the hon. Gentleman will not be surprised at my adding that we are not prepared to embark upon any course involving an increase of expenditure.

Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson

COMMITTEE, 1873—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. WHITBREAD asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether the Government intend to take any steps during the present Session to carry out the recommendations of the Committee on Road Locomotives in 1873, to which reference has also been made in the evidence given before the Committee on Tramways in the present Session?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, the Government had intended to deal with some part of the recommendations of the Select Committee of 1863, and he had caused a draft Bill to be prepared consolidating and amending the two Statutes, one of which was an expiring law, regulating the use of locomotives on roads. The intention had been that the Bill should follow the Highways Bill; but the state of the Government business at present was not such as would justify him in bringing forward that measure. There would have been no allusion in the Bill to the subject-matter of the inquiry recently undertaken by the Select Committee to which the hon. Member referred; but in the preparation of any future legislation their recommendations would have to be considered.

CRIMINAL LAW—MANCHESTER MAGISTRATES—CASE OF THE REV.
FATHER JACKSON.—QUESTIONS.

MR. CALLAN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in reference to the arrest of the Reverend Father Jackson by the Manchester police on the night of the 30th December last, If he is now in a position to state whether it is true that, on the conclusion of the evidence in the police court, Mr. Alderman Murray, J.P., stated from the bench "that, as a magistrate, he had a right to act as he did, and would do the same again;" whether, in view of this declaration, the Lord Chancellor deems it right to continue this individual in the commission of the peace; whether Inspector Shandly, who had been formally applied to by Dr. Noble to obtain from the committing Magistrate a written permission to see the Reverend Father Jackson, and who afterwards made inquiries at the Presbytery about the case, and interfered in no other way, has been practically forced by the police authorities of Manchester to send in his resignation, after thirty years' service; whether the authorities there, on Sunday December 31, 1876, refused to the Catholic Magistrate, and to the Most Reverend Dr. Vaughan, Bishop of Salford, to accept bail for the appearance of the Reverend Father Jackson the following day; and, whether, considering all the circumstances of the case, he will order an inquiry on oath by an impartial and independent tribunal into the entire matter?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that he might say at the outset that, so far as he then knew, the Rev. Father Jackson must be considered to be entirely free from any imputation that had been cast upon him. He had made inquiries about Inspector Shandly, and the authorities absolutely denied that he had been dismissed the force, or that he had been pressed to resign. He could not understand why bail had been refused for the appearance of the Rev. Father Jackson, and he believed it was true that Mr. Alderman Murray, J.P., did say "that, as a magistrate, he had a right to act as he did, and would do the same again:" but he did not consider that an independent inquiry was necessary pending the trial of the indictments for perjury which would be held at the Summer Assizes. If the solicitors for the prosecution would communicate with the Solicitor to the Treasury or with the Home Office every assistance in the carrying on of the prosecution would be afforded him.

MR. JENKINS inquired whether there was any reason of a public nature for undertaking this prosecution?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: What I said was that if the solicitor for the prosecution would put himself in communication with either the Home Office or the Solicitor to the Treasury, we would render him every assistance in our power in carrying on the prosecution.

POST OFFICE—POST OFFICE, BEDFORD. QUESTION.

MR. REPTON asked the Postmaster General, If any arrangement has been made for improving the management of the Post Office at Bedford?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Yes, Sir. The office will be placed in charge of a proper officer previous to filling the vacancy which has occurred.

IRELAND—LOCAL COURTS OF ADMIRALTY.—QUESTION.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether the Rules and Orders of the Local Courts of Admiralty in Ireland have been finally approved of; and, if so, why the Act of 1876 has not been brought into operation, and when it may be?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. GIBSON): The Lord Chancellor of Ireland has framed the Rules for the local Courts of Admiralty, and they are now before the Treasury for the consideration of financial matters. I trust that they will very soon be finally approved of.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR— THE BLACK SEA—QUESTION.

MR. D. JENKINS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, seeing that hostilities have broken out between Russia and Turkey, Her Majesty's Government has obtained the consent of the Porte to sending a sufficient naval force into the Black Sea, in addition to the two gunboats in the Danube, for the protection of the important British interests at stake in those waters; and if any vessels have been already despatched for this purpose; and, whether Her Majesty's Government can state if the Porte is in possession of a sufficient naval force along the Russian coasts of the Black Sea to render effective the blockade proclaimed in the Circular of the Turkish Minister for Foreign Affairs, dated Constantinople, May 3rd?

MR. BOURKE: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that no steps have been taken by Her Majesty's Government to send a naval force into the Black Sea. Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that, were they to send a naval force to the Black Sea, such an act might be subject to much misrepresentation, and might lead to serious results. Therefore, they do not mean to send a greater force than now exists there—namely, the two gunboats which are entitled to be there under the Treaty of Paris and under the Danubian Commission; and also the despatch boats, which are at the disposal of the Embassy at Constantinople. With regard to the last part of the Question of the hon. Member, no information has reached Her Majesty's Government on that subject, and no representation has been made to the Government as to the insufficiency of the Turkish Fleet in the Black Sea to constitute an efficient blockade.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS)
ACT (1869)—THE CATTLE PLAGUE (METROPOLIS).—QUESTION.

MR. PAGET asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether in view of section 47 of "The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869," a local authority is legally entitled to make rules restricting the movement of stock within the limits of an infected place, or otherwise dealing with animals in an infected place; and, if not, if he will procure the issue of a general Order of Council to apply to all infected places in a manner similar to that laid down in Order of Council of 12th and 27th April 1877, dealing exclusively with the Metropolis?

VISCOUNT SANDON: The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869, gives the Privy Council special powers of making rules for infected places in the Metropolis, and the Orders of the 12th and 27th of April, 1877, were made in part by virtue of those special Orders. These Orders could not be extended to the country generally; but, under the Cattle Plague Order of 1877, local authorities can prohibit the movement of cattle in their district, and this would enable them to make rules respecting the movement of stock within the limits of an infected place. I trust, therefore, this information will fully meet my hon. Friend's Question, which is certainly one of considerable importance. The Veterinary Department is not prepared at present to make any alteration in the mode of disinfecting loading pens, trucks, and vans, as prescribed under Article 18 of the Animal Order, 1875. I think it right to inform my hon. Friend that the whole question of disinfection, which is one of great importance, is now under consideration.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACT, 1875—NUISANCES.—QUESTION.

MR. A. MILLS asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, having regard to the terms of "The Public Health Act, 1875," section 91, it is necessary, when summary proceedings against a nuisance are taken, to show that the nuisance complained of is injurious to health?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH: By the 91st and following sections of the Public Health Act, 1875, a summary remedy is provided supplementary to the proceedings against a nuisance which may be instituted at Common Law or in Equity, but although the disjunctive word "or" is used in the section—namely, "a nuisance or injurious to health"—the Court have held that looking to the whole scope of the Sanitary Acts, some injury to health must in all cases be proved. It was proposed by the hon. Gentleman when the Public Health Act of 1875 was passing through Parliament to make the disjunctive proposition stronger by prefixing the word "either" to "nuisance," so that the sentence would have run, "either a nuisance or injurious to health," &c.; but the highest legal authorities were of opinion that the same construction as before would, nevertheless, be adopted by the Courts. I am glad to say that the whole subject of noxious trades and vapours is now under the consideration of a Royal Commission, who will probably report within the present Session of Parliament.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE WAR—
THE DANUBE AND THE BLACK SEA.—
QUESTION.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has ascertained the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown relative to the seizure and destruction by the Turks of a British corn-laden lighter on the Upper Danube, which was there prior to the Proclamation of the Turkish authorities on the 1st May; and, whether he has received official notification of an extension of the time allowed for the departure of British vessels from Russian Black Sea ports?

MR. BOURKE: The opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, with regard to the destruction of a British lighter on the Upper Danube, has not yet been received by Her Majesty's Government. In reply to the second Question, I have to state that the Porte has consented, at the request of Her Majesty's Government, to grant seven additional days of grace, which would enable neutral vessels to enter Russian ports in the Black Sea up to the 15th and leave them up to the 17th. Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople has been instructed to inquire whether some additional extension of the time can be allowed, so that the days of grace might count from the date on which a vessel entered the Black Sea.

ARMY—ENGLISH OFFICERS AT TURKISH HEAD-QUARTERS.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is a fact that Colonel Lennox, of the Royal Engineers, is now at Rustchuk on the Danube, at the head-quarters of the Turkish Army, together with two younger British officers on full pay; whether it is the case, as stated by a correspondent of a London paper, writing from Rustchuk on the 1st instant, that these British officers "daily visit the Turkish fortifications; that they assist the Turkish commander by their advice; and that, with their help, a sharp resistance may be anticipated;" and, whether any instructions have been or, if not, will be issued to these officers to confine themselves to that strict neutrality enjoined in Her Majesty's recent Proclamation, neither giving advice nor expressing any professional opinion to the Turks on the struggle now in progress?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Colonel Lennox, of the Royal Engineers, is Military Attaché at Constantinople, and at the time of the declaration of war he was in the Danubian Provinces in company with another young officer. He has since that time, as Military Attaché, received permission to attend at the head-quarters of the Turkish Army. He knows perfectly well the duties which belong to his position, and he himself, as he has said, presumed he was on the general footing of Military Attachés—on the same footing as General Walker, who was attached to the German Army during the Franco-German War. Therefore, it is unnecessary to

QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Why the remainder of the prize money, part of which was paid on account in 1862, for the finding of the Begum Kotee treasure at Lucknow during the Indian Mutiny is so long withheld from those entitled to it; and when the same will be paid?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, no money had been withheld from any persons who were entitled to it. The facts concerning this treasure were that certain soldiers whilst quartered at Lucknow discovered certain valuable articles, which, in the opinion of those most competent to judge, were not in the nature of prize money but were treasure trove; and the finders were given 25 per cent of their value. No further claims could, therefore, be entertained. The Correspondence on the subject was presented to Parliament in May, 1876.

THE SUGAR CONVENTION.

QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that proposals have been made by France or any other of the contracting Governments for an extension of the time during which the Convention on the subject of Bounties on Sugar would have to be ratified; and, whether Her Majesty's Government are willing to ratify it; and what steps, if any, have been taken to induce the contracting Governments to obtain legislative sanction to the Convention, and to proceed with as much despatch as possible to final ratification?

MR. BOURKE: In reply to my hon. Friend, I have to state that no application has been made by any of the contracting parties for an extension of the time for the ratification of the Convention as regards sugar bounties; but, at the same time, the Netherlands Government have said that it was impossible for them to carry out the arrangements under the Convention with regard to beet-root sugar in the time mentioned in the Convention. Therefore, they have applied to the other Powers to obtain an extension of the time in order that those arrangements might be carried out—that extension of time not exceeding one year. Her Majesty's Government are perfectly prepared to ratify the Convention, and they are using their best endeavours to obtain a ratification of it by the other Governments.

ACT, 1869—CATTLE PLAGUE AT HULL.
QUESTION.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE asked the Vice President of the Council, If it is true that a further outbreak of Cattle Plague has taken place at Hull; and, if so, whether the Privy Council would not supersede the orders of the local authority at that place as they had done in the Metropolitan and county of Middlesex districts?

VISCOUNT SANDON: I am sorry to say the hon. and gallant Gentleman is correct in supposing that a case of cattle plague has occurred at Hull. Only one animal out of five in the same shed was attacked, and the whole were slaughtered at once. The Inspector reported that the symptoms during life seemed doubtful; but he was satisfied by the result of the post-mortem examination that it was a case of true cattle plague. There had been no previous outbreak of cattle plague in Hull since the 22nd of March. The local authorities are making a fresh survey of all the dairies in the town, and no animal is allowed to leave any cowshed without a pass from the Veterinary Inspector. As the Government believe that the local authorities are doing everything that is possible and necessary under the present circumstances, it is not proposed to interfere with their jurisdiction.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. [THIRD NIGHT.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [7th May],

"That this House finds just cause of dissatisfaction and complaint in the conduct of the Ottoman Porte with regard to the Despatch written by the Earl of Derby on the 21st day of September 1876, and relating to the massacres in Bulgaria."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Mr. Bourke

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "declines to entertain any Resolutions which may embarrass Her Majesty's Government in the maintenance of peace and in the protection of British interests, without indicating any alternative line of policy,"—(Sir Henry Walf.)—instead thereof.

MR. COURTNEY regretted the absence, through indisposition, of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), by whom the debate was to have been resumed. On Monday night, when hon. Members came down to that House to hear the speech of the right hon. Member for Greenwich in support of his Resolutions, they found that the order of the proposed proceedings had been entirely changed. He had on that occasion expressed his apprehensions of the consequences of that change and regret that it had been made, and what had since occurred had tended to confirm those apprehensions and that regret. What was the position of himself and of those who thought with him at that time? The question which was now occupying the attention of the House had agitated the country for many months, and yet it was one upon which the House of Commons had not as yet expressed any definite opinion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich at length, in compliance with the expressed wishes of the mass of the people, asked the House to give its adhesion to a particular policy. The hope excited in the minds of hon. Members who approved the policy indicated by the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions was shared by a proportion of the people out-of-doors—he would not say what proportion, but it was a large proportion—who had hastened to testify their approbation of what the right hon. Gentleman had undertaken to do. Numberless meetings were held in support of these Resolutions, and Petitions adopted in their favour. Therefore, when those hon. Members came down on Monday night and found that the right hon. Gentleman was not about to invite the attention of the House to the policy embodied in his third and fourth Resolutions, they received the intelligence with feelings of consternation and bewilderment. How did matters then stand? By the withdrawal of the third and fourth Resolutions, only two propositions were left for discussion by that House. The first of those propositions was that the House had just cause for dissatisfaction and complaint in the conduct of the Ottoman Porte with regard to the despatch written by the Earl of Derby on the 21st of September, and relating to the massacres in Bulgaria. Every hon. Member in that House must be of that opinion, and, indeed, no persons could be more dissatisfied with the action of the Porte in connection with that despatch than the Colleagues of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office. He believed, however, that since the debate had been commenced, one voice—that of the right hon. Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe)—had been raised in opposition to that proposition, inasmuch as he objected to the despatch having been written at all, believing that the Foreign Secretary had strayed from the path of discretion and had deviated from the impartiality he ought to have preserved in addressing this despatch to the Turkish Government. He was not quite sure he interpreted the meaning of the right hon. Gentleman aright; but, subject to this exception, he believed that all hon. Members were agreed in approving the proposition submitted to them in the first Resolution. The second proposition in its amended form was that the Turkish Government, by its treatment of its subject populations, must be deemed to have lost all claim to receive either the material or the moral support of the British Crown. He preferred the Amendment to the original form; but it must be observed that the cardinal word of both was the word “claim.” The Turkish Government was declared to have lost all “claim” upon our aid. He believed that no one would disagree from that proposition. Her Majesty’s Government must agree with it, because if the Turkish Government had not, by its conduct, forfeited all claim to our material and moral support, we should be at war on behalf of Turkey at the present moment, and certainly hon. Members on his side of the House must heartily approve it. Even those on the other side, who were strongest in their feelings of opposition to Russia, and might hereafter call for action against Russia, based their position upon no supposed claims of Turkey, but on what they conceived to be our interests. There was, therefore, no ground upon which the propositions as they stood could be discussed; and, indeed, the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) had proposed to stop all discussion upon the subject by suggesting that the House should immediately give its adherence to them. That was the result of the arrangement that had been come to, and it was said that the unanimity of the Liberal Party had been gained by it. No one could be more deeply desirous for the unanimity of the Liberal Party than he was, but the term unanimity expressed the idea of persons being of one mind, and therefore that there should be a mind; but he had failed to discover evidences of mind in the agreement that had been arrived at. The Liberal Party might now have one voice, but it was not a voice expressing one will or one policy, or even one opinion. The Liberal Party were, in fact, reduced very much to what Her Majesty’s Government had reduced the European concert to. The latter was a very valuable thing, but in the hands of Her Majesty’s Government it never did anything it was wanted to do, and it appeared that it could only be maintained as long as it dealt in empty professions. The present position of the Liberal Party, resembling too faithfully the European concert, was that of the chorus in a Greek play, which strikes in with moral sentiments every now and then, without affecting in any way the action of the play, but appeals to Heaven and exclaims—“How very unjust, how very wrong, how very injudicious on the part of a people hastening blindly to their ruin.” What had happened in this matter made scoffers rejoice and discouraged those who were faithful. He appealed, therefore, to hon. Members whether the apprehensions he had felt had not been realized. It had been said that they had had a magnificent speech from the right hon. Member for Greenwich. No one could admire the argument of that speech or could have been moved by its eloquence more than himself, but they would still have had that speech, even if the third and fourth Resolutions had not been withdrawn; but now they had lost the crown and purpose of that speech, and the very reason for which the speech was made had been withdrawn, while they were not permitted to express any opinion upon the policy which it advocated. If the third and fourth Resolutions had not been withdrawn there would have been a debate which would have instructed the House and the country. The speeches which had been delivered in this debate had, however, not turned upon the question of policy, but upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. Had the Resolutions been maintained, the right hon. Gentlemen on the front Opposition bench, who had spoken on Tuesday, must have addressed themselves to the policy of the Resolutions, instead of which they had indulged in a weary round of aimless criticism. The country was left without a Leader as much as ever. He should be sorry to use language which could be regarded as a reproach to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. He had no feeling of that kind towards him. He was sure the reasons which had induced the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw the third and fourth Resolutions were of a most noble character. But he regarded the course adopted by the right hon. Gentleman as a great error of judgment, which must be deplored in the interests of this country and of the cause which the right hon. Gentleman himself had at heart. In order to appreciate the effect of what had been done, he (Mr. Courtney) invited the House to go back. Let them consider the time of Sir Robert Peel, when the division of Parties in that House was much the same as it was now. At that time there was one great question—that of the repeal of the Corn Laws—which occupied the attention of the country, and there was then, as now, a great division of opinion on the Opposition benches. A total and immediate repeal of the Corn Laws was demanded by the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), by Mr. Cobden, and by the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. O. P. Villiers.) The noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition (Lord John Russell) went about murmuring that it would be much wiser to demand an 8s. fixed duty. Suppose the champion of Corn Law repeal had put on the Table of the House a Resolution for an immediate repeal of the Corn Laws; suppose that meetings had been held throughout the country in support of that movement, that Members came to the House to support it, but that at the last moment the Resolution had been changed into a proposal that the sliding scale ought to be modified—what would have been the consternation, what would have been the indignation, of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham? He (Mr. Courtney) hoped before he sat down to recall the House in some degree to the question of policy. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had proposed with reference to the first Resolution an Amendment to the effect that the House declined to entertain any Motion which would embarrass Her Majesty's Government without indicating an alternative line of policy. He (Mr. Courtney) felt there was considerable justice in that position. The Home Secretary said on Monday this was a critical question, and that no Member had ventured to recommend coercion. In the most unequivocal manner, he (Mr. Courtney) was prepared to recommend the employment of force. One policy was that of maintaining unaltered the status quo of the Ottoman Empire. There was another policy—namely, that of assisting as much as possible in its gradual dismemberment. He ventured to say that the policy of wisdom was that policy which recommended dismemberment. He advocated dismemberment, in the first place, because, although it did not depend on us at all whether the Ottoman Empire should be dismembered, it did depend upon us whether it should be dismembered one way or another. This was not a new question. It was 300 or 400 years old. It was 200 years at least since the Ottoman Empire began to decline. One by one Provinces had been taken from it, and a great improvement had resulted in the condition of Europe as well as in the condition of those Provinces. At one time great part of Hungary was under the dominion of the Ottoman Empire, and the change that had since occurred in the condition of that part of Hungary was such as would occur in Bulgaria when it ceased to be an Ottoman Province. The change that would occur in respect of the equilibrium of Europe was equally clear. That equilibrium was threatened by the strenuous efforts to keep together the parts of this machine which had in themselves no gravitation one to another. Every five or 10 years an attempt was made, which somehow or other was put down, to break off a Province here or a Province there. If, instead of adhering to the old notion of keeping these Provinces together, we directed our energy to promoting a dismemberment of this Empire, we should find the task before us, he believed, easy and safe. In the conduct of these negotiations the policy of Her Majesty's Government from the beginning had been that of keeping back the other Powers of Europe from acting. One Government might have been said to be unwilling to go forward; but even that Government was always more anxious for action than ourselves, because it was placed nearer to Turkey and was better informed about its condition than ourselves—he meant the Government of Austro-Hungary. Twelve months ago the immediate question might have been easily solved by cutting off Bosnia and Herzegovina from the Ottoman Empire, to which they were attached by a very narrow neck of land. The dimensions of the problem had since grown, and if we were wise we should hasten to settle it before it became indefinitely extended. The solution of the question rested primarily with us and Germany, and it might have been altogether settled by the joint action of those two Powers, if our Government had made a communication to Prince Bismarck; but not such a communication as Lord Derby had made, beseeching the German Chancellor to interfere and bring his influence to bear on the Czar to stop the development of Slav nationality. That appeal showed an utter want of appreciation of the question, because Prince Bismarck well knew that the greatest force at work in the present century was the principle of nationality, as was exemplified in the re-construction of the German Empire itself. An appeal, therefore, to Prince Bismarck in order to repress the nationality of the Slavs, was like appealing to a man to commit an act of suicide, and it was impossible that it should have met with any other response than the one it received. But if they had gone to the German Chancellor and said that the question affected Germany more intimately than it did England, connected as it was with the navigation of the Danube and the advance of Russia in Eastern Europe; asking him whether, in conjunction with Austria, they could not meet the Czar half way, and propose that these outlying Provinces of Turkey should receive a form of government that would be tolerable to their population, the strife might have been arrested at that stage. If that had been done, Prince Bismarck would have acceded to the proposal, they would have made another step in advance towards the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire, and they would have averted this terrible war. The Vice President of the Council, the other night, referring to the distinction between moral and material coercion, appeared to be unaware that that distinction had been drawn by Lord Derby in a despatch in which he said that Turkey must not rely on receiving more than our moral support.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he had not alluded to any distinction between moral and material coercion, but to the distinction between the moral retention of certain Resolutions and their material withdrawal.

MR. COURTNEY said, that did not in the least affect the gist of his argument. Of course, in proposing a policy of that kind they had the possibility of war in the background. That was the ultima ratio regum, the sanction by which it was supported. If they proposed a partial dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire, they might, should Turkey not agree to their terms, have to make her accept them. But what then? They would have Russia, Germany, and Austria with them. On the sea, what was the Turkish Fleet without the help of Englishmen? That fleet was commanded by an Englishman; there was not a single iron-clad in it which did not depend for its navigation on English engineers, and if war broke out between England and Turkey the consequence would be that the whole Ottoman Fleet would be reduced to inaction, unless the Englishmen on board consented to forego their nationality; otherwise they would be liable to be treated as rebels to their own Sovereign. That would at once destroy the power of the Turkish Fleet; so that, although the name of war was in the background, it would really be only a nominal coercion. The case would be like that of a "rough" with half-a-dozen policemen round him, who told him that if he resisted they were afraid they would have to use their truncheons against him. The fear of war was no more serious than that. He was astonished at the strange contrast presented between the fear shown in that case and the rashness evinced in another transaction which they had all heard of within the last few days. The Government had just annexed an independent Republic in South Africa—an act which involved more risks than the proposal which he had described. It might be said that annexation in South Africa would involve no risk; but to that he would answer—"Wait till the end." As far as he could see, that act, without any justification of policy or of principle, exposed this country to greater peril of serious war than the suggestion he had made for settling that question. But if they were going to break off those Provinces from the Turkish Empire, they must have some assurance that it would be possible to set up an improved form of government in them. The noble Lord the Vice President of the Council asked—"How is it possible that free England and unfree Russia should work together to establish any form of government that would suit both?" The answer to that was, that the thing had been done. How did it happen that free England and unfree Russia were the great motive-power which set up free Servia, free Roumania, and which also worked together to set up free Greece? It might be said that in all three cases the Governments so set up were imperfect. He admitted it, but they were all free; and as there was no difficulty in those instances in such a form of government being set up by the joint action of those two Powers, neither would there be any difficulty in setting it up in Herzegovina and Bosnia. The Government of free Greece was a living, active, and trustworthy Government; and even in the Lebanon a local autonomy had also been established. In fact, the policy of Mr. Canning was the true policy to follow—not, indeed, in all its original details, but with the corrections suggested by subsequent experience, and adapted to the varying circumstances of the problem. That, he was sure, was a policy of peace, a policy of honour, and a policy of economy. The House would perceive that he was not regarding that great question from a Party point of view. Probably as many hon. Members sitting on his own side dissented from what he had said as sat on the opposite benches. But he might add that he was not expressing convictions which had resulted from any Bulgarian horrors. Those convictions he had adopted when still young—in fact, during the Crimean War—a war which he regarded as an act of great unwisdom; and the experience of every year that had since gone by had only confirmed, strengthened, and deepened them. He might, therefore, claim to speak with some independence on that matter, especially when he vindicated the right hon. Member for Greenwich from the accusation brought against him, that he now propounded a great and comprehensive policy on that question, although he never when in power gave a hint that he had any desire to pursue it. Such a charge could only be advanced by those who did not understand the conditions of political life. People out-of-doors might catch it up; it was incredible that any one engaged in public life could seriously urge it. No one in that House would advance it who knew the difficulties under which Ministers of the Crown laboured and the burden of the duties which were cast upon them, or how little choice they really had in suggesting new enterprizes. The work of the First Minister of the Crown of England was so vast that he could scarcely understand how any man could achieve it. And when the right hon. Member for Greenwich was engaged during his Administration in enterprizes so gigantic that hon. Gentlemen opposite denounced them beforehand as problems which could not be solved, as works which amounted to a revolution, as something more disastrous than the invasion of a foreign army, how was it to be expected that he should also, at the same time, have undertaken a comprehensive scheme for the settlement of the Eastern Question? It might be said—"The Ottoman Empire is falling to pieces of itself. Why should England interfere?" The answer to that was, in the first place, that we had a general responsibility in the matter as one of the Great Powers; and, in the second place, that in 1854 we did a grievous wrong to the subject races of the Porte which it was our duty to repair. How stood the case before the Crimean War? By the Treaty of Kainardji the Porte promised to protect the Christian religion and its churches, and to permit the erection of a church at Constantinople. That was a promise made to the Czar. Now, it was one of the simplest axioms of jurisprudence that if a promise was made to some person for a valuable consideration, that person had a right to exact its performance. Under the Treaty of Kainardji, therefore, the Czar had a right to require the Porte to protect the Christian religion and its churches. He was sure if hon. Members would for a moment free their minds from the confusion and excitement attendant upon the Eastern Question, they would admit the justice of that assertion. If in the course of the last century, at the conclusion of our war with Spain, we had exacted from His Most Catholic Majesty a promise to extend toleration to all Protestants in that country, and to permit the erection of a Protestant Church in Madrid, should we have been content with the non-fulfilment of that engagement? That was a parallel case, and he commended it to the attention of those who denied the right of the Czar before the Crimean War to interfere for the protection of the Christian races of the Ottoman Empire. Well, the Crimean War abolished that Treaty and put nothing in its place. It was one of the most wonderful examples of the portentous illusions generated by that war that the united Powers of Europe thought the Sultan might be trusted, of his own grace and love of justice, to afford that freedom and protection to the Christian Church which he had failed to give under a solemn promise. England absolutely declared she had nothing to do with the relations between the Sultan and his subjects. The Sultan issued a Firman which accorded certain privileges, but which gave no rights, and so it came to pass that the promise given under the Treaty of Kainardji was abolished and nothing substituted for it. That, in his opinion, was one of the greatest international crimes ever committed. It left millions of Greek Christians under the dominion of the Sultan absolutely stripped of the protection which they had previously enjoyed; if the risk were greater than it if the labour were greater than it he would say, let the power of England be exerted to undo the wrong which then unwittingly done. It might be asked, even, if these aims were sound, and these propositions sound, how could we possibly enter into co-operation with Russia? How could we be so deluded as to suppose that Russia was animated by any sincere desire to protect the subjects of the Sultan? ["Hear, hear," Hon. Members opposite cheered.] He invited them to consider the condition of England 50 years ago, when Mr. Canning interfered to secure some justice and some protection, to the oppressed population of Greece. He invited them to compare the condition of England with that of Russia now, and to consider whether there was a single charge brought against Russia which could have been brought with the same justice against England then. Fifty years in Mr. Canning's time, there were not a few people who remembered the even suppression of the Irish Rebellion in 1798. Had hon. Members opposed Mr. Maxwell's History of the Irish Rebellion? It was uncommonly good reading for Englishmen and very bad reading for Irishmen. If they had read it, they would remember something of Sir John Fitzgerald, who received a pension from the Crown for deeds as foul as those which were committed by any Russian. He did not wish to say anything which might be humiliating to any hon. Member; but what was the composition of that House then? What was the political worth of the English Church then? What was the character of England then? They talked of the protection policy of Russia. What was the commercial policy of England then? He talked of the extension of Russian dominions in Central Asia. He asked them to look back to the once continued extension of the British possessions in India. They talked of pledges for peace. He asked them to remember how Governor-General after Governor-General went out to India with professions of peace, and how they went on adding to the territory of their predecessors. He wondered at what he was afraid he might call the want of intelligence, at the narrowness of intellect which prevented from looking at the history of their own country before judging of the misdeeds of other countries, or from seeing how far the charges which they brought against others could be brought against themselves. There was another reason often advanced why we should not enter into alliance with Russia. He was almost ashamed to mention it, but it was necessary to do so. There were many people who were moved to action in this matter chiefly by the fact that the oppressed races of Turkey were for the most part members of the Greek Church. But there were, on the other hand, many people who were kept back from sympathizing with those oppressed races because they were members of the Greek Church. For himself, he believed that with Greek Church or Latin, or with any other ritual, he should feel the same sympathy; and he trusted that the Liberal Members of the House of Commons would never withhold their sympathy from him who suffered, whatever his creed might be. There was one other point to which he might refer. When he looked to the state of Europe at the present time he saw something which justified the deepest anxiety. At home there was nothing to fear. Progress might be more or less rapid, but the maintenance of progress was certain. It was different abroad. He saw nation separated from nation by feelings of suspicion, of jealousy, of hate. International jealousy was so strong that there was not even a free exchange of thought. Ideas and feelings would not pass from one nation to another. The very sources of intellectual and moral life were poisoned by that jealousy. If anyone thought his language overcharged, let him visit the two countries which were supposed to be foremost in the development of civilization—France and Germany. Men used to go to Paris to meet emancipated intellect working freely, discussing all manner of problems. If one went thither now, and in talking with a Frenchman broached the subject of Germany, he would find that on that question the mind of the Frenchman was absolutely closed. The French could not understand anything good in Germany. They hated the name, they hated the civilization, they hated the learning of Germany. In Berlin, again, we should, no doubt, find monsters of learning to put our ignorance to shame;

but if we broached the subject of France, we should find a total incapacity to understand anything good in France. He had hoped that the co-operation of the Great Powers in connection with the Eastern Question would afford an opportunity of breaking down this mutual hostility. In particular, he had expected that the Conference at Constantinople would do much to develop among the nations of Europe a feeling of common interest. He had looked for the inauguration of a rule of justice, and for the formation of a new Holy Alliance very different in its nature from that Holy Alliance the object of which was to keep everything as it was. It was to be deplored, for the sake not only of England, but of all Europe, that failure had attended the attempts to which he referred. That opportunity had been lost, but occasions would recur again and again. If the principles of international action which he had endeavoured to explain should find any acceptance in the councils of this country, there would be no want of opportunities to put them in operation. Even within the last two or three days, he understood, Russia had reiterated the determination of the Czar to make no territorial aggrandizement. As the war proceeded step by step there would no doubt be stages at which it would be in the power of this country to help the Czar in completing the work he had undertaken. This discussion served to give expression to the feeling, which, in his opinion, was shared by the majority of the people of this country, that the power of England should be exerted on behalf of justice in alliance with the Czar. ["No!"] He might, of course, be mistaken in what he had just said. It was a question of the estimate of public forces outside, and he only went on the evidence as it had been presented to himself. No doubt the majority of the Members of that House were of opinion that the judgment he had expressed was wrong. But he was not discouraged on that account. There watched and waited upon the deliberations of Parliament an enfranchised and generous people; and he would be content, in the event of defeat in that House, to go before the tribunal of their judgment, to which the pleas of humanity and of justice were never addressed in vain.

Mr. Courtney

MR. CHAPLIN: In the remarkable speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, in spite of the want of intellect with which he charged us who sit on this side of the House, I am free to acknowledge that it left nothing to be desired in the frank, manly, and straightforward avowal of the policy which, in his opinion, ought to be pursued. Perhaps, however, before going into the general matter of the remarks which I am about to submit to it, the House will allow me to make a few remarks on the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe), made at the close of the debate on Tuesday night. The right hon. Gentleman delivered a speech on the occasion which was full of severe and caustic criticism upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. He characterized it as being full of blunders, distinguished by faults of judgment and temper and obvious concealment. He began with the Andrassy Note, and said that document was deprived of its grace by the manner in which Lord Derby gave his adhesion to it. I entirely dissent from that opinion, but I shall say nothing more about it. He then went on to speak of the Berlin Memorandum, and contended that it contained the principle of a satisfactory solution of this question. It had been rejected, he said, by Her Majesty's Government on "small and technical grounds." I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman means by "small and technical grounds." The "small and technical ground" on which it was rejected was that it recommended armed intervention in the affairs of Turkey if the proposals it contained were not accepted by the Porte. In other words, it proposed a policy of coercion, and that is precisely the policy against which Her Majesty's Government was consistently opposed, and which it is quite unprepared to adopt now. However, the right hon. Gentleman went on to charge the Prime Minister with having spoken of the massacres that occurred in Bulgaria in a spirit of levity. As I am a follower of the Prime Minister I feel bound to vindicate him from such a charge. When it is said that the Head of the Government is guilty of levity in regard to such a question as this it is a slander not only upon him, but upon the Administration of which he is the head. Perhaps the House will allow me to quote the words of Lord Beaconsfield himself with reference to this charge. In a letter to The Times, dated September 6, he said—

"There are some occasions on which a misstatement, frequently repeated, ought to be noticed. There is such a case, I think, in your leading article of yesterday. I never used such an expression as 'an historical people,' to which it is difficult to annex a precise idea, or ever sought to raise a laugh at the more primitive and speedy methods used by such peoples to get rid of their enemies. My statement was in answer to one that 10,000 Bulgarians had been submitted to torture. I was perfectly grave when I replied that I was sceptical as to such occurrences, as massacre, not torture, was the custom of an Oriental (not historical) people. Unhappily, it has turned out that I was correct. Certainly, on the occasion in question there was, to my surprise, a laugh, but it came, as I was subsequently told, only from one Member. I hope the misplaced laughter of another is no proof of the levity of your obedient servant, BEACONSFIELD."

This, I think, is a conclusive answer, and should be accepted as such by hon. Members on both sides of the House. The right hon. Gentleman, however, went on to argue that this levity caused the Autumn agitation. Has it ever occurred to the right hon. Gentleman that there may be changes of circumstances as well as changes of policy? The Government at the time of the speech of Lord Beaconsfield had not received any official information of the circumstances that occurred in Bulgaria, but when they received further and fuller details from Mr. Baring's Report the circumstances were by no means the same; and within the very first week after this official information had been received the Government sent a despatch to their Ambassador to be communicated to the Porte, the severity and stringency of which has been frequently commented upon in these debates. The right hon. Gentleman then referred to the Guildhall speech, and said it was an ungenerous answer to the protestations of Russia. I disagree entirely with that view, and I think the language that was used was that of a great statesman who deserved well of his countrymen; and the right hon. Gentleman would have been nearer the mark if he had said that it contained a timely, though, alas, an ineffectual warning to Russia. The Prime Minister, however, repeated that language in "another place," which by the Rules of this House we are not permitted to mention, and not one of the Colleagues or supporters of the right hon. Gentleman there challenged the statement; and I must say that it would have been more becoming if the right hon. Gentleman had refrained from making the charge in the absence of the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) in his speech made one remark to which I wish to refer. He said that the answer of Lord Derby to the Circular of Prince Gortchakoff was ill-advised, violent, and provoking. I think, on the other hand, that a more dignified Paper, and one more deservedly warranted, was never penned in the British Foreign Office. The right hon. Gentleman certainly did not say in so many words that in the conduct of these negotiations the voice of Her Majesty's Government was the voice of Jacob, but the hands were the hands of Esau, but he did insinuate that, although the despatch was unwillingly penned by Lord Derby, it was dictated by Lord Beaconsfield. Well, whose voice would you wish to hear in a great and solemn crisis like this but the voice of the Prime Minister of England? But it was not only the voice of Lord Beaconsfield; it was the voice of Lord Derby as well—aye, and of a united Cabinet also. I once for all protest against the insinuations that have been made about the existence of divisions in the Cabinet, based upon reports taken from evening newspapers, for which there is not the shadow of a foundation. I believe that in the minds of those who make it the wish is father to the thought. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), however, comes forward in the boldest manner and urges upon us not only a war policy, but a policy of dismemberment of the Turkish Empire. I will only say this with regard to the policy of coercion that is proposed by the hon. Gentleman opposite, that it comes a good deal too late; and when I oppose a policy of dismemberment, although I am not prepared to say what should be put in its place, I am prepared to say that if it were to be carried out by Russia and England Russia would want a portion of the spoil, Germany would want a slice, and Austria would require something. In my opinion, a more dangerous policy could not be proposed. Upon the Resolutions, or rather what were the Resolutions of the right hon.

Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), I have a word or two to say. When I came down to the House on Monday night I was in hopes that we were about to be confronted at last with a Motion which was meant to be something more than simply one of those to hang speeches on, of which there have been too many. I was sanguine enough to believe that the time had at length arrived when we were to have something more than the irregular warfare which has been pursued so long, and that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, having taken a careful survey of the position, was prepared at last to lead an onslaught on Her Majesty's Government. From what took place on Monday night, however, I must say that we are again doomed to disappointment. I share to the full the bewilderment of hon. Gentlemen with regard to the position in which we are placed, and the change that has come over the spirit of the dream of the right hon. Gentleman. I think his courage has failed him again at the last moment, and that under a speech which for force and splendour the like of which has seldom been heard in this House, he has, to use military language, been engaged in the operation of what is generally known as covering a retreat. I regret that more than I can say. I always thought it a grievous error on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, and a grave misfortune for the interests of England and of Europe, that this question had not been brought to a decisive issue the moment Parliament re-assembled. I thought so then, and I think so now, because I hold it to be impossible that if there was any real division of opinion among us that Europe, and, more especially, that Russia should know what the actual opinion of the Parliament of this country was as to the course she was contemplating and evidently pursuing. Even now I cannot help thinking that, if this had been done, if such an expression of our opinion had been elicited as would have shown to the world and to Russia how much in this country we should have been opposed to the independent action of Russia, Russia would have paused long, if she had not altogether refrained from taking steps which now were perhaps beyond hope of recall, and by which, I fear, she is too deeply committed. I may be asked how it was, that holding these views, no one on this side of the House felt it to be his duty to make such a Motion. We could not do that on this side of the House, because it would have been moving a Vote of Confidence in ourselves. I do not think either that such a Motion could have come from the noble Lord opposite, the Leader of the Opposition. He is, at all events, the recognized Leader on that side of the House, and we had no right to expect any such Motion from him; for so long ago as last August, just before Parliament was prorogued, and in the very last speech he made, he concluded a statement by saying that, on the whole, he approved of the policy which Her Majesty's Government had pursued. Not so the right hon. Gentleman who brought forward these Resolutions. He took a very different course last Autumn, and one that disclosed a remarkable state of affairs, the culmination of which, I suppose, we witnessed in the events of last Monday night. Very soon after that speech of the noble Lord the right hon. Gentleman fiercely denounced Her Majesty's Government because for 12 months or more he thought their policy had been deplorable and opposed to the convictions of the people of England, although the recognized Leader of the Opposition had spoken of it in terms of distinct, if not emphatic approval. I say that, under these circumstances, it rested with the right hon. Gentleman to take the sense and opinion of Parliament on the subject, as soon as it met, to obtain its opinion for the information of Europe and the instruction of Russia. I know that the state of public feeling in this country has been raised during this discussion, and the hon. Member for Liskeard has followed the example of the right hon. Gentleman by hinting his doubt as to the House being a fair exponent of public opinion on this question. I remember that in the Recess hon. Gentlemen opposite were loud in their appeals to have the decision submitted to the judgment of Parliament. One Member of the late Administration, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), whom I am glad to see in his place, went so far as to say that the demand was constitutionally wise, and that if it was complied with he did not fear what the verdict of Parliament would be. Parliament has now been met for time; but I suppose that hon. Gentlemen opposite find that its verdict is likely to be what they wish, and so they think it right to turn round a talk of appealing again to the country. And what, let me ask, is the feeling of the country? I think it will be admitted that the people of Salford represent very fairly the views and the feelings of the people of England. ["No." any rate, hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House thought so before election. The people of Salford given hon. Gentlemen the answer. They have told the right hon. Gentleman who has brought forward these Resolutions, that in the unhappy and unfortunate course he has pursued on this question, he has neither the confidence of this country, nor the opinion of Parliament with him. Long ago he could have found out the opinion of this House got a verdict upon this deplorable action. The right hon. Gentleman, in the exercise of his discretion, did not do whatever in the earlier stages of the war was a difficulty; and it is only now when the war was begun and the worst part of men were already aroused, that he thinks it the convenient moment to introduce his five Resolutions; and with due respect to him, I may be allowed to say that anything more ill-considered and impossible of fulfilment than these Resolutions cannot be very easily imagined. Four of those Resolutions have been withdrawn. ["No, no."] Well, three of them have been withdrawn. ["No, no."] Well, two of them have been withdrawn. ["No, no."] Well, one of them was, at all events, to use the words of the right hon. Gentleman, morally, if not materially, withdrawn. ["No, no."] Well, then, let us suppose that they are all still on the table, and that being the case, so much the better, as the House will have an opportunity of dividing upon them. It would not be much more wonderful if this than some of the proceedings that were criticized on Monday night. I would say a few words on the Resolutions, especially on the first, because in that, my opinion, was really contained the principle of them all. What I understand the right hon. Gentleman to propose was this. We were to promote concert of the European Powers, with a view to exact from the Porte certain changes of government in their own country—that was to say, we were to join with Russia and the other Powers if they consented to coerce Turkey, which meant armed intervention. I doubt very much whether the Powers would concert for that purpose. The despatches, I think with one exception, lead to a conclusion the opposite of this. The hon Member for Liskeard said that Austria was prepared to adopt such a course. I believe there is a despatch in which it is stated that Austria at one time made a sort of proposal to send the united fleets to the Bosphorus; but, so far as I can remember, the proposal was subsequently withdrawn. But there is another despatch to which I must call attention. It occurs in the Blue Book (No. 1, 1877), page 452. It is dated October 9, 1876, and is written by Mr. Malet to Lord Derby. It contains this passage—

“Signor Melegari told me that he had learnt with much satisfaction that Austro-Hungary had likewise refused to co-operate in the proposed intervention in the Turkish Provinces, for the presence of an Austrian occupying force in Bosnia would be a serious embarrassment to Italy, and would arouse questions which are happily at present dormant.”

But, after all, if there was so much efficacy in the policy of coercion, why were we not told of it when the Session commenced? Why did the right hon. Member for Greenwich content himself with saying at Taunton that he wished to impress on the people the duty of watching Her Majesty's Government? Why did he not state frankly what was in his mind—that coercion, and coercion alone, was the policy they ought to pursue? War had not then begun, and there was a chance, at any rate, that the threat of coercion might have had the effect of maintaining the general peace. But now that that time has gone by, and as Turkey is in the midst of her trouble, it seems to me to be unfair, if not cowardly, to propose any such measure. What fair reasons can be assigned for the proposed change in the course of policy towards Turkey which has been followed by English statesmen for so many years? Surely the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich is not the man to ask them to do that. The right hon. Gentleman would not plead that the reason why they should take such a course was the long system of oppression on the part of Turkey; because, whatever might have been the faults of the Porte in this respect, they had been condoned by the right hon. Gentleman himself, whose Government solemnly renewed the Treaty of 1856 in the year 1871. Nor can it be founded on the absence of any disposition on the part of Turkey to fulfil her obligations after the Crimean War; because on the authority of the right hon. Gentleman's own Government it was stated, that in 1872, those obligations were being fairly fulfilled, and that, as a class, the Christian subjects of the Porte had no cause to complain. Therefore, it is to later events that we must look for the changes of policy, and I suppose that the reasons assigned would be the massacres of Bulgaria; and, if so, it is only right that we should know everything with reference to those massacres. Some people seemed to imagine that the Turks were entirely responsible for those massacres. But I believe that Russia has to bear her share of the guilt which has been showered—I own with so much justice—on Turkey. What do we find in the Blue Book? Despatch after despatch bears upon this point, and as this is a part of the question which has been somewhat overlooked, I hope the House will allow me to read one or two short extracts. I find, on the 27th of July, Mr. Dupuis, referring to the destruction of Peroushtiza, says—

“M. Gueroff, the Russian Consul of Philippoli, now absent, is said to be the chief cause of this disaster.”—[Turkey, No. 1. (1877), p. 14.]

That is confirmed on the 11th of August by Sir Henry Elliot, who says, in a despatch to Lord Derby—

“A letter from Mr. Baring received yesterday contains these words:—‘There is not the slightest doubt that the Russian Consul at Philippoli had a leading part in creating the late insurrection.’”—[Ibid., p. 20.]

It is said the insurrection was promoted not by Regular troops, but by the Bashi Bazouks, and the right hon. Member for Greenwich asks who employed the Bashi Bazouks. Here is an answer, though I admit not a complete and satisfactory answer. On the 12th of September Sir Henry Elliot wrote to Lord Derby—

Mr. Chaplin

"The Grand Vizier asserts that the person really responsible for the general arming of the Mohamedans was Mahmoud Pasha, who, acting under the influence of the Russian Ambassador, used to send the troops applied for by the authorities."—[Ibid., p. 253.]

do say if we attentively study the uses of the insurrection, we can come to no other conclusion than that, if Turkey is guilty, Russia must bear her share of the blame. Shocking and horrible, therefore, as the massacres have been, they form no adequate reason for adopting a change in our traditional policy by joining with Russia in coercing Turkey for crimes for which Russia is partly herself responsible. I confess I fail to see how the wants of humanity and justice are to be secured by coercion; nor do I see how one nation should, under the circumstances, be punished and the other allowed to go free. "My object," said the right hon. Gentleman, "is the peace of the world," and he would accomplish that object by armed intervention, and by bringing six instead of only two of the Powers into collision. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the Government have failed entirely, but I believe that they have tried everything which, humanly speaking, could have been tried, to prevent war; and the country which was responsible for it was Russia. If Russia ever wanted peace, peace we should have at this moment; but as she wanted war, a war is now being waged in Asia and in Europe, the limits of which no man can foresee. No Government, I think, has ever had a more difficult task to contend with, but its difficulties and complications were in a ten-fold degree intensified by the course which was pursued by the right hon. Gentleman in the Autumn. I do not complain of that great outburst of natural sympathy, so far as it reflects the generous action of the English nation. I saw nothing in it but what every Englishman might be justly proud; but if these are the last words which I may utter in this House, I did denounce, and will continue to denounce, those who, at a risk of inciting a war which might lead to a general conflagration of Europe, to the prejudice of any arrangement of peace which might have been made, did not scruple to use for political ends, the best feelings of our nature, the generous, noble instincts of the English people. Can there be anyone who does not feel that upon the leaders of that movement, who had made such a series of attacks upon the Government, a large share of responsibility for the present unhappy position in which Europe is now placed rests? I ask, would the armies of Russia have been moved, but for the speeches, writings, meetings, and pamphlets of the right hon. Gentleman, misrepresenting as they did the feelings and opinions of the people of England? And then there was the pamphlet which has been so often referred to, which some have called "famous," and which was translated and published among the Russian people. With all these things the question which I have asked might well be asked; but I should be sorry to answer it were I in the place of the right hon. Member for Greenwich. God forbid that I should impute to the right hon. Gentleman aught but the best and highest motives. I would scorn to do so of a man who, however much I might disagree with him on political grounds, is an honour to his country. The right hon. Gentleman made an appeal to this House on Monday which wrung from foes as well as friends a tribute of enthusiastic admiration, not only for its eloquence and power, but also for the unmistakeable convictions and sympathies by which it was inspired. But why did the right hon. Gentleman not allow to those on this side of the House a small portion, at any rate, of those feelings which they as much honoured as himself. For myself, I would say—"Give to the Porte a further time of trial and probation for the execution of the reforms which she promised under the watchful vigilance of the Powers, but free from the ever-pressing curse of unscrupulous interference." I know the right hon. Gentleman disagrees with me and I will not venture for a moment to put my opinion against that of the right hon. Gentleman; but I will quote an opinion, the weight and authority of which the right hon. Gentleman will be the first to recognize. What said the man of iron will, to whose ability and experience the right hon. Gentleman testified with so much eloquence on Monday?—

"Give them (the reforms) a fair trial and they may turn out to be a reality, and in that case perhaps the better for wearing the semblance of a voluntary act. Should they prove a failure the pressure might surely be renewed with a better show of reason and a better prospect of success."

Those were the words of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, a man who was par excellence the greatest authority upon the Eastern Question; and, in the face of that opinion, has the right hon. Gentleman nothing better to offer than the cruel and bitter charges he has made against Gentlemen on this side, because, with one common object, our policy is different from his? I am grateful to the House for the kindness with which they have heard me, and I will detain them only a very few minutes longer. I cannot help feeling that it is too late now to undo or recall the past; we have only to deal with the present and the future. What is the duty of England in the present crisis? is the question on every lip, and which we have to decide. I believe that duty to be this—to maintain a strict and severe neutrality, to minimize and limit as far as may be the area of the war, to seek the earliest opportunity of restoring peace, and to abstain from all and every interference as long as the interests of Britain permit. But neither the ridicule which has been so unkindly cast upon us, nor taunts nor sneers about British selfishness shall tempt me to forget, even though others may not remember, what those interests at this time really mean. They mean the welfare, the happiness of 200,000,000 subjects of the Queen. If it were selfishness to govern, for their good, races dependent upon us by the civilizing progress of the West, to foster and develop material happiness and prosperity in the East, to give the people there equal laws, to mete out even-handed justice—if that be nought but selfishness, if the Government and the House of Commons, and the self-sacrificing efforts of the servants of the Queen to rescue from the pangs of famine and from agonizing death the starving millions of our people, then I, for one, am content to accept the charge, and say that a higher duty, a nobler task no Minister or Statesman could desire than to guard and defend such interests as those. Our duty in addition is to watch and wait in readiness and armed preparation with this fixed, steady purpose in our minds—that Russia shall never set foot in Constantinople while we have a man or a gun to prevent it; that our highway to India shall be kept free and open to us for ever, if our ships have to sweep the Mediterranean to effect it. It is for the Government to decide what measures and preparations it may be for them to take for that purpose. I would remind them, however, of a pregnant sentence or two assigned to Lord Dalhousie, who presided over the Royal Commission of 1866—

"Recent events, however, have taught us that we must not rely in future on having time for preparation. Wars will be sudden in their commencement and short in their duration, and woe to that country which is not prepared to defend itself against any contingency that may arise, or combination that may be formed against it."

I would ask the question—"Are we prepared at this moment?" I trust that before long we shall be told by those who are responsible that the position of this country will be one of armed and complete preparation, as well as of strict neutrality. It is by these considerations that the policy of England must be guided at the present crisis—not in haste, not in panic, not in hurry; but with the firm, unalterable determination which becomes us as Englishmen and Members of the British House of Commons, that by that standard of our interests, of our duties, and our rights, we as a nation will either stand or fall.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Mr. Speaker,—If I may be allowed to select out of the numerous speeches to which I have attentively listened, that which most nearly expresses my own views as to the Eastern Question, I should select the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), because it was founded on his own recent experience in the East, and it thoroughly comprehends all that I have thought and have often expressed as to Turkish rule in Europe, of which I have had a personal knowledge for more than 30 years. I speak, however, only for myself; I have no authority to represent the views of any of my Parliamentary Colleagues: indeed, as a body we have no collective views on this subject, but I will claim to represent the feelings of my own constituents. The county of Galway has always supported the cause of the oppressed Christians of the East, never with so much power and effect as when it was represented by my late Colleague, Sir William Gregory, whose speeches in 1860 on the atrocities in

Crete riveted the attention of the country not more by their generosity and their truth than by the classic beauty of the language in which he clothed them. But, Mr. Speaker, I will go even further, and boldly claim on behalf of the people of Ireland that it is a calumny to assert, as some do, that they care nothing for the sufferings of the Eastern Christians because they are not of their own faith; and if anyone had the hardihood to appear on a platform in Ireland to maintain that because Russia has oppressed the Roman Catholic Poles, or because she now grievously oppresses the unhappy Catholics in her Empire, that therefore we are to maintain the hated rule of the Turk, and to assist him to keep in misery and subjection those who, like ourselves, find rest for their souls under the shadow of the Cross, I venture to say he would be driven away with execration. The Irish people sympathize with human suffering wherever it is to be found. They, Sir, have learned from their own unhappy history to keep ever fresh in their hearts, and often on their lips, that beautiful and pathetic prayer in which we call upon the common Father of all mankind, "to show pity upon all prisoners and captives, and upon all who are desolate and oppressed." But it has been asked—Why was Ireland silent during the Autumn, when England and Scotland were agitated from one end to the other by the Bulgarian atrocities? The answer is not difficult to find. The Irish people disbelieve in the sincerity of Parties on either side of this House, and remembering their own experience, doubt the genuineness of the cry of humanity which coincides with the cry of a political combination. They know from the testimony of their own fathers, and from the despatches of Lord Cornwallis during the Irish Rebellion, that rapine and flame, lust and murder, everywhere accompanied the march of His Majesty's troops, till their very commander cried out in shame and anger to the Government of the day. They remember the putting down of the Indian Mutiny, when men were blown from guns, and their limbs scattered to the winds of Heaven, because, in pursuance of a policy which seemed to have been born of Hell, advantage was taken of the belief of these Hindoos that in such a mode of death they lost both soul and body. An hon. Gentleman exclaims that it was a common Indian punishment. Will he contend that if we go to Corea, we are to adopt crucifixion as a punishment, because it is common there? Nor do the Irish forget that during the Jamaica insurrection it was thought a notable and praiseworthy discovery that excellent and enduring cats could be made of piano wire. Turning now to the present debate, I must say that nothing has filled me with more sorrow than the tone of half the speeches that have been delivered—speeches that may fittingly be described as recriminatory speeches. Hon. and right gon. Gentlemen, on one side or the other, seem to think more of taunting each other than of the greatness of the subject, or of the many and momentous interests involved. Why, say the Government supporters to this side, did you not do so and so when you were so long in office? Why, answers the Opposition, did you so word such a despatch? Why did you neglect such and such a recent opportunity? I am weary utterly of hearing of Treaties and despatches. "A plague on both your Houses." All your Governments are in fault; the House of Commons is in fault; the country is in fault; and, like great national faults, the stain will not be wiped out without bitter retribution. We stand on this subject of Turkish oppression in the same position as the United States stood as regards slavery. For long years the Northern States, knowing the evil, deploring the sin, forbidden as it was by their own Constitution, connived at slavery, sacrificed their most cherished convictions, all for the sake of the almighty dollar, and for an ignoble peace. But at last the time came when the patience of the nation was exhausted, and at the Convention of Leavenworth the people said—Thus far, and no further. Then was raised the dreadful veil that concealed the Civil War, and, through untold suffering, the United States set free the slave, and paid the penalty of its sin. So—God grant it may be without the suffering—must it be with us. The massacres of Bulgaria have filled the cup of endurance to overflowing, and the knell of Turkish tyranny at last has sounded. But you, the Conservative Party, during the American War, acted exactly the part you are acting now. Your cry

then, as now, was for British interests, and you thought that the break-up of the great American Republic was to serve the cause of British interests—let slavery continue for ever, so that the States be rent in twain. And now British interests demand the integrity of the Turkish Empire, let Christian peoples be kept for ever in bondage more galling, in a tyranny more appalling, in abominations unequalled except in the descriptions and denunciations of St. Paul. And how has your boasted diplomacy served you?—that diplomacy which no man can depend upon, and which never tells the truth, as I will proceed to show. In 1868 we had the Cretan debates, and, as usual, Lord Stanley, then a Member of this House, minimizes and denies. In July, 1869, the present Baron Dowse asked how the Sultan was fulfilling his solemn promises to the Christians, and Mr. Otway, then Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, answered “most satisfactorily.” In April of next year Sir David Wedderburn inquired about the unhappy people of the Sporades Islands, and again Mr. Otway answers, “the Turkish Government is removing all real grounds of complaint, and any dissatisfaction and disturbances are all owing to people in London,” just as now Christian risings are owing to people in St. Petersburg. In July of the next year Sir John Gray—and I am glad that it is Irish Members who have always interfered—repeated the inquiry; and Viscount Enfield, who had succeeded to the office and to the traditions of our foreign policy, again gave the stereotyped reply. Next year, on the 5th August, 1872, Sir John Gray—and I will quote the exact words—inquired of Viscount Enfield—

“If he would inform the House whether the authorities of the Ottoman Porte are giving effect to the provisions contained in various edicts issued by the Sultan of Turkey during recent years in favour of his Christian subjects?”

Let the House listen to Viscount Enfield’s reply—

“Sir, the latest report received from Constantinople, received two days ago, states that, as a general rule, the edicts in favour of the Christians are fairly carried into effect, and that as a class they have no reason for complaint.”—[3 Hansard, ccxiii. 454.]

And it is just the same now—the Foreign Office is the last to hear, the British Consuls who have been so long in the East that they have ceased to look on things with English eyes, are the last to understand that anything is wrong; and if it had not been for the enterprize of the Press, and the daring of the newspaper correspondents, all the horrors denied so long by officials would have been kept back from the people of this country. But if we would understand the ins and the outs of this question, we must carefully distinguish between the official Turk and the lower classes of Moslems, and it must not be supposed that the Christians alone were oppressed. On the contrary, nothing can be worse than the condition of the villagers both in Turkey and in Egypt. Amongst the lower Mussulmans you will often find fidelity, truth, hospitality, a sense of justice, as well as the sobriety and resignation which their religion teaches them. But for the anti-human type you must go to the man who farms the taxes, or to the Turk who has graduated in the saloons of London or of Paris, and who, with a splendid forgetfulness of the Koran, has contracted a taste for the good things and the champagne of the West. Let me read to the House a few lines describing the character of the Turkish Government—

“Wherever the Turk is suffered to predominate and to be implicitly obeyed, laziness, corruption, extravagance, and penury mark his rule; and wherever he is too feeble to exert more than a doubtful and a nominal authority, the system of Government that prevails is that of the Arab robber and the lawless Highland chieftain.”

These were the words, not of some novelist or fanciful writer, they were the words of your own Ambassador, Sir Henry Bulwer, in 1860. Lord Dalling, as he afterwards became, knew the official Moslem well; and it is related of him that when he once went to Cairo to observe for himself as to whether slaves were still bought and sold, he quietly got his information, and, accepting in the politest way all the official assurances given to him, put on his cloak one evening, and, attended by two or three Kavasses, walked straight up to the house where he knew the sale was going on as briskly as ever. And I have more than once told the Government in this House that if it will even now bid its Consul use his eyes, he will find cargoes of slaves on the Nile, not far from Cairo, passing under the noses of the Provincial Gover-

nora, notwithstanding all the assurances of the Foreign Office. This I mention in passing as an illustration of the worthlessness of our diplomatic system—none so blind as those who will not see. It is not through our diplomatic Staff that we know what has passed and is passing in the East. It is, I repeat, the newspaper correspondents—those brave and fearless men who have not feared to tell the truth—that have aroused the English people, and at last have extorted from unwilling officials a confirmation of the hideous tales of massacre and outrage. But, Sir, we are now brought face to face with this terrible Eastern Question, to settle it, I hope, for ever. On the one hand we have 3,000,000 of Mussulmans keeping in bondage 11,500,000 Christians, and who, if the Christian nations had been united, would have been liberated long ago. The Turk invariably yields to what he calls his Kismet or Fate; he has a tradition that he is not to remain in Europe, in which he is a lawless intruder, of which there can be no better proof than that all Constantinople Turks bury their dead in Asia, lest the hated foot of the Giaour should one day tread upon their graves. Suppose we reverse the picture; would 11,500,000 Mahomedans, who really do believe in their religion, have suffered 3,000,000 Christians to hold them in this abject subjection? And do you think that the Turk credits you with believing in your own religion? No—to him you are an unbelieving dog—he despises the Christian in his heart, he tolerates him when it is not worth while to crush him, and when Englishmen and Members of Parliament go to Constantinople and accept the cajoleries and the delicate hospitalities of some astute Pasha, and come back here to sound the praises of the civilized Turk, they only deepen the contempt and scorn which the Mussulman entertains for the Christian race. It is a false issue to put it as it has been put in this debate, that to hate Turkish tyranny is to love Russian oppression. It is no question between Russia and Turkey—it is the question between justice and mercy and foul wrong and oppression; between a Christianity which, imperfect as it may be, yet contains within it that element of moral development and of social progress which appertains to every believer in Christ, but is impossible in the orthodox Mahomedan. The noble Lord (Lord Eslington) told us the other day that we ought to be tender with the Turk when he does not admit Christian testimony against a Mussulman, because the Koran forbids it. Why, Sir, that is the very reason why we must get rid of the Turk. So long as he is an orthodox believer, it is impossible for him to do justice to the Christian; and this is, in truth, the secret of your diplomatic failures. Then we are told that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) has discovered a new policy. It is no such thing. In 1865, the right hon. Gentleman said in the debate—

and this, I believe, is his doctrine now. [Mr. GLADSTONE made a gesture of assent.]—

“The best resistance (continued the right hon Member in the same speech) to be offered to Russia is by the strength and freedom of the countries which will have to resist her. You want to place a living barrier between Russia and Turkey, and there is no barrier like the breasts of free men.”

These, Sir, are noble sentiments, and for my part I elect to stand on them. The European Powers will never allow the extension of Russian acquisition south of the Danube, or permit to her the possession of Constantinople; but that we Christian men should connive at these hideous wrongs, on some fanciful speculation that Russia may one day possess the Danubian Principalities—a thing incredible so long as Austria, Hungary, and Germany continue to exist—is, to my mind, altogether inexplicable. But, then, we are told, there is the Euphrates Valley and English interests in the East. Who, let me ask, is wise enough to tell us what are English interests in the East? Has the House forgotten the history of the Suez Canal? The greatest statesman of modern times, the most experienced Foreign Secretary, the most skilful diplomatist, from first to last opposed the making of the Suez Canal, because, in his opinion, it would be contrary to British interests. Yet, if he had lived, Lord Palmerston would have learned that the existence of the Suez Canal has immeasurably served the cause of

[Third Night.]

British interests, and of British Eastern power. A railway through the valley of the Euphrates would be an enormous blessing to mankind, even if it is made by Russia—a prospect distant indeed. There is no injury Russia can do to us so great as we can do to ourselves when we desert the principles of our forefathers, and refuse to recognize the voice of humanity in our dealings with our co-religionists in the East of Europe. We may lose our own self-respect in idle panic; we may lose the respect of the World, and the affection of those races that will yet be free; but if there is a repetition of the massacres and crimes of the Autumn, and the Conservative Party adopts the tone and the semi-indifference of the past—the Government, with all its majority, will be swept away by the awakened anger of the subjects of the Queen, and no other will be able to stand in its place that fails to remember that the watchword of a Christian people should be “do justice and fear not.”

MR. J. G. HUBBARD was desirous of giving some explanation of the part he had taken at the meeting held in the Guildhall last Autumn, and of the course he intended to adopt in reference to the question now before the House. All England was thrilled with horror at the terrible events which had happened in Bulgaria, and the City of London was among the foremost to express its opinion on the subject at the great meeting to which he had referred. Resolutions were unanimously adopted on that occasion which were subsequently presented to Lord Derby, and these three points were especially insisted upon—first, an expression of horror at the atrocities perpetrated in Bulgaria, and of sympathy with the suffering Christians of European Turkey; second, an expression of utter despair of any amendment on the part of the Turkish Government in its course of misrule; and the third was an appeal to Her Majesty's Government to use such means and influence as they possessed, in concurrence with the other Great Powers of Europe, to bring about not only an immediate amendment in the government of Turkey, but to obtain securities for the future. He need not comment upon the course of policy which had been pursued from that day to this, or on the many remarkable events which had signalized

the policy of this country during the last 18 months. He would, however, state his belief that the expression of feeling which had proceeded from the citizens of London was shared by the whole country and by the Members of Her Majesty's Government. One unfortunate feature of the controversy which ensued was that so much personal feeling had been mixed up in the matter, and so many unfounded charges made in reference to the conduct of public men who ought to have been far above suspicion. As to the course which, in his opinion, should have been pursued in dealing with Turkey during the progress of the negotiations on the Eastern Question, he maintained that if the 9th Article of the Treaty of Paris, which insured the territorial integrity and independence of the Porte, was to be regarded as involving a perpetual obligation, anything like effective intervention on the part of the Great Powers in favour of the Christians was out of the question. The Turks were too astute not to see what effect that Article must have in Europe, and therefore they never gave heed to anything in the shape of moral persuasion. If, too, it was laid down that remonstrance on their behalf was in no event to be followed by coercion, our dealings with the Government of Turkey must in the same way be deprived of the slightest efficacy. If, however, a remonstrance had been made to the Porte, undiluted and unqualified by any declaration of doubt as to the mode in which it was to be enforced, the Turks, he believed, must have submitted to the pressure, seeing that the disparity of strength between them and the Great Powers was so enormous. Suppose it were said that by taking that firm course they would have been in danger of coming into actual collision, his answer would be that it would be impossible to adopt any policy without running that risk. But why should there be such a morbid feeling against taking a bold course, because of the risk of collision, when the country had a great Army and a great Navy? War implied a sacrifice of blood and of treasure, and this country had never refused to shed and expend them in the cause of humanity. The country would not shrink from war if the cause was one that she could engage in as a duty. There were now certain propositions before the House, and he must state that the feelings which he entertained at Guildhall, and when he went as one of the deputation to Lord Derby, were exactly expressed in the first two Resolutions of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich. He could not, however, vote in favour of those Resolutions, because his right hon. Friend, who was instinct with so generous a feeling on behalf of suffering humanity, made in the course of his forcible speech so serious an impeachment of the Government that, differing absolutely from him in his view of their conduct, he thought it would be wrong of him to give his assent to the Resolutions as the outcome of that speech. Still less did he find himself able to concur in the Motion of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff); and therefore, without retreating in the least from any of the opinions which he had expressed, he felt it to be his duty to abstain from supporting by his vote any of the Resolutions now before the House. He wished, in conclusion, to observe that he deeply regretted the imputation of unworthy motives which, in dealing with this question, pervaded too often the speeches of even eminent public men.

MR. LAING claimed the indulgence of the House in rising to speak upon the question, inasmuch as he had in connection with it refused office some 20 years ago. It seemed to him, he might add, that apart from the wording of the Resolutions of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, there were two great and paramount objects which he had in view in proposing them—the first being, by means of an appeal to the House and the country, to frustrate the efforts of those who were endeavouring to get up a Russian scare in order to drift us into war. In addition to this, his right hon. Friend, being challenged to say what he wanted, laid down in his third and fourth Resolutions the outline of a broad, wise, and generous national policy. Yet, while he heartily concurred in that policy, he thought its assertion was of less importance at the present moment than the prevention of a Russian scare which might drift us into war. If that policy could have been adopted by the House, or by the country at an earlier period—if at the time Lord Salisbury was at Constantinople and the Conference was still sitting such a line had been followed—he believed that all the horrors of war might have been averted and that a great and beneficent end might have been attained. At the same time, hostilities having now broken out, he must admit that it was open to considerable question whether it would be wise for the House to lay down any abstract Resolutions of policy for the future—to lay down any Resolutions which, under the varying conditions of military events, might not prove altogether applicable. There were some Members of the Opposition who objected to a policy of coercion as being likely to lead to war, and as the persistence of his right hon. Friend might have led to great divisions on that side of the House and neutralized the effect of the first two Resolutions, the wise and patriotic course had been adopted of sacrificing the minor to the major object, and the result was that the Liberal Party would go to a united vote on the question. There could be no doubt that there were a great many persons who, in their hearts, really desired that England should take part in a war with Turkey against Russia. It was evident, also, that that was the general tone of what was called West-end opinion on the subject. One could scarcely go to a club or to a West-end dinner party without finding that three men out of every four were so blinded with antipathy to Russia that they were incapable of calmly reasoning on the question, and evidently had no wish except to see a repetition of the conflict in the Crimea. But what about West-end opinion on other matters? What about the opinion of the West-end of London during the war with America? Would not that opinion, had it been acted upon, have involved this country in a war in support of the Southern slaveholders as against the Northern States? Again, was not West-end opinion strongly adverse to the formation of the great German Empire; and had the establishment of that Empire proved prejudicial to British interests? Was it not, on the contrary, one of the greatest safeguards in connection with those interests? The same might be said with respect to Italy. West-end opinion had been entirely opposed to a free and independent Italian Kingdom; but such a Kingdom now existed, and could any person doubt that it was best for English interests that there should be a free and independent Italy? On all these questions events had proved that West-end opinion had been entirely wrong. At the time of the Crimean War there were reasonable grounds of apprehension of Russia. Germany was not then an united Empire; Austria had just been rescued from ruin by a Russian Army. France, Russia, and England were the only three Great Powers who were able to move in the Eastern Question; and if we had refused the invitation of France, it was possible that Russia might have been strong enough to take Constantinople. Now the conditions of the problem were changed. The preponderance of military force was on the side of Germany and Austria, and it would be as difficult for Russia to go to Constantinople without their leave as for her to go to Vienna or Berlin. Germany and Austria might also be left to take care of the mouths of the Danube. But then we were told that we must look at Asia. Now, he had heard the question of a Russian invasion of India discussed on the spot by men of great military knowledge and experience. He would first remind the House of the opinion of Lord Hardinge, a great warrior as well as a statesman, who, in 1847, being asked to give his views to the Government of that day, said that India could only be approached by Russia through Afghanistan and the Khyber Pass. Such an invasion was, however, for military reasons, impracticable, or, if it were attempted, a Russian Army could be met by a superior force. "As to a Russian invasion of India," said Lord Hardinge, "depend upon it, it is a political nightmare." That despatch was referred to a still higher authority, and the Duke of Wellington said—"Lord Hardinge is quite right. Rely upon it you have nothing to apprehend from Russia in that quarter." Since that time our position in India with regard to a Russian invasion had been enormously strengthened. The Sikh State and Scinde were then hostile. Afghanistan was also opposed to us in consequence of the unwise invasion into which we were hurried by a Russian scare exactly identical with that which so many people were trying to get up at the present time. We had now the Punjaub, the Sikh State, and Scinde, which, so far from being hostile, now formed the strongest bulwark against a Russian invasion that we could possibly possess. Then as regarded Afghanistan, as long as we pursued the sensible policy of Lord Canning and Lord Lawrence—which had been observed for some years past—of keeping out of all complications with that country, and letting its people know that we had no desire to interfere with their independence—what had we to apprehend from them? If Afghanistan was invaded by a Russian force with a view to a subsequent attack upon India, the Afghans must gravitate to our side, for they would know that the Russians would never withdraw from their territory. Unless, therefore, we were going to adopt an entirely new policy we had nothing to fear from Afghanistan. The cure, in short, he would suggest for those who were afflicted with Russia on the brain was a course of physical geography. If those who held such alarmists views upon the subject were only to take such a lesson as is ordinarily given to a child in a National School, they would learn that there was such a range as the Himalaya mountains, the lowest pass of which was higher than the top of Mont Blanc, which barred the way to India, leaving but one road open by the Valley of the Emphrates, which terminated in the caldesao of the Persian Gulf, where one British ironclad could stop the legions of Russia. And what, he would ask, was the amount of impedimenta with which a Russian Army of Invasion must necessarily be encumbered? Why, for every fighting man sent to the front there would, according to careful calculation, be required two camels, and one horse and a half. An army of 50,000 Russians would require 100,000 camels, 75,000 horses, and in addition to that, they should have 500,000 camp followers. Why, then, were we to get up a scare on the subject of a Russian invasion of India, which would cost us millions of money? It was the most ridiculous conception which could enter the mind of man—to use the words of Lord Hardinge, it was a political nightmare. He had never, whatever his own private sympathies might have been, swerved from the policy of non-intervention, nor would he do so now but for the Bulgarian atrocities, for which he considered that England was morally responsible, though he did not advocate a policy of Quixotism for the redress of grievances all the world over. It had been said that Russia had been guilty of atrocities in Poland; but if that were so, we were not in any sense responsible for them. If, however, they considered the case of the Christian subjects of the Porte they could not but see that England was morally responsible for what had occurred, having, among other things, set Turkey up as the result of the Crimean War. The Bulgarian massacres drew the attention of this country to what Turkish misrule really meant, and marked an era in the Eastern Question. There were two theories which had been held in regard to Turkey—the one, the old tradition of the English Foreign Office which excluded all mention of Turkish misdeeds. On the other hand, we had the theory of travellers, newspaper correspondents, missionaries, and others who visited the country, all of whom concurred in stating that the Christian inhabitants were subjected to a grinding misgovernment which no man could tolerate for a moment when he saw the slightest means of getting out of it. In the case of the Bulgarian atrocities they had Mr. Schuyler and The Daily News Correspondent maintaining that awful atrocities had been committed; and they had Sir Henry Elliot and the English officials generally ignoring them as long as it was possible to do so. A crucial experiment was made by the sending of Mr. Baring—a witness of whose impartiality there could be no doubt, and the result of his Report was that the Foreign Office and official theory was exploded, and the theory as to the existence of oppression and the committal of atrocities established, and if there were the slightest desire on the part of Turkey to put a stop to that state of things, why, he asked, had not the known authors of the atrocities been brought to justice? It was impossible to rely upon Turkey doing anything in order to reform her institutions and her internal administration, and he could not understand this country standing by and approving a do-nothing policy of the kind. If he believed in the existence of the aggressive designs attributed to Russia, he should be the last man to advocate the staking of England's fortunes upon a losing card; but he had no such belief. The Turkish cause was on the ebb. The Turks did not even keep up their population; they had no trade, nor did they till the soil. As far as he knew, no Turk ever made a competent fortune by honest industry; whereas the Christian subjects of the Porte had, wherever they were not absolutely exterminated by the dominant race, increased trade, tilled the soil, educated their children, and promoted the best interests of the human race. Therefore, by taking up the cause of the Turks England would be lending herself not only to a bad, but to a losing cause, which, if patched up now, would rise again in the course of a few years, and at a time when its settlement on a satisfactory basis would not be nearly as easy as at the present time. At present Germany and Austria were united in the same great interests as ourselves; whereas if the difficulty were now patched up, who could say that France, having recovered her military power, might not enter into a league with Russia to allow her to do as she liked at Constantinople, in return for aid to recover Alsace and Lorraine? The effect of our present policy of doing nothing to settle the Eastern Question might result, therefore, in our being obliged to see Russia do as she liked in the East, or in our being obliged to engage single-handed in one of the greatest European wars the world had ever seen. As to the distrust and antipathy to Russia now so commonly expressed, if they compared the conduct of Russia throughout the negotiations with that of Turkey, he thought it impossible to avoid coming to the conclusion that so far from Russia having determined upon war from the commencement, there never had been a moment at which Turkey might not, by simply choosing to say yes to the minimized demands of her antagonist, have averted the war. Turkey had made no concessions, nor, indeed, had she taken any steps to promote European peace; whereas Russia had, among other things, emancipated her serfs—one of the grandest measures in the advancement of progress that the world had ever seen. In fact, there was no point of comparison between Russia and Turkey in which the former was not infinitely superior. Much stress had been laid upon the encouragement which the agitation in this country had given to Russia; but he asked if no encouragement had been given to Turkey by the Aylesbury and Mansion House speeches of Lord Beaconsfield. He agreed with Lord Carnarvon that a policy of suspicion against Russia was ungenerous and hateful, and the sooner we got rid of our Russian scare the better it would be for our interests and our future tranquillity. In conclusion, he implored hon. Gentlemen opposite to consider the great responsibility which would devolve upon them if, for the sake of a little temporary advantage, they precipitated a conflict which would entail such terrible consequences on future generations.

MR. RITCHIE considered that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, by speaking upon his Resolutions as a whole, had in spirit violated the arrangement which had been made for the purpose of uniting the Liberal Party. The country would not separate the right hon. Gentleman's speech from his Resolutions, but would understand that those who supported his first Resolution practically committed themselves to the spirit of the whole of them; and while those who voted against it would be regarded as in favour of maintaining neutrality and peace, those who supported it would be considered to have voted for the coercion of Turkey. He thought the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich was worse than that originally contemplated, because he now declined to take the responsibility of moving a Resolution which, if it pointed to anything, pointed to coercion. Hon. Gentlemen opposite told the House that the country had expressed its opinion in favour of these Resolutions. He entirely repudiated the notion that any such expression of opinion had occurred. Meetings that were called by telegram sent from the Liberal Association in London did not express the opinion of the people of this country. He had recently seen a poster in certain parts of London calling a meeting at St. James's Hall, and headed with three alarming words—"War, war, war!" He wondered whether the gentlemen who attended that meeting went to it under the notion that by attending and making speeches they were practically preaching war instead of assisting to prevent the Government from going to war. The recent meetings were of a very different character from those which were held in the Autumn, and with regard to which he heartily agreed with the Home Secretary, in accepting them as, on the whole, a genuine expression of the feeling of the country. He should have been ashamed of his country if it had not protested against the atrocities in Turkey. He was astonished at an expression of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich when moving these Resolutions. Nothing should ever be said lightly in that House. Whatever was said by the right hon. Gentleman in that House went forth to the country with enormous weight. He was astonished that the right hon. Gentleman should court popularity by endeavouring to set class against class. The right hon. Gentleman attempted to make out that on this point the West-end of London was an opponent of the Christian cause. He (Mr. Ritchie) denied that there was the slightest foundation for such an assertion. ["Oh!"] He challenged any hon. Member to give even the shade of a proof that such a feeling existed. He maintained, on the contrary, that the West-end of London was a friend of the Christian cause and of every good cause. He (Mr. Ritchie) believed the Bulgarian atrocities, and the misgovernment and the oppression of Turkey, were as much detested by those who sat on his side of the House as they were by hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition benches; but he could not help expressing regret that such strong and vigorous denunciations of those outrages and cruelties as those of the Home Secretary had not been heard more frequently from the Ministerial side of the House. For himself, he had not the slightest sympathy with the Turkish Government, whose Christian and Mohamedan subjects alike had been oppressed to a degree which even yet we failed fully to understand. The Turkish Provinces had in the oppression to which they had been subjected sufficient justification for their insurrection to render any inquiry as to the existence of Russian intrigue unnecessary; but while he and those who sat on the Conservative side of the House entertained the greatest sympathy for the downtrodden subjects of the Porte, and were ready by all peaceful means to endeavour to obtain for them better government, until their increased intelligence and strength enabled them to secure self-government, they protested against the means which it was the unmistakeable object of the Party opposite to adopt—namely, to go into the field side by side with Russia to coerce Turkey. He was aware that Turkey had broken her promises, and he was quite ready to admit that this country was to blame for having allowed those promises to remain so long unfulfilled. We undertook a peculiar responsibility in that matter after the Crimean War; but as for the greater part of the time which had since elapsed hon. Gentlemen opposite had been in power, and they were themselves chiefly answerable for what had happened. But though Turkey's promises in the past had been thus unfulfilled, they need not despair that she would show herself determined—now that the eyes of Europe were upon her—to carry out a different policy in the future, if her request for a little more time and a fair chance were granted her. In 1863, when Russia was remonstrated with on account of her oppression of the Poles, she replied that the restoration of order was the first condition of the establishment of an improved administration. Well, Turkey might say the same thing. With insurrection in her Provinces and an immense foreign army on her frontier, it was impossible for her, however sincerely desirous of doing so, to carry out effectual reforms. Hon. Gentlemen opposite wanted to apply coercion to Turkey by means of European concert, yet there was no evidence to show—but quite the contrary—that France, Germany, Austria, and Italy, would join in any such action. There was, moreover, the greatest possible danger in joint occupation, as was illustrated by the case of Schleswig-Holstein. Prussia and Austria had together occupied those Duchies, not for their own aggrandizement, but to execute the will of Germany; and what happened? The Duchies were annexed to Prussia; Austria and Prussia quarrelled and went to war with each other; and that transaction, he feared, was the beginning of the enormous amount of bloodshed which had since been witnessed in Europe. In the present case it was extremely probable that a joint occupation of the Turkish Provinces would be followed by similar quarrels between the occupying Powers themselves. There was a revolt in Poland with regard to the misgovernment of Russia, the insurrection was suppressed with the greatest amount of of cruelty, and Treaties were violated and set aside. In 1863 Lord Russell wrote that Russia had duties towards other nations with regard to Poland, and that the condition of things which had for so long existed in Poland was a source of danger not only to Russia, but to the whole of Europe. That was the precise language now used towards Turkey. At that time there was no suspicion of coercion breathed; and Lord Russell declared in the House of Lords that it was very often expedient to make representations to foreign Governments about their affairs without being prepared to push the controversy to the extremity of war. For himself, he did not believe that Russia was sincere in her present efforts on behalf of the Turkish Christians, because, though long before the insurrection broke out her Ambassador possessed a powerful influence at Constantinople, he had never exercised any of it to obtain better government for the Christian subjects of the Porte. Again, in all the recent negotiations, though Russia had affected great moderation, she had accompanied every proposal by a menace which rendered it absolutely impossible for Turkey to assent to it. The Berlin Memorandum was accompanied by a virtual threat of foreign occupation. Then there was the armistice. After Turkey had agreed to it, Russia thought fit to send an ultimatum. Was that anything like making peaceful advances? Again, when the Conference seemed about to lead to a peaceful settlement, what did Russia do? She mobilized the whole of her Army. Lastly, the Protocol was brought out as an instrument of peace; but lest it should do any good it was accompanied by an insolent Memorandum from Russia which rendered it impossible for Turkey to give way. Such proceedings would have been exasperating to any people; with the fanatical population of Turkey their effect was to render any peaceful arrangement out of the question. He believed Russia never meant peace from first to last. How strange it was to hear her spoken of as the Apostle of toleration! He would not speak of Poland or Turkestan; but certainly our experience of Russia was not calculated to recommend her as the friend of oppressed nationalities, or the advocate of religious freedom. He remembered reading an account of an open-air meeting of students in St. Petersburg, demanding from Russia a Constitution similar to that which Turkey had given to her people. Eighteen persons were looking on and clapping their hands—14 men and four women—and Russia sentenced these 18 persons to a punishment varying from two years' imprisonment to 15 years in Siberia. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had spoken of the millions of Greeks in Turkey. Now, he had come a good deal into contact with Greeks in Turkey, and, bad as the Government in Turkey was, and bad as the despotism of Turkey was, they would ten thousand times rather come under the yoke of Turkey than under the yoke of Russia. A Greek had said to him—"The yoke of Turkey is made of wood, but the yoke of Russia is made of iron." He trusted we should never spend another penny or shed another drop of blood in support of Turkey; but there were interests which we were bound to maintain. He hoped these interests would not be attacked; but, if they were, we must be prepared at whatever cost to defend them. In that respect he believed Her Majesty's Government were acting in accordance with the views of the vast majority of the people of this country. For his own part, however, he had no fear of Russia invading India by the valley of the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf, and he thought that before she did, we should be able to give a pretty good account of her. He did not apprehend that our interests were threatened by any approach of Russia in that quarter. With regard to the Resolutions, he could not consider the first as separate from the others. He must take them together, and, inviting us to go to war for the purpose of coercing Turkey as they did, he should certainly vote against the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff).

MR. JACOB BRIGHT said, he rose to support views which had received very little support during the course of this debate. Those who had listened to the debate from the beginning would admit that there was something like a restless feeling in favour of intervention in the Eastern Question on both sides of the House. The Resolutions before the House were an indication that many Members of the Opposition were in favour of acting against Turkey, and the speeches that had been made on the other side of the House gave evidence that there were many Members who, in certain circumstances, would not object to act against Russia. In the midst of all this conflict of opinion he adhered to the view which he had long held in regard to foreign affairs. He was in favour of the rule of non-intervention in the disputes and wars of other countries. He did not see why they should hold such views generally, and then when a critical case arose, in which its application was of special importance and of great advantage to the country, that the principle should be dropped. He listened with pleasure and received instruction from the speech of the hon. Member for the Orkney Islands (Mr. Laing). There was one thing he was struck with in the course of his remarks. He told the House that he was not a sentimental politician, and that though he had had his sympathies during the progress of wars and territorial changes that had occurred during his life, he had been in favour of non-intervention. But he added that in this particular case he was in favour of intervention. He was sorry to hear that statement from the hon. Member, because he hoped that on that question his views coincided with his own. He did not mean to say that he would lay down the principle of non-intervention as an inflexible rule, from which under no conditions a country should deviate. He would have each case viewed by its own conditions. If it so happened that there had been a people separated from England only by a border line, who had suffered untold wrongs from generation to generation, and that this country had the power to intervene and offer protection, he, for one, would have been in favour of intervention. But the case before the House was wholly different. They were asked to intervene on behalf of a country which was thousands of miles away, near which we had no possessions, and which was not on the path to any of our possessions, which with its mixed populations, each with its own separate aim, offered the most difficult problem that ever confronted a statesman or conqueror. Again, Turkey had powerful neighbours in Russia and Austria, both ruling over a race kindred to its own oppressed subjects. Germany, from its geographical position, could with a small effort exercise great influence in Turkey. Italy was a neighbour. France being a Mediterranean country was much nearer than ourselves. We were at the opposite end of the Continent. He maintained, therefore, that if a man who had held the doctrine of non-intervention all his life could abandon it in this instance, he might abandon it altogether. There was great sympathy not long ago in this country for Italy. When she was struggling for freedom, the right hon. Member for Greenwich took the same honourable course in regard to Italy as he had taken in regard to Turkey. He proclaimed her wrongs to the world, and employed his great influence to improve the condition of the country; but he did not recommend that England should go to war. He believed no responsible statesman in this country recommended that. We left Italy to herself and to the neighbouring nations, and no Member of the House would regret that they took such a course, or believed that the result would have been better if England had intervened. He could vote for the first two Resolutions in their amended form. Nothing would have induced him to vote for the last two. He dissented from them not on mere verbal grounds, but because, as a whole, they were a distinct proclamation of the doctrine of intervention. They assumed that it was wise and advantageous to enter upon a difficult and perilous enterprise in order to settle the affairs of another country. They were asked, as he understood it, to interfere with Turkey on two grounds—to protect our own interests and to protect the injured subjects of the Porte. But what were our interests in Turkey? No two men ever defined them alike. The excited men who sought to drive the Government into war said that changes in Turkey might interfere with the security of India; but the speech of the hon. Member for Orkney showed that the connection between India and Turkey was a political nightmare. We had, no doubt, interests in Turkey, as we had in every accessible spot on the world's surface; but we had no interests to justify a war. Then, with regard to the subjects of the Porte, as our presence had been a source of incalculable mischief to them the best service we could render them in the future was to cease to interfere. We had been acquiring during the last 20 years a habit of non-intervention. Wars of great magnitude and significance had occurred during those 20 years, and we had abstained from any kind of intervention, and would anyone say that it not been of great benefit to the country that we had so abstained? If we had intervened we should have extended both the area and the duration of war. Many hon. Members, he knew, looked with disdain upon the views he was expressing. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) spoke a short time ago with something like contempt of those who preached the doctrine of non-intervention in foreign affairs. He said that all which those who supported the doctrine cared for was the increase of exports and imports. Well, but exports and imports were of importance to a great part of the population of the country whose means of subsistence were more precarious than those of the hon. Member for Hackney, and exports and imports should, therefore, never be spoken of with contempt in the British House of Commons. The truth was that the people who preached non-intervention did not do so out of regard solely for the material interests of the country, but also, and mainly, for its moral and intellectual interests. They knew what was the condition of the people of this country at the beginning of the century, when we were plunged in constant war; how they were then ground down and neglected. The degradation and brutality which were still too often found in our population, had their origin in the intervention policy of past years. He believed there was nothing in history which would afford such a warning against interference with the affairs of other countries as the case of Turkey. They had made gigantic sacrifices in Turkey, and the result had been a gigantic failure. Forty thousand of our countrymen who had died or been killed in the very prime of their manhood, were now lying in Turkish graves. We had spent in war £100,000,000, or, in other words, we had sunk £5,000,000 a-year forever—a sum nearly equal to our whole annual exports to Turkey. Later, influenced by those great authorities referred to with so much satisfaction by the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane), we had lent the Sultan some scores of millions on his personal security. Our ablest diplomatists had been stationed at Constantinople, the country had been watched by our Consuls, and these gentlemen had furnished us with a mass of Blue Books, from which only one conclusion could be drawn. All these efforts, all these sacrifices had been useless; and yet on this very night in this House men on both sides were planning fresh schemes of intervention. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) was the only Member who had up to the present time adopted the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and showed what they meant. It would be recollected that at the beginning of the Franco-German War seven men went heroically into the Lobby to vote against the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, then at the head of the Government, because he purposed to go to some small expense on behalf of a meritorious little country like Belgium, close to our own shores; but now some of these hon. Gentlemen were ready to adopt the scheme of the hon. Member for Liskeard—a scheme of intervention so great and complicated, that nothing short of Providence could deal with it. We had failed in the affairs of Turkey, and had retired, acknowledging our impotence. Russia had taken our place. She understood the patient better than we did, and would undertake a course of treatment likely to be far more successful. He (Mr. Bright) was not in favour of war; but there were difficulties in the world so deep and tangled that nothing but war could solve them. He believed that nothing but war could solve this difficulty; and, seeing that war had begun, he hoped that it would not end until it had done much to limit the Ottoman Power. On the other side of the House the nerves of hon. Members seemed to be disturbed by the idea of Russia conquering Turkey, but that fear was illusory. Russia had prudence. Besides, even if she had not, the Powers in the neighbourhood had interests there, and would, in defending their own interests, defend also those of Europe. Nothing certainly could be worse in that part of Europe than what had been. Any change must be for the better. No doubt we had important interests in Egypt, and we could not allow the British Empire to be cut in two by a foreign occupation of that country, but there no one was likely to interfere with us. As to Constantinople and the Bosphorus, it appeared to him that if the Government would keep strictly to the view expressed by the Home Secretary, we should have little fear of war. The Government had tried to keep Europe at peace, and had failed. They must now keep England at peace, and if they succeeded they would receive great support, both in that House and in the country from both political Parties.

MR. FORSYTH said, that he agreed with the first and second Resolutions, and to a great degree with the third and fourth, but he should vote for the Amendment because it spoke of "Resolutions which may embarrass Her Majesty's Government," which he had no wish to do. If, however, the question was Aye or No as to the first two Resolutions, he would vote for them at all hazards, and whatever might be the consequence. He was quite aware of the position in which he stood; he did not expect much sympathy from his own side, and he did not ask it from the other. There was a war party in the country, and he feared in the House, but it was not the Party of the right hon. Member for Greenwich, for in all he had said and written there was not a word in favour of war against Turkey. Had Turkey been told at the Conference that Europe was determined to insist on concessions, Turkey would have yielded, and there would have been no war; but she was told beforehand that no force would be used, and that led to the failure of the Conference. There would have been no war, for it might be as well supposed that the Isle of Wight would resist England, Scotland, and Ireland, as that Turkey would resist the united action of Europe in arms. What was to be dreaded from the first, as Lord Augustus Loftus warned us last September, was the isolated action of any Power, and particularly of Russia. It was undoubtedly true that many hon. Members entertained feelings of bitter antagonism to Russia, which was manifested by cheers when charges were made against her, and was indicated by a Notice of Motion put on the Paper by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Charles Russell), with the object of throwing obloquy on the gallant soldiers against whom he fought in the Crimea. The Notice was for an—

“Address for Copy of the Evidence taken before a Court of Inquiry at Sebastopol in November, 1854, with reference to the butchery by Russians of the English wounded whilst lying helpless on the ground.”

Desperate efforts to drag us into war with Russia were being made by a portion of the Press. There was one journal which used to boast that it was written “by gentlemen for gentlemen,” but from the raving style it had adopted lately, it seemed to be now written by maniacs for fools. Its favourite device was to represent the Ministry as divided into two hostile camps, and it spoke of a “Cabinet of Compromise.” It said lately—

“To the fact that the Cabinet is a divided Cabinet we have not been more dull than Mr. Edward Jenkins, or the bloodthirsty philanthropists of The Spectator, or the priests, women, and foreigners who seem now to have all the writing in The Times.”

It was said of Pericles that he was more Athenian than the Athenians, and some of these writers were more Ministerial than the Ministry. He would read a passage from a leading article in The Daily Telegraph—

“We must treat the matter in a business-like fashion; we must provide against the worst—the only safe course in war—determine that Russia shall not have the Straits, and settle, as speedily as may be, the naval and military plans calculated effectively to secure the execution of our will. These are the resolutions which it becomes England to take; and when peace shall again bless the world, we shall have ample time to think and talk about reforms in the name of justice and humanity.”

If this did not look like war he did not know the meaning of the English language. The excuse for this was what was called a regard for “British interests;” but the writers displayed ignorance of, or indifference to, geography and the opinions of competent soldiers, statesmen, and writers. In addition to the authority of the Duke of Wellington and Lord Hardinge, which had been already quoted, he would cite the opinion of Lord Palmerston, then whom there was no man more jealous of Russian aggression, or more careful of the interests of England. Lord Palmerston said—

“Both Lord Hardinge and the Duke of Wellington seem to agree in thinking that the Russians cannot conquer India, and in this opinion they are clearly right.”

Between Asia Minor and India lay the deserts of Mesopotamia, the kingdom of Persia, and the mountains and defiles of Afghanistan. And there would be the British Navy in the Persian Gulf and the British Army in the Punjab. Mackenzie’s work on Russia showed that the intention of transferring the capital from the Neva to the Golden Horn was not seriously entertained by Russian statesmen; and, if the idea were entertained, those statesmen were not such fools as to encounter the resistance that would be provoked by the attempt to carry it out. If Russia were victorious she would probably retain Batoum, Kars, and Erzeroum, and rectify her Bessarabian frontier, but this would not threaten India. The Emperor had solemnly declared at Livadia that he had no intention of acquiring Constantinople, and that, if compelled to occupy Bulgaria, he would only do so provisionally. Could they, as English Gentlemen, believe that the Emperor of Russia would, in the face of all Europe, tell a deliberate lie? His right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had said the other night—“Let us see if the Emperor keeps his word!” [Loud Ministerial cheers.] He hoped he did not misinterpret those cheers. Did they mean that the Emperor did not intend to keep his word? [Cheers.] It certainly looked very like it. He, for one, would not accept that interpretation, and the conduct of Russia in 1829 was a precedent, for then she loyally kept her word. She had promised when she declared war that she would make no territorial acquisition. She conquered Moldavia, Wallachia, and Bulgaria, and at Adrianople had Turkey at her feet. But she gave back everything, and did not keep a foot of territory. Much had been said with reference to the agitation which had taken place in the Autumn; but what was the statement made the other evening by that eminently Conservative Nobleman the Duke of Rutland with regard to this subject? He said, instead of blaming the head of the late Government for the part he had taken in what was called the Autumn Crusade, they ought to thank him for being the means of showing what was the real feeling of the country. The Home Secretary, also, in alluding to the meetings which then took place, said he should have been ashamed if they had not taken place. Had they, or had they not, changed their opinions on that subject? If they had changed their opinions, it was owing to these meetings. Why had he been almost hooted down by hon. Members on that side of the House some two months ago for having expressed an opinion similar to that of the Home Secretary? He rejoiced that those meetings had been held. They were a generous outburst of public opinion, and he was quite certain they had done a great deal of good both in this country and in Europe. He owed no political allegiance to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. [Here there was some interruption, and the hon. and learned Gentleman turned round and made a remark to the hon. Member who sat behind him.]

MR. GREENE: Sir, I must ask if the hon. and learned Member is in Order in addressing me?

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. and learned Member that it is one of our Rules that every Member should address the Chair.

MR. FORSYTH said, he had been pained by the way in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had been attacked. It had been said that he had been actuated in his efforts by a low desire to regain place and power; but he did not believe there was a man in the country who in his soul and conscience believed that to be true. The right hon. Gentleman would live in history when the vast majority of those who sat in that House would be utterly forgotten. Although he differed from him in many respects, and did not agree with him in all things, even on this question, he was glad of that occasion to do full justice publicly to the purity of his motives and the loftiness of his aims.

MR. LEVESON GOWER said, he should not follow the example of the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) who, after approving of the Resolutions, had announced his intention to vote against them. He expressed the satisfaction with which he had heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary the other night. He did not agree with him entirely; but there were some portions of his address which he considered eminently satisfactory; and what pleased him most was the assurance he gave that the whole of his Colleagues entirely agreed with his sentiments. It was refreshing to hear from the benches opposite these manly denunciations of the atrocities of Turkey, and that full justice was at length done to those who had taken part in the autumnal meetings. He thanked his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich for bringing forward these Resolutions, and believed that they had elicited an expression of opinion from the country which was extremely serviceable. They had been told that the meetings had been got up by telegraph; if so, why had not hon. Members opposite also got up meetings in the same way to support their own particular views? Some hon. Members appeared to rejoice a few evenings ago at the prospect of a split amongst the Liberal Party on this subject, and the Members of the Government had certainly done their best to promote that split by consenting to the undignified course of meeting the Resolutions of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich with "the Previous Question;" but he was very glad that the split which was apprehended had not taken place. He had had no difficulty, such as some hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House appeared to have, in supporting the Resolutions, which, he thought, did credit to their proposer. Since the war had actually broken out he had experienced great anxiety on this subject. Whenever he met a Conservative friend he was always told that England must go to war against Russia. ["Oh!"] He hardly knew an exception to what he now stated. Whenever, also, he took up a newspaper he read that it was the duty of this country to take up arms against the power ruled by the Czar. In short, in every possible way there was a wicked attempt made to excite the animosity of the people of England against Russia; and, that being so, there could be no doubt that there was some anxiety in our present position. It was with great satisfaction, therefore, that he heard the speech of the Home Secretary the other night; but the view of the case presented then for the first time by the right hon. Gentleman differed widely from what the House had previously heard from the bench opposite. For himself, he was not afraid of

Russia; but he thought that the hatred which it was endeavoured to excite against her was quite unjustifiable. There might be inconsistency in the conduct of Russia, but there were many other cases of inconsistency. For example, when the civil war was raging in America, there were many who sympathized with the South, and yet it would be most unfair to say that they were in favour of slavery. Therefore, it was most unfair to say that the feeling of the Russian people for those of their own race and religion was not genuine. It had been alleged over and over again—and he was sorry that the statement had been supported by Lord Derby—that it had all along been the intention of Russia, notwithstanding the negotiations in which she had engaged, to enter into hostilities. He had never, however, either heard or seen any proof in support of that assertion. It might be so; there might be ambition at work; but until distinct proof were brought forward he did not think that any hon. Member had a right to make such an allegation. And as to annexations, we ought to apply the same rule to Russia as to ourselves. What was our justification for the annexation of the Transvaal Republic? We were told that it was forced upon us, because that State was delivered over to anarchy, was rent by faction, was bankrupt, and because President Burgers had lost all influence over the Boers and was unable to effect the reforms he acknowledged to be necessary. The Russians might allege the same plea in justification of themselves. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), which practically asked the House to place confidence in the Government, he should have been glad if, for himself, he had been able to do so. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh; but he meant what he said. He was not actuated in this matter by Party motives. It would have been a source of satisfaction to him had he felt that there was a Minister at the Foreign Office upon whom implicit reliance could be placed. There was a time when he entertained a high opinion of Lord Derby's caution; but the noble Lord's proceedings in connection with this Eastern Question had entirely destroyed that confidence. He could not have confidence in a Foreign Minister who allowed this country for a month to believe that the British Fleet had been despatched to Besika Bay as a demonstration against Russia; who said what was tantamount to this—that he would not be guided by his own convictions, but by the opinion of the people whom he called his masters; who made the imprudent declaration with regard to the finances of Russia that they were so low that we need be under no apprehension of her going to war, and who had replied to the Russian Circular by writing a despatch, which was in direct contradiction to the policy pursued by our Representative at the Conference at Constantinople. For these reasons he could not support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Christchurch.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, however wide has been the difference of opinion in this debate, and the speeches of the hon. Members for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) and Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) have shown that difference; however much I may differ from the conclusions which have been arrived at by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, as to the course which, in his opinion, ought to be followed by the Government in the present emergency, there is one point upon which all of us, whatever side of the House we sit upon, will agree—namely, that it is impossible to have listened to the speech of my right hon. Friend at the opening of the debate without being deeply impressed with the sincerity of his convictions and the earnestness of his appeal. My hon. Friend who has just resumed his seat and the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) have referred to the meetings which have taken place in different parts of the country, and referred to them with some approval. I may therefore also take the liberty of expressing my opinion with regard to that agitation, and I am bound to say that I greatly regret the course which was taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. I think the agitation which, though it is unsuccessful, he has been the cause of creating in this country has been most mischievous. I think it has been most ungenerous on his part. I was in this House before the Crimean War, and I had a seat before the Franco-German War, and I well recollect what took place on both of those occasions. I recollect the forbearance of the Opposition, the kindness, the sympathy, even the anxiety of the Opposition to assist the Government. The same thing occurred before the Franco-German War. I sat upon these benches night after night in opposition to the Government of that day—the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich—and I recollect the appeals, private as well as public, made to many hon. Members imploring them not to excite the public mind by raising discussions respecting Belgium and Luxembourg. My late lamented right hon. Friend and Colleague, the late Sir Henry Bulwer, was in despair. He had a speech prepared for many days; but private communications were made to him imploring him not to incommode the Government, and I, who had more experience in the House probably than he, ventured to assure him that sooner or later, if he abstained, virtue would meet with its reward. I think that this agitation has been most unbecoming, and that at this critical time particularly it would have been better to have abstained from putting on the Paper these Resolutions. For what has been the effect of them? They have excited the public mind to a very considerable extent; and when we came down here to listen to them, and to oppose or support them, as the case might be, they were found, in the unanimous opinion of this House, to be so offensive that they were withdrawn. I am not overstating the case, they were found offensive and were withdrawn—and the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), whomadeanexcellent speech the other evening, said what was perfectly true, that, although two of the Resolutions had been withdrawn, two-thirds of the right hon. Gentleman's speech were directly in support of those Resolutions. Now, Sir, I come to my expression of regret that the right hon. Gentleman should have taken this course. I do not regret it on account of the Government. And why? Because if ever there was a Government who was prepared loyally to meet every question, to meet every representation, to give every explanation as to their policy and politics, it was the present Government. They have almost on every occasion courted inquiry. They were not like some Governments I have known during the last 25 years, shy in giving their opinions as to the state of affairs; but they have, in my opinion, loyally pursued a straightforward, above-board policy, having nothing to conceal, and have always been ready to give this House and the country all the information in their power. Therefore, it is not on account of the Government that I entertain any regret, neither is it on account of the Opposition. I certainly did feel a pang when I looked at the Opposition benches and saw the hungry wolves rushing into the fold and scattering the sheep without a shepherd. It is not, therefore, on the part of the Government or the Opposition that I regret the course pursued, but on account of the right hon. Gentleman himself. With the splendid position he occupied in the country, the patriotism which I really believe—which I know—animates his breast, I should have hoped that at a very critical and dangerous time like the present, sinking all considerations of Party, he would have given his powerful support to the councils of the country, irrespective of any Government. Instead of doing that, so far as I can learn, all that he has done—if the papers that generally support the Opposition are to be believed, and even The Daily Telegraph—all that he has done has been to divide his Party and to enter into closer communication with the Liberation Society. The hon. Member who spoke last said that these meetings have been very successful. No doubt; and the right hon. Gentleman says—"There have been 100 meetings in support of my policy, and the agitation is real and just." But what did they meet upon? Why, they met in favour of the four Resolutions. Therefore we must recollect that these meetings—unwisely got up—have all had before them a false issue. If he had stuck to the four Resolutions he might have alleged that he had the country at his back; but having withdrawn them he will find that his well-meant endeavour has missed fire. The result reminds me of two lines of a poet who formerly had a seat in this House, and who was a Member of the Government of the day—Mr. Croker—who, speaking of the position of the opposite Party of the time, said—

"But while they prepared to defeat all their foes,
Within their own camp civil discord arose;"

Sir Robert Peel

and what was said in 1815 may be said of the Opposition now—

“That while they prepared the defeat of their foes, Within their own camp civil discord arose.”

I come now to the question what the Resolution means in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, because there is a vast difference of opinion about it. He says that these Resolutions would include an alteration in the policy of Her Majesty's Government and that their position is ambiguous. No doubt a change of policy would be involved if the four Resolutions had been adopted, because they breathe war in every line, whilst the Government intend strict neutrality, and the country supports them in that policy. But the right hon. Gentleman means war and coercion. I recollect the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck); he spoke of a war of humanity, and said that the conclusion was that the Ministry should go to war, an opinion stated on the other side of the House as well as on this side. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) really treated the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield most unkindly, and was almost too severe upon him although he was a lawyer. He said that two lawyers had addressed the House, and had treated it like a common jury. Well, I hope he will not have to appear before a common jury for some time to come. How difficult it must be to understand what the Resolutions mean! One party says they mean war; another party says they mean peace; and another important section of the House says they mean nothing at all; and, so far as I can see, except that they are an accusation, against the Government, they really mean nothing at all. The right hon. Gentleman said the policy of the Government is ambiguous. [“Hear, hear!”] “Hear, hear!” is said on the other side; but are we in total ignorance of what foreign countries think of this ambiguity? Now, with the exception of Russia, who has broken away from the rest, France, Germany, Austria, and Italy, have a complete understanding with the British Government; and, moreover, they have expressed nothing about ambiguity in their policy, and are determined to support it. The Italian Minister stated distinctly that he was prepared to follow a policy of strict neutrality, and that until Italian interests were affected they would not interfere. In the German Chamber very much the same thing was said by one of the Ministers. Is there any ambiguity in the policy of Her Majesty's Government, when, with the exception of Russia, all the Great Powers of Europe agree with the policy of England? I can see no ambiguity in it. The only doubt which has been expressed against the policy of any Power had reference to Germany, and it was expressed the other day by an ex-Cabinet Minister, who, I think, ought to have known better, and who, but for the benevolent laws of this country, might have had to air his politics in a totally different atmosphere. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) addressed a meeting the other day in the City of London, when he spoke of the policy of Germany as “cynical.” Anything more unfair could not have been said, particularly by an ex-Cabinet Minister, who may, perhaps, by some accident occupy the same position again, though I hope he will not until he reforms his manners. The right hon. Gentleman made use of that expression, and endeavoured to throw a slur on the policy of Germany, which Power had in this matter proved to be England's best ally. Then there is another ex-Cabinet Minister, who has no ambiguity at all on the policy of Her Majesty's Government. I allude to the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports (Earl Granville), who on Monday last addressed a religious meeting. I think opulent sinecurists always appear to the best advantage at religious meetings. Well, the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, speaking at a meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, alluded to what he calls the Greenwich Resolutions. After having spoken lightly on different subjects, his Lordship brought out of his arsenal that fine old English gentleman “Civil and Religious Liberty.” He told the meeting that although they might be in great minorities they must vote for the Greenwich Resolutions and “Civil and Religious Liberty.” I should have thought he would have avoided the use of that hackneyed phrase, because whatever the Resolutions may mean there can be no difference of opinion in this House as to the meaning of the words

civil and religious liberty. The idea of Russia and civil and religious liberty! Russia, a civilizing Power! Russia, whose only interest it is to take care of the Christian Provinces of Turkey! It is urged that we must say nothing about Russia's past, but must confine our remarks to the present. I will say in the British House of Commons what I believe to be the truth about Russia's past and Russia's civil and religious liberty. I should like to learn from the Government whether there does not exist in the archives of the Foreign Office any record sent by our Ambassador at St. Petersburg of the number of persons—male, female, and children—who for no other offence than attachment to the Catholic faith have been sent, without justice and without trial, in chains and misery to the wilds of Siberia? And that is the Power we ought to associate with! Only the other day I was talking to a noble Pole, one who has suffered in his family from love of country, who told me that even now, since the commencement of this war, he knew through his family of cases where poor unhappy people were, solely on account of their religious faith, being sent to chains and misery in Siberia. Is that a Power with which after the Crimean War England should unite and fight against Turkey? No, I say; stand to your strict neutrality, and the country will support you. I am indignant to think, after all we have done in the Crimea, after all the losses we have sustained, and a war expenditure representing more than £5,000,000 a-year sacrificed in that struggle—perhaps wrongly—while the same generation is alive, that any one should suggest that England could unite with Russia in another war in the East. I will not tolerate such a thought, for I should conceive it to be the height of folly on the part of this country to attempt in any degree to unite with that Power, considering its doctrines, its policy, and its past. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) said that going to war involved no risk of danger, and he said to the Government—"You are keeping back the other Powers. They are ready to go forward." That, however, is a statement without a shadow of foundation as far as appears from the documents which have been presented to Parliament. We have kept back no foreign Power, and they have all said that they will act on the strictest principles of neutrality as long as their own interests were unaffected. Having alluded to that subject, I wish to come back to another. This discussion has extended over a wide field, and I wish to bring back the attention of the House to two speeches which were delivered from the bench opposite. One is the speech of the right hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), and the other is the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe). I have a great affection for the latter right hon. Gentleman. My right hon. Friend said—"I have always held opinions identical with the spirit of the Resolutions. In my view our duty was not to interfere with Turkey in any way. Why, that is precisely the policy of the Government, which intends to maintain a strict neutrality. Then he proceeded to make a most violent attack upon the Government. In fact, his catalogue of epithets exceeds anything to be found in either of his two favourite authors—one or the other of which is quoted in every speech of his—Sydney Smith and Martin Tupper. My right hon. Friend's indictment was most severe; and I must admit honestly I thought the right hon. Gentleman was not quite as happy as I have seen him. I fancied I noticed an air of sadness about him; and I think that air of sadness come over him because it had not fallen to his lot, as it had on many occasions, but to the lot of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich to divide the Liberal Party. Well, I was struck with the words which my right hon. Friend used against the Government. The House was not so full at that time as now, and therefore I will repeat some of them. They are—"Lamentable failure," "universal failure," "duplicity," "want of ability and care in negotiation," "carelessness and recklessness," "series of blunders and mistakes," "faults of temper and of judgment," "swagger and bravado." The Times spoke the other day of "crazy appeals to ignorance and passion," and I must say I think it was unfair for my right hon. Friend to apply to Her Majesty's Government the epithets I have just cited. My right hon. Friend is clever generally; but he is unfair. He said that Lord Beaconsfield's policy was systematic friendliness to Turkey and persistent hostility to Russia, and that that policy is in direct contradiction to the policy of Lord Derby. I have read Lord Beaconsfield's speech at the Guildhall, and I find it to be a most temperate one. His Lordship said—

"We have believed that that peace would be best maintained by an observance of the Treaties in which all the Great Powers of Europe have joined. Those Treaties are not antique and dusty obsolete documents. In this very capital the Treaty of Paris was revised. It was revised and re-enacted under circumstances which made that re-enactment most solemn, and that Treaty lays it down as the best security for the peace of Europe that we should maintain the independence and territorial integrity of the Turkish Empire. That, then, has been our first object during the past year."

That is, in fairness, the quotation from the Guildhall speech, and the essential words contained in it were taken out of the revised Treaty of 1871, which was made by the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman who represents the University of London was a Member. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that the policy thus indicated is in direct contradiction to the policy of Lord Derby; but I contend that Lord Derby has said precisely the same thing when, in signing the Protocol, he stated that he did so solely in the interests of European peace. But the right hon. Gentleman went further, and, following the example of the right hon. Member for Pontefract, raked up the Bulgarian atrocities. The latter right hon. Gentleman said, as the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Stirlingshire (Admiral Sir William Edmonstone) will recollect—I allude to him because he cried "No" at the time—the right hon. Gentleman said he watched the expression on the countenance of those who sat on the Ministerial side of the House when the Secretary of State for the Home Department was expressing his abhorrence of those atrocities, and that they exhibited no signs of approval. What possible right had the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract in the present critical state of affairs—how worse than cruel—to speak in that way? I hold in my hand extracts from speeches made by Lord Derby on the 11th of September, 1876, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 27th of the same month, and by Lord Carnarvon on the 3rd of October, and they one and all express themselves in the strongest terms in condemnation of the atrocities in Bulgaria. Lord Derby, in his despatch to Sir Henry Elliot, dated the 21st of September, says—

"No political considerations would justify the toleration of such acts; and one of the foremost conditions for the settlement of the questions now pending must be that ample reparation shall be afforded to the sufferers, and their future security guaranteed. . . . Your Excellency will, in the name of the Queen and Her Majesty's Government, call for reparation and justice. . . . Your Excellency will likewise urge that striking examples should be made on the spot of those who have connived at or taken part in the atrocities."—[Turkey No. 1 (1877), p. 238.]

For my own part, I entirely concur with the hon. Gentleman below me (Mr. Forsyth) that it is far better the House should not entertain these Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, which may embarrass the action of the Government in the interests of peace, than that they should accept the opinion of others among us who appear to be in favour of war. The great object of the Resolutions was to divide the Government and the Party, and, that having failed, there has been an attempt to induce the Government to give some sort of pledge as to their future policy. They have, I am happy to say, failed to divide the Government, who, I hope, will not budge one inch beyond that strict neutrality to which they stand pledged. If they do not, I am sure they will be supported by the country. The interests of the nation are far too grave to admit of their making vague declarations of policy which the events of to-morrow may render nugatory. All that they have to do is to stand by their policy of strict neutrality, and not to interfere so long as British interests are not interfered with; and where is there an Englishman who would say that they ought not to interfere if those interests were imperilled? I believe they would be imperilled if a semi-barbarous Power like Russia were to be allowed to obtain a post on the banks of the Bosphorus. Such a thing may not be likely to happen to-day, or to-morrow, or next year; but if once there they would become a source of peril to this country if the unaided forces of Turkey were unable to battle with Muscovite aggression. What we should do, then, I maintain, is to be on our guard. We have to look to ourselves and to British interests; to England's past fame and her future position; to the maintenance of the prestige of our power, which would be greatly affected if the hordes of Russia were permitted to advance on the high road that leads to Constantinople. It is very easy to drift into war; but we expect better things from the present Government. It is very easy to drift into war; but if war should come, we shall, I am sure, exhibit all the pristine valour of our race, and our forces by land and sea will emulate the illustrious annals of the past. I look, however, to a better result from the conduct of the Government under the direction of Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Derby. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London has told us that he spoke as an outsider, and that, speaking as an outsider, he condemns what he calls the duplicity of the Government, its recklessness, and its carelessness. I also, speaking as an outsider, without any Party or even political ambition beyond that which every man in this House must have who is anxious to serve his country at any sacrifice if perils should encircle the country, must say that the Government of Lord Beaconsfield and Lord Derby, instead of having rendered themselves open to those attacks—those crazy attacks, or as the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield calls them, those pettifogging attacks—have, in my opinion, entitled themselves to the thanks of this House, and will secure to themselves, I feel sure, the gratitude of the country. "Carelessness," "recklessness," "duplicity," "swagger," "bravado"—were ignoble words to apply to any Government, and which certainly ought not to be the language applied to a Government which is the foremost in the world in a crisis like the present. It is not by the use of such epithets, but by the wisdom, judgment, discretion, and forbearance of the Government that this country has been placed on a higher pedestal in the eyes of the world than it has occupied for many years. Continue that policy; the voice of Parliament will be with you, and the sentiment of the country will sustain you. For what is that policy? It is a policy based upon principles which have made the nations of Europe say of us that which was once said of the most illustrious people of ancient times, when, leaving the Land of Egypt to take possession of the Promised Land, they extorted even from their enemies that more splendid eulogy than any that stands recorded in the classic annals of Greece and Rome—when those enemies exclaimed even in the bitterness of their souls—"Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people."

MR. W. E. FORSTER: There is one remark of the right hon. Baronet with which I entirely agree. It is easy, as he says, to drift into war; and I am glad to believe that, whatever else may be the result of this long debate, it will not be so easy for the Government to drift into war at the end of this week as it was before. I greatly enjoyed the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. It came as a most refreshing interlude in our debate; but it placed me in this difficulty, that as it was my hard fate to reply to it, I was looking out for something to reply to, but could find nothing. With all the right hon. Gentleman's eloquence and amusing illustrations, he did not make one remark about the actual question before us. He said the Gentlemen on this side are hungry wolves without a shepherd. We may be hungry, and we may be wolves, but in that case it is not likely we should want a shepherd.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. What I said was that hungry wolves had broken into the fold and scattered the sheep without a shepherd.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Those who break into the fold are those without it, and those who are without our fold are the Gentlemen on the opposite side. The right hon. Gentleman referred to a speech delivered by the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports at some religious meeting as he termed it—which, however, I suppose was a meeting of the licensed victuallers—and he says that he spoke in favour of civil and religious liberty. But that is not the question before us. That question is whether or not Turkey has a claim on England for moral and material support. He said that there are three classes of opinion with regard to the Resolutions—that some think that they mean something—[An hon. MEMBER: "War!"]—others that they mean little, and others that they mean nothing at all. The right hon. Gentleman must believe that they mean nothing at all, for he said nothing about them. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) says he did so because the Resolutions might be embarrassing to the Government, but he made no attempt to prove how they could be so in any way. The objections urged against the Resolutions are contradictory in themselves. They are called truisms, and the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Colonel Loyd-Lindsay), when he heard that the House would be asked merely to vote for the first two Resolutions, jumped up and said everybody was agreed to them, and he called upon the Government to support them. Many hon. Gentlemen object that the two Resolutions are incomplete, inasmuch as they imply agreement with the third and fourth Resolutions, which my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) does not intend to put to the House. If they are truisms they cannot be embarrassing or incomplete. But I grant that if they are incomplete, and if it is necessary to their meaning that they should imply concurrence with the third and fourth Resolutions, it would be unadvisable to pass them. Not only so, but it would be cowardly on the part of those who advocate the stronger Resolutions; while it would be dishonest on the part of those who are not prepared to vote for the latter to vote for the first two. I admit that I should be reluctant to vote for the first Resolution if it were to be put by itself. I should be still more reluctant to vote for the second Resolution, without the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan). I do not think the House of Commons ought to censure any foreign Government unless it were prepared to take ulterior steps. There is not, I believe, a man in this House who does not believe that Turkey has behaved badly; but, notwithstanding that fact, I think it would be undignified and uncalled for on the part of the House of Commons to take the exceptional course of censuring a foreign Power, unless we had made up our minds to act upon our resolution; and I admit that it would be with reluctance I should have voted for the second Resolution as it was originally drawn. My right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich originally so worded it that he looked to the possibility of Turkey again being able to have a claim upon England for moral or material support in the war in which she is now engaged. My opinion is that Turkey has brought the war upon herself, and that it is too late for her to look to us for either moral or material support. But, taking the first two Resolutions by themselves, and supposing that the third and fourth had never existed, I ask the House is there any sufficient reason for adopting them? The second Resolution is a result and consequence of the first. Taking, then, the second Resolution, as amended, I ask, has Turkey had at any time a claim upon us for moral or material support, and if she had, has she forfeited that claim? I think she had such a claim. The Crimean War, the Treaty of 1856, and the conduct of the British Government since that time have given her the claim which the protected has upon the protector. Let us suppose that Turkey, instead of doing her worst had for the last 25 years done her best, that the expectations of Lord Palmerston had been fulfilled, and that the promised reforms had been carried out. Can anyone deny that in that case she would in her present danger have a claim upon us for support which we would be bound to admit? Well, has the claim been forfeited? I do not think I need dwell upon that. The conduct of Turkey during the last two years has forfeited it. Lord Derby, at the end of last year, told her that unless there was an immediate cessation of the atrocities and punishment of their perpetrators he could not answer for the consequences of the indignation of England and of Europe. The right hon. Baronet has quoted those words, and I need not refer to the statement of Lord Salisbury at the close of the Conference. Well, then, if there has been that forfeiture, how can it be embarrassing to Her Majesty's Government that the House should affirm their acts, and say, as the Ministry have said over and over again, that this old Ally of ours has forfeited her claim to our moral or material support? I should have said that instead of embarrassing them, such a Resolution would have strengthened their hands. Well, the right hon. Baronet seemed to think that British interests were involved in these Resolutions, and other right hon. and hon. Gentlemen appeared to agree with him.

[Third Night.]

How can those interests be affected by the statement that Turkey has forfeited all claim to our moral or material support? That has nothing whatever to do with any question relating to our interests. If there are general reasons for passing these Resolutions—and I think there are—I confess it appears to me that there is a special reason also. That special reason is the last act of the Government, and the last step they have taken. I am not going to enter into a history of the past. Although I disapprove of much that Lord Derby has done, I am not at all sure that anyone else would have done very much better. His difficulties have been great. Not only is this Eastern Question one of the most difficult with which Europe has had to deal—and we ought to put the most generous construction on the actions of any Minister in such circumstances—but it is not only with the Eastern Question Lord Derby has had to deal; he has had to deal also with Western questions of the gravest importance. I grant that his difficulties have been increased by the necessity, which has arisen, of changing the policy of England. I will not say that previous Governments have not been implicated in the transactions which have caused a change in the policy which did mean support of Turkey; but the fact remains that Lord Derby has been driven into this change by the general feeling of the country. Nor do I think Lord Derby's difficulties have been decreased by the speeches of the Prime Minister; but as the noble Lord is no longer a Member of this House—a fact we all regret—I will not further allude to the speeches which he has made on the question. I wish, however, to state the grounds on which I exceedingly regret the reply of England to Prince Gortchakoff's last despatch. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) that the Government should give us reasons why they, of all the Powers of Europe, felt it necessary to reply to that Circular. The right hon. Baronet said—and that was the one remark in his speech which had any bearing upon the real question—he was perfectly sure that the present policy of the Government has the confidence of the other Powers in Europe, with the exception of Russia. It is very pleasant to have that assurance, and I only wish the right hon.

Mr. W. E. Forster

Baronet had given us grounds for that belief; but it rather shakes his assurance when we find that no other Power has answered that Circular. But, supposing the Government to have thought it necessary to reply to it, why could not the answer have been confined to a mere disavowal of Prince Gortchakoff's statement that war was declared in order to carry out the views of England and the other Powers? Instead of this, the arguments contained in the reply are, to my mind, inconclusive, founded upon false assumptions, and, to some extent, dangerous. There is one statement, indeed, contained in the answer which is contradictory of the Government policy, and it is an expression of belief in the good faith of Turkey. I should suppose from Lord Derby's despatch—and I should like to be informed if the contrary is the fact—that the Government believes in the new Turkish Constitution. But there is also a statement that the Government believe an entry upon Turkish soil by Russian troops will not improve the condition of the Christian population in Turkey. Now, there may be very great evils in the invasion of Turkey by Russia. I have no doubt great misery will follow from that war; but I am surprised that any Minister, knowing the facts, should state that the condition of the Christian population will not eventually be improved by the Russian invasion if it should prove successful. Take Bulgaria, for instance. We may dislike, for many reasons, that Bulgaria should become Russian. I do not, for my part, think there is the slightest danger of that. We may dislike the idea that Bulgaria may become an autonomous State under the protection of Russia; but does anyone who has studied the question doubt that if Bulgaria was taken over from Turkey, and made an autonomous State, the condition of the Bulgarian population would not be changed infinitely for the better? Looking to the theatre of war, I find that the Russian armies are now in Turkish Armenia, and from all I have been able to learn I should say that the inhabitants of Russian Armenia occupy a very much better position, social, moral, and religious, than those in whose country the Russian troops are now operating. Lord Derby, in a despatch to Mr. Jocelyn written last month, reported an interview he had had with ~~the~~ asha, and in that interview he warned the representative of the Sultan that in the event of a war, and the Russian arms being successful, Turkey would not merely lose one or two Provinces, but the Ottoman Empire might cease to exist. Whatever else might follow, there can, I think, be no doubt that such result from Russian success would produce an improvement in the condition of the present Christian subjects of the Porte. There are two other objections which I have to make to the reply of the Foreign Secretary. One is that it is a very strong statement to make that Russia, by the declaration of war, has been guilty of a contravention of the Treaty of Paris. That is a very strong thing, indeed, for our Government to say to the Government of another country which is our Ally. If it be true that Russia, by declaring war, has broken the Treaty of Paris, warning should have been given to her officially and publicly that such would be the effect of her act long ago—at least as early as the close of the Conference. I am not going to enter into the question whether it was or was not wise on our part to tell the Turks that no coercion would be used towards them either by ourselves or by the rest of Europe; but the only screw that was put upon Turkey was to tell her—"If Russia goes to war with you because you don't effect the reforms she demands, we won't support you." Russia and Turkey were both informed that if the latter did not yield it was expected that the former would declare war against her, and Russia has a right to complain that we did not then tell her that by so doing she would be breaking the Treaty of Paris. It might be said that Russia ought to have remembered the Article in that Treaty under which she was bound to require the mediation of the other Powers before going to war. During the Conference it was generally supposed, especially by the newspapers supporting the policy of the Government, that one of the great purposes of the Conference was this mediation, and because it had failed by the action of Turkey it was not to be supposed that it was not to be considered to be the exercise of the right of mediation; but I should like to know whether, if Turkey had asked for mediation under that Article that the British Government, or any other Government, would not have thought it right to grant the request; and if that were so, why come forward and charge Russia with actual breach of that Article? The next passage in the despatch is a complaint against the Emperor of Russia because he has separated himself from the European concert hitherto maintained. I am not here to defend Russia, nor should I have made any remark upon the point but for this despatch; but I ask the House candidly to consider whether Russia is greatly to be blamed for not maintaining this European concert? She would, undoubtedly, be much to blame if that concert was a reality, but not if it was a sham. Well, it was a sham. It became a sham in consequence of the determination of the Conference not being enforced, which gave Russia the right to say that she had no faith in European concert. Then came these very strong words in the reply of the Foreign Secretary—"It is impossible to foresee the consequences," &c. Undoubtedly it is impossible to foresee what may be the consequences of this war; but the noble Lord the Postmaster General must be aware of what is the meaning of diplomatic phraseology; and it is a very serious thing, indeed, when a friendly Power is informed that, having broken a Treaty, it is impossible to foresee the consequences. No wonder that the funds fell on every Stock Exchange in Europe on that reply being made public. No wonder that the newspapers throughout Europe almost all supposed that it meant some danger of war between Russia and England. And I must confess that the fear there is in this country of war would have been greatly increased if that despatch had been left by itself. A good deal has been said with reference to the recent agitation in this country on this question. The feeling which lay behind that agitation has been very much the determination to preserve our neutrality—not, as has been suggested, to drive us into war. There is but a small minority who would go so far as that; but there has been a great fear that we should drift into war, and that we should drift into war on the wrong side on a mistaken notion that our interests were threatened—and that fear would have been greatly increased by this reply if it stood alone. But we have had the advantage in the course of this debate of hearing the declarations of the Home Secretary, which will do much to allay that fear. We must remember what we have read day after day in the newspapers. I am not going to hold the Government responsible for everything that appears in the newspapers which are in the interest of their Party; but I must remind the House that the Government have never contradicted the statements which have appeared in those journals, and I cannot help attaching some weight to the opinions which are constantly being expressed in them that our interests are threatened—not in Egypt, not on the Bosphorus—but on some mountain in Asia Minor or other distant post. There is a fear expressed lest Russia should come down the Euphrates or take possession of some of the head waters of that river, or endanger our interests by getting some possible access to the Persian Gulf. The hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) has exposed the fallacy of those fears; but we do want an official definition of British interests, and I am delighted that we had the definition which was given by the Home Secretary. Then we have heard a good deal about the danger of Russia getting possession of Batoum; but our interests in that quarter have not been defined very clearly. The Home Secretary gave some definition of our interests in connection with the Suez Canal, and said that we could not allow Egypt to be possessed by any Continental Power. With that I agree; but we must recollect that there might be great difficulties in that matter, and that there must be some forbearance shown towards Russia if she is to be considered as having the rights of a belligerent Power. Egypt is nominally a part of Turkey. Egypt is performing her duty as a part of Turkey. There are Egyptian troops in Turkey ready to fight for her against the armies of the Czar. Egypt is therefore at war with Russia, and though I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman that England must protest, and get Europe to protest, against Russia making an attack upon Egypt, I do not suppose for a moment that Her Majesty's Government deny that some forbearance to Russia will be required. The possibility of Russia getting to Constantinople has affected the minds of people in this country as a red rag excites a bull. I was delighted to find the words with which the Home Secretary treated that fear. He said Egypt and the Suez Canal were European interests as well as English; but I think he gave us the impression that they were pre-eminently English. When he came to Constantinople I think he did not give us that impression, and in that I think he was quite right. For my part, I should be sorry to see Constantinople in the hands of Russia. I believe that the Greeks will regain their lost inheritance, and I should be sorry to see religious liberty exposed to the danger which would arise if Russia were master of Constantinople. If I come to British interests, I do not say they are not affected, but they are less affected than the interests of other countries in Europe. Prince Bismarck said recently—"This is not any business of ours; not a single Pomeranian shall lose his life about this question." Why did he say so? Because he hoped that England would do the work for him as she did in the Crimean War for Prussia and Austria. It is, however, a matter of very great interest to Germany—even to powerful Germany, leading Europe as at this moment she does—that she should not be between France and a much more powerful Russia. Depend upon it, Prince Bismarck knows that it is the interest of Germany, and will take care that Russia shall not be at Constantinople. Let us join in the protest, but let us not fear. Russia has no more intention of running the risk and danger of affronting Europe and Germany by getting Constantinople than she has of marching at once to Calcutta. When an endeavour is made to drag us into all the costs and dangers of war, I do not say by the Government, but by some of their supporters—and a war on the wrong side—I am glad the Home Secretary has done his best to dispel that illusion. There is another matter for which I thank the Home Secretary. He made a declaration which has received the assent of almost every Member that has spoken, except, perhaps, my hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), and that is the declaration of absolute neutrality between Russia and Turkey. I sympathize with that view. It is because I have that feeling so strongly that I should not be able to vote for the third and fourth Resolutions of my right hon. Friend (Mr.

Gladstone) if he had intended to move them. I know it is late; but I feel it would hardly be honest for me to sit down without stating distinctly the grounds on which I could not have supported him. I think the fourth Resolution would have been understood by Russia, by Turkey, by Europe, to have been a declaration of opinion by this House that Russia ought to be assisted in this war, and that it would have been in effect a breach of neutrality. Let me say one word as to Resolutions passed by this House. We must not treat them as mere indications of our feelings. They are orders given by the most powerful body in the State to the Ministers of State to carry out a certain policy—in this case on a European question of immense importance. I am quite aware that my right hon. Friend has tried to guard against this result by saying that it would promote a concert of European Powers in exacting these reforms; but in his most eloquent, most argumentative speech he did not tell us his reasons for believing that there was at this time any chance of that concerted action. It seems to me that this Resolution does imply that we ask Europe to assist Russia in exacting reforms in Turkey. I am not prepared now to make that appeal to Europe. Nor am I now prepared while this war is going on to ask the House to affirm the third Resolution, and for this reason—because I am not prepared to attempt to pledge the House to a policy at the close of that war. In regard, for instance, to the Bosnians, I share the desire of my right hon. Friend. I wish that they should have the glories of their ancient rule restored; for they have a history. But we must remember the position of Austria; and I do not want to pledge myself to the proposition that Bosnia is not to become Austrian. Then, again, I do not suppose my right hon. Friend means to imply that we are to pledge ourselves that the power of Greece is not to be re-instated in Constantinople. I may be thought somewhat inconsistent; but I am not now prepared to make this appeal to Europe to assist Russia or to pledge the House as to the conditions at the end of the war. But before the war was declared there was no policy that I should have more earnestly advocated. I wish my right hon. Friend had been able—there were reasons why he could not—to bring forward this Resolution at any time before the war was declared. My noble Friend the Leader of the Opposition here, and the Leader of our Party in the other House, hinted strongly at European coercion at the very opening of the Session, and I wish the same manifestations of support which are now given had been given to us then. I am not sure that we acted wisely in not pressing that policy. But let me say in self-defence that we most reluctantly came to that conclusion. It was no fear of being beaten in this House; no fear of any disgrace or discomfiture to our Party that influenced us. Our sole fear was that we should do harm to the cause we cared about in pledging the House, as we thought we should do, against a policy which we had still some hope that the Government might themselves entertain. I deeply regret that the Government themselves did not carry out the policy of calling upon Europe to put pressure upon Turkey—to keep up its concert for that purpose; with coercion, if necessary, for that end. I differ from my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) and some other Gentlemen in their opinions upon that matter; and I want to state very shortly the grounds on which I should have been in favour of applying European pressure, and, if necessary, coercion. There are two great schools of opinion on the Eastern Question. There are those who still believe in the possible regeneration or reform of Turkey by itself. They still have the hope which Lord Palmerston expressed some 25 years ago—that there was power in the Ottoman Porte to perform the duties of a civilized Government. One great advocate of that doctrine—the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Butler-Johnstone)—is not now in his place. I believe that its adherents are a minority in this House, that they are a still smaller minority in the Cabinet—to judge from the utterances of its Members, and that they are a very small minority, indeed, in the country. Hon. Members generally, and almost all who pay attention to the matter out-of-doors, have, I believe, given up that hope, and have lost faith in the power of Turkey to regenerate herself. But great differences of opinion yet exist as to how the necessary change is to be made.

[Third Night.]

We know that while Turkish misrule lasts the East will not be pacified. I was in favour of using European pressure, and, if necessary, coercion, because that seemed to me the best mode of giving some hope to the oppressed Christians, and the sole means of preventing war and of pacifying the East without war. And why do I say this? Some Gentlemen have stated—what has often been stated before—that Russia got up the Bulgarian atrocities, and I suppose some would add, also Turkish repudiation. Now I am not going into the question of whether Russia has made use of Turkish misrule for her own purposes; but I say that that misrule existed and still exists, and that as long as it does exist the East cannot be pacified. I believe it cannot be terminated except by pressure. There are four kinds of pressure which might have been applied. England might have acted by herself; Russia might act by herself; England might have joined Russia; and, lastly, the European Powers might have acted in concert. Well, I have never been in favour of England acting by herself or of her joining Russia. We owe duties to our own enormous Empire and to Europe, and there would have been great danger to the peace of Europe if we had waged war against Turkey or joined any other Power in doing so. The danger is great now from what Russia has done; but it would have been greater in the case I am supposing. We must not imagine that other nations look at these matters in the same way as the right hon. Gentleman or other hon. Members. They look at them from the point of view of their own interest. The union between Austria and Hungary has hardly yet been confirmed; the wounds inflicted between Germany and France are not yet healed; and it would not have been wise of our Government or of any Government to incur the responsibility of drawing the sword even in so good a cause as that of aiding the oppressed subjects of the Porte, considering the present position of Europe. But had there been European concert the danger would have been minimized. I think that concert has been possible. It was possible at the time of the Andrassy Letter, at the time of the Berlin Memorandum, and especially at the time of the Conference. I deeply regret that Her Majesty's Government did not advocate that policy, because I believe the Porte would have yielded to the pressure of united Europe; but I am quite aware there would have been danger attending it. We could not have made a threat of war without being prepared to carry it into effect; and even though Turkey had yielded, there would have been danger in a partnership with the other Powers in interference in her internal government. I am not surprised the Government felt that danger; but the danger attending this war is still greater, and it would have been better if they had run the risk. Now, however, that war has begun, the circumstances of the case, as it seems to me, are completely altered. My right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich alludes in his Resolutions to the Protocol of 1826. But that is not a parallel case. The European concert for establishing the independence of Greece was arrived at six months before the declaration of war by Russia, and by the time war broke out Mr. Canning was dead. My right hon. Friend proved the sincerity of his opinions by the eloquent appeal with which his speech concluded—an appeal which will be read as long as our Parliamentary history endures, and which thrilled not only this House, but the country at large. But the right hon. Gentleman prefaced that magnificent appeal with some words with which I could not entirely agree. He said there were two mighty controversies—the controversy between Russia and Turkey, and the controversy between Turkey and her revolted subjects, and that, in his opinion, the latter was the deeper and more important. Certainly, the controversy between Turkey and her revolted subjects is that which most excites our sympathies, but to my mind it cannot be deemed the most important. There is no denying that, however mixed the motives may be which have led to it, this war between two great Empires is one of intense importance. It is a war between two races and between two religions; and it is a war which is certain to be waged with intensity and vigour. It is a fearful war. A settlement of the question by means of a concert of the Great Powers might have been possible before war was declared; but it seems to me that under the actual circumstances we are driven into a position of neutrality, and must be content to wait till some opportunity of mediation presents itself. We must stand by and see this war fought out unless we are either prepared to overwhelm Turkey by joining Russia or to call upon Russia to stop, in order that Europe may interfere. Turning to the two Resolutions before us, it seems to me that the Government ought to welcome them. They will, no doubt, be rejected by the House by a considerable majority; but, however great may be the majority by which they may be so rejected, there will be no majority, I am sure, in the country or in the House against their real spirit. I believe that on both sides of the House, deeply as we have been excited about this question, and whatever may have been our prepossessions, there is really a general concurrence of opinion. I believe that an enormous majority in this House and in the country are in favour of absolute neutrality as between Turkey and Russia. I believe we are all of us determined to protect British interests, should those interests be really menaced and imperilled. I believe a large majority of us are also determined that we will not sacrifice the money of our constituents or the blood of our soldiers in waging a war under the influence of mere fanciful fears. I think I am not wrong in claiming the concurrence of the Government and of Members who support them when I say that we do not forget that England has a duty as well as an interest; and that the best and truest way to promote her interest is to perform her duty. It will be the duty of the Government to use the influence of the British Crown as far as possible in the direction of mediation, whenever mediation may seem practicable. If the war comes to an end by a destruction—which is possible—of the Ottoman Government in the disturbed Provinces, it will be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to do their utmost to secure the future well-being of the Christian population. If, as is also possible, peace should soon be made, in consequence of Russia obtaining a success which would enable her to dictate terms, then it will be for England to see that such terms are secured as would lead to that improved government of the Christian subjects of the Porte which we all desire to see, and without which I believe a permanent peace is impossible.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, he hoped that after these debates the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition would resume the Leadership. The noble Lord was wrong in disclaiming compliments from the Ministerial side of the House, for it would be to his personal advantage and to that of the country also that he should possess in some degree the confidence of those who were opposed to him. What the noble Lord said a month ago, that the sword, and the sword only, could clear away this Eastern Question, was equally true now. At the end of last Session there were those who said it was evident Russia was menacing Turkey, and events had justified their predictions of aggression. Three generations of Russian statesmen had been steadily pursuing the determination to seize the Black Sea and the countries that surround it, always under the plea of obtaining redress for the oppressed Christian subjects of the Porte. Fifty years ago the Duke of Wellington in a letter to Lord Aberdeen said it made him sick to hear of the Czar's desire for peace, which he could secure by offering reasonable terms to Turkey; but he was looking to the conquest and plunder of Constantinople. The events of that time were similar to the events of this. In 1854 Nicholas determined upon a great effort to overwhelm Turkey, which was defeated with our aid. After the Crimean War we were represented at Constantinople by an Ambassador of great firmness. Why was it, with Turkey in our hands, and with such a Minister at Constantinople, we did nothing to put the Turkish house in order? If that had been done the things which we had so much lamented might have been prevented. Nothing, however, had been done, and now these difficulties were upon us. It had been said that circumstances now were very different; but to him they seemed to be very similar to what they had been in 1828 and 1854. The present Emperor of Russia was a more peaceful man than Nicholas; but, unfortunately, all the acquisitions of territory had been made under this peaceful Emperor rather than under Nicholas, and all those acquisitions had been made by the sword. A traveller describing his recent visit to Central Asia said that the recent advances of Russia were marked by the gibbet and the sword. All that, it was said, was of no consequence; but he believed the present attack on Turkey would raise a very great feeling of sympathy throughout the country in favour of the Turks. The English Government had encountered great difficulties, and they had endeavoured to do three things—to preserve the peace of Europe, to keep the Russians out of Turkey, and, as far as they could, to improve the condition of the Christian population of Turkey; but in not one of these things had they received any support whatever from the other Great Powers of Europe. The policy of neutrality proclaimed by England was completely understood by the other Powers; but not a finger had been raised by any Power in Europe to give us any assistance in preserving the peace of Europe. Her Majesty's Government had a very difficult task in dealing with Russia. They had been perfectly willing to attribute no evil to a people with whom we were in friendly alliance, and he entirely disagreed with those hon. Members who said that the Government had shown hostility to Russia. On the contrary, the most generous construction had been put upon what had been done by Russia; he would go further and say that Her Majesty's Government had not been always politic in what they had done, because in the exercise of their discretion they had sometimes kept back despatches which, if given to the country, would have raised a strong counter feeling in England to that which had been raised against Turkey. But there were qualities even higher than generosity; they were truth and justice, and they compelled him to declare that the action of Russia towards Turkey had been marked by great duplicity. Was it not set forth in the despatches of Mr. Baring, and was it not perfectly well known that during the whole time the Russian Ambassador was at the Porte he was intriguing, or if not himself those who were closely associated with him were intriguing, to excite insurrection in Bulgaria? The right hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) said he had read the whole of the despatches and could not discover any such intrigues. But had the right hon. Gentleman read the despatches in which it was stated that the Russian Consul at Philippopolis was instrumental in exciting rebellion, and would anyone believe that the Russian Consul in that town was not in close connection with the Russian Ambassador? The Russian Ambassador, who was protected by the laws of hospitality, was all the time he was at Constantinople engaged in raising insurrection, or his Colleagues were. As to the right hon. Gentleman's query, how it happened that the rebellion in Bulgaria had been put down by Bashi-Bazouks? if it were not so late he would bring evidence to prove that it was because the Russian Ambassador had declared that it was so trifling a matter that it was not necessary to use regular troops. When so much blame was thrown on the Turkish authorities, it ought to be remembered that some portion of the blame ought to be borne by those who had influence at the Porte preventing the regular troops from going to put down the atrocities. With reference to the despatch in which Lord Derby dealt with the punishment of the perpetrators of the cruelties in Bulgaria, he could only remark that the rebellion was no doubt a most serious one, and that its success would have been fatal to Turkey. And it was also to be remembered that the offenders acted under the influence of terror and without the knowledge of the authorities. Besides, the Duke of Wellington, in one of his despatches from the Peninsula, said that it was wholly impossible to control troops moving in detachments. If English Generals were unable to control detached troops, we ought to put a charitable construction on the conduct of the Turkish Commanders and to assume that they were not responsible for the atrocities committed in Bulgaria. It would, indeed, be a great stretch of power if the Turkish Government were to punish the men who had saved the Ottoman Empire from a grave calamity and almost certain destruction. He concurred in Mr. Canning's opinion, that England ought to maintain an undeviating neutrality when nothing occurred injurious to her interests and her honour. The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by expressing a hope that the policy adopted by Her Majesty's Government would receive the approbation of both sides of the House, as it was most essential that the country should be united on so important a question.

CAPTAIN NOLAN confessed that when the information of the atrocities in the Turkish Provinces reached this country

his sympathies were strongly against the Turks. But since that time new elements had been introduced into the Eastern Question, and it was no longer a question of merely punishing the perpetrators of those atrocities. An enormous Army had been thrown across the Turkish frontier, and Reports had been published from our Consul at Warsaw regarding the behaviour of Russia to a large class of Catholics residing within her Empire. Under those circumstances, he asked himself where should his sympathies be? He knew that two blacks did not make one white; and, therefore, it might be said because Russia had acted wrongly were they to oppose her? But the true issue was, were they to give Russia increased power to make forcible conversions? Now Russia, if successful, would have the government of the Christians in Turkey. Those Christians were divided into four classes — first, the orthodox Greek Church, which had the Czar for its head; secondly, orthodox Greeks, in communion with the Russian Church, but with a different belief as to the central authority; thirdly, the Uniacks, who, with the same ceremonies as the Greek Church, were in communion with the Roman Catholic Church; and fourthly, Roman Catholics. He found by the Returns moved for by the hon. Member for Carlow, that within a very brief period the Russians had forcibly — by flogging, torture, imprisonment, and exile — converted 1,300,000 Christians to the orthodox Greek Church, which had the Czar for its head; and he feared if she were once established at Constantinople, such conduct might be repeated on an extended scale. He knew not which was the graver trial — for these Christians to endure the occasional outbursts of ferocity from the Turks, or this steady, systematic repression of religious freedom on the part of the Russians. For that reason he could not vote for the Resolutions of the right hon. Member for Greenwich, which in some way would make him responsible for legalizing Russian aggression on religious freedom. One word with regard to British interests. It would be easy to defend the Suez Canal by our Fleet, but he doubted whether any fleet could defend Constantinople. When Admiral Duckworth was there in 1807 he was obliged to retire, because he found his retreat was being cut off by batteries on shore. Any force that controlled the land could always command the sea approaches to Constantinople. He believed that Constantinople would be in very great danger from the Russians before any debate would be renewed in that House. When Russia crossed the Balkans she was only 250 miles in a straight line, or 340 by road, from Constantinople. Ten miles a-day was not a very difficult advance for an army, and so the Russians would be 34 days only from Constantinople, once their army was fairly across the Danube. Now, how long would it take to send an English land Force to Constantinople? It was 14 days' sail from our southern ports, and it would require some time to get the men together and provide vessels for their transport. It might, therefore, at a later epoch become practically useless for us to attempt any defence of Constantinople. It might be said that the Turks would be able to retard the advance of the Russians; but the experience of 1829 showed that after they were beaten in one regular battle the Turks offered no opposition to the advance of Russia. Two enormous changes had been since then made in the situation. The first was that the Russians had really adopted railways, and this would make a great difference in their supplies and commissariat. Railways had brought Russia 700 or 800 miles nearer to Constantinople than she was formerly, while the improvements in scientific warfare being wholly in favour of the scientifically trained officers of Russia, Turkey would go down before her in every battle. He insisted that mere neutrality was not enough. It ought to be an armed neutrality; and if we did not wish to allow Russia to get to Constantinople before us, we would require to station an Army of Observation on some island, or other advantageous position, not far removed from Constantinople, so as to be prepared for immediate action on an emergency.

MR. BOURKE moved that the Debate be adjourned.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped the Debate would be resumed and concluded to-morrow night. The whole week would then have been spent upon it, and that was not at all too much, considering the importance of the subject. The hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) had a Motion of great importance on the Notice Paper, relating to the County Franchise, and as the hon. Member would see that it would be for the general convenience of the House that this debate should be resumed to-morrow, he hoped the hon. Member would waive his right, and allow this debate to be resumed as the First Order of the Day.

MR. TREVELYAN willingly gave way under the circumstances, but trusted that having done so, the Government would give him a day for the discussion of the important question of the County Franchise.

MR. ANDERSON objected to the way in which the conduct of debates was arranged. In great debates like that one, unless hon. Members would stoop to beg the Whips of their Party to procure for them an opportunity, they had no chance of speaking; and the effect of that indecent system had been that in the present debate, in three nights speaking, only two of the Members who intended to support all the Resolutions of the right hon. Member for Greenwich had been able to address the House, and therefore the reports of the debates conveyed to the country a totally erroneous idea of the extent of support the right hon. Gentleman would have received had he moved the whole of his Resolutions. He deprecated any idea of the slightest supposition of anything unfair on the part of the Speaker in making his selections, but so long as lists and suggestions were permitted so long such results as he pointed out would be possible.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE hoped the Government would accede in some way to the appeal of his hon. Friend the Member for the Border Burghs.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the hon. Member for the Border Burghs would, perhaps, avail himself of the opportunity of seeking what advantages he could as a private Member. The Speakers that night had been selected with the greatest impartiality. He trusted it might be possible to finish the debate by to-morrow night, though he was afraid no understanding could be come to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER suggested that the hon. Member for the Border Burghs should endeavour to obtain a day for his Motion in the ordinary way; failing which, although in the present state of Public Business he could not give any direct pledge, the Government would recognize the claim which he would have, both on account of his giving way for the convenience of the House and of the importance of the subject of his Motion. So far as the Government was concerned, they would do all in their power to bring the debate to a close to-morrow night.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

PARLIAMENT—THE WHITSUNTIDE RECESS.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON asked the Lord President, What arrangements the Government proposed to make with respect to the Whitsuntide Recess?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that the Committee on the Burials Bill was fixed for Thursday, the 17th instant, and if the discussion on that stage was concluded at that sitting, he would propose that their Lordships should adjourn for the Recess on that night. If the Committee were continued on the following day, he would move that their Lordships adjourn from the 18th instant till Monday, June 4.

RAILWAY COMPANIES SERVANTS BILL.—(No. 46.)

(The Duke of St. Albans.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that this measure was no attempt at paternal legislation. It only sought to intervene between employer and employed, because, to use the words of the Preamble—

"the length of time during which servants of Railway Companies are sometimes employed is such as to be prejudicial to their health, detrimental to the proper working of railways, and a cause of great danger to the public travelling thereon."

He did not seek to introduce the principle of Parliamentary interference with free contract in adult labour; and in order to carry out this intention he proposed in Committee to exempt plate-layers from the operation of the Bill, and to include only persons engaged in working the traffic; the Bill would thus deal only with that class of railway servants on whose capacity the lives of travellers depended. The Prime Minister found fault with him the other night because he wished to apply the principles of the Factory Acts to adult male labour. The noble Earl ignored the fact that his own Government in 1875 drew a distinction between workmen engaged in ordinary pursuits and those on whose labour the safety of the public depended. The present Government had lost no opportunity in claiming credit for having done so; and he thought he was entitled to ask the noble Earl, or some Member of Her Majesty's Government, to point out in what respect the principle of this Bill differed from that upon which Mr. Cross based a claim for special provisions in his Conspiracy Act of 1875 with respect to persons employed in works affecting the safety of the public. In the present case he would not ground the necessity for this Bill on humanity to the men—though there was much to be said on that head. Labour, he was glad to say, was strong enough to protect its interest; though when they saw in "Jones v The Great Western Railway Company" the widow's cause pitted against a rich Railway Company in four expensive lawsuits for damages for her husband's death, a combination for the prevention of cruelty to railway travellers and railway servants might become necessary. What this Bill sought was to remove the great danger which Captain Tyler stated in his evidence and reported to exist to the travelling public from overworked railway servants, arising from an insufficient staff; and to this cause Captain Tyler attributed no fewer than five accidents in 1875. He would, with their permission, read some extracts from the evidence taken before the Railway Accidents Commission, and he thought they would agree with him that a real evil had to be dealt with. In the minutes of Mr. Jackson's evidence there were these passages—

"17,678 (Sir Seymour Fitzgerald).—Take Monday, the 1st of February. I find that 28 guards were on duty that day, and half of them were on duty for considerably more than 15 hours?—That is possible: that book shows the true working according to the men's own time and figures.

"17,679.—I find two men that were on duty for 15 hours and four minutes, another one for 17 hours 20 minutes, another 21 hours 30 minutes, another man 20 hours, another man 17 hours 10 minutes, two that were on duty for 21 hours 30 minutes, one that was on duty for 16 hours 15 minutes, two that were on duty for 16 hours 40 minutes, one that was on duty for 18 hours 20 minutes, two that were on duty for 20 hours, one that was on duty 21 hours 11 minutes, another for 21 hours, and two that were on duty for 22 hours 10 minutes, and I find that one man who was on duty for 15 hours and 40 minutes on Monday, February the 1st, is out again on February the 2nd, and goes on duty for 18 hours 30 minutes?—Yes, that is possible; may I ask where he runs?

"17,680.—It is a Lockwood train, and he got something like 14 hours' rest in two days out of 48 hours?—Yes, that book is correct.

"17,691 (Sir Seymour Fitzgerald).—On February the 2nd I find that 20 of your guards were on work for more than 15 hours a-day?—If it is in the book, that is so.

"17,692.—And I find that one man was on duty on that day for 13 hours who had been on duty for 21½ hours the day preceding?—May I ask what train that is?

He had received this statement from Mr. John Graham, the London District Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants. He had not been able to verify the fact, though he had ascertained that their source was reliable:—

"The porters and guards on the Metropolitan and District Railways commence work on Sundays at 7 o'clock in the morning, and finish at about 12 o'clock at night; time of duty, 16 and 17 hours. On the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, on the London, Chatham, and Dover, on the North London, and on the London and South-Western Railway, the same thing exists; while on the South-Eastern Railway the hours of duty are with some of the guards as many as 19. The engine-drivers and firemen on the South-Eastern Railway have turns of duty varying from 12 to 20 hours, and these men can be easily seen either at the Charing Cross or Cannon Street Stations. The Chatham and Dover engine-drivers do the same thing, but not so often. The drivers and guards of the 6.30 a.m. goods train, Redhill to Bricklayers' Arms (South-Eastern Railway), have for a week to work each day 14 and 15 hours; of the 7 o'clock a.m. goods train, Redhill to Reading, 13½ to 14½ hours; of the 12.30 a.m. goods train, Redhill to Reading and back, 13 to 14½ hours regularly. A porter at Basingstoke (London and South-Western Railway) came on duty at 6 a.m. on Thursday last, and remained on duty 36 hours. These cases can be multiplied to any extent, but as I do not know whether such information as this is required by your Grace, I will give no more now."

Experience at sea had taught sailors that the look-out should be divided into four-hours' watches, and in the engine-room six-hours' shifts were adopted. The Government would not entrust the mails, or individuals their lives, to a ship whose hands were on duty 20 hours; and shipowners knew they must conform to those rules in which safety was insured, or other vessels would be started and take their trade; but the Railway Companies had a monopoly, and were in a position that whatever they did the public must travel by them and take their chance. He believed that in unfortunate times 1 per cent on the working expenses would cover compensation; and a sufficient staff to deal with the extra work which at certain seasons of the year fell on railways would cost considerably more. Therefore it was best economy for a Railway Company to run the risk and pay the damages than to prevent accidents. The 2nd clause of the Bill limited the hours during which railway servants might be employed in any 24 hours to 12 hours, except when unforeseen circumstances rendered a longer employment necessary for the security of life. The number was only tentative, and suggested itself to him as adopted on board ship as one which should not be exceeded; but he trusted it would seldom be reached. Clause 2 made the employment of railway servants contrary to its provisions an offence punishable in each case by a penalty of not less than £5, and not more than £50; unless it could be proved that such employment was necessary for the security of life; but if it were proved that the employment was wholly or partially during the night, the minimum penalty was fixed at £10 and the maximum at £100. Clause 3 was framed with a view of recouping a Railway Company penalty and costs to which they might be liable by the contravention of the Act (contrary to their wishes) by some of their officials; and it provided that though the Company should in the first instance be liable, the official who employed the railway servant contrary to the Act, and without the consent, knowledge, or connivance of the Railway Company, might be ordered by the Court to repay to the Company the fine incurred by them and the costs of the proceedings. Clause 4 enabled penalties to be recovered in the manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Act. Clause 5 allowed an appeal to quarter sessions. He had endeavoured thus to secure that the matter should be settled in a summary and inexpensive way. Clause 6 defined what should be meant by a "Railway Company" and "Railway servants" under this Bill; and as to this much might be said about including stationmasters; but, on the whole, he had thought it more convenient not to do so. Railway servant under the Bill would mean engine-driver, fireman, stoker, guard, signalman, pointsman, platelayers (he proposed to omit platelayers), breaksmen, shunter, wheel-tapper, wheel-examiner, and porter engaged in working the traffic. When platelayers were eliminated, those only on whom the public safety actually devolved would come under its enactments. The remaining clauses provided for the technical working of the Act, except Clause 7, which allowed the Court to give to the complainant or informer half the fine when it seemed desirable. Such was the measure which he had the honour to present to their Lordships. Better means might suggest themselves to others of arriving at the end which he had in view. Though the noble Lord who proposed to put the extinguisher on this Bill (Viscount Bury) paid its principle a qualified praise the other night, even if the Bill survived that night he could not be sanguine of its becoming law this year; but this thing he did regret—that the fact would go forth that a Railway Director moved its rejection. He knew that the noble Lord was actuated by conscientious motives; but he was afraid the public would regard him as a Director of the London and South-Western Railway.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—(The Duke of St. Albans.)

VISCOUNT BURY, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, he had been for many years a Railway Director, and he had devoted considerable attention to the working of railways: he hoped, therefore, he would be pardoned for interposing between the Motion for the second reading and the vote which their Lordships would be called upon to give on that Motion. He admitted that if the Preamble of the noble Duke's Bill was true, a case had been made out for some such measure as this; but he asked whether that Preamble was true? He denied that it was. It was inaccurate to say that railway servants were habitually overworked; and he ventured to assert that if this Bill passed, railways would become unworkable, the traffic would be at a standstill, and the railway system of the country would be paralyzed. On a former occasion he said that while not being able to concur in the resolutions contained in the Report of the Royal Commission, he did bear willing testimony to the manner in which the Commission had collected and summed up the evidence—what it had done in that respect was beyond all praise. He had referred to the Royal Commissioners as experts, and he asked what they said as to railway servants being overworked. One of the Commissioners, Mr. Galt, whose bias seemed to be in favour of the purchase of the railways by the State, made a Report of his own, and having analyzed all the evidence bearing on that point, Mr. Galt said he felt bound to admit that the railway servants generally were satisfied, and their hours of work were not excessive. There were 119 railways in England, and in respect of only two of those had it been shown that the men were overworked. One of those was a mineral line in South Wales, and the other was the Great Eastern. In the case of the latter line the overwork was in a goods shed at Cambridge; but it was explained by the manager that the overwork in that shed was due to exceptional circumstances, and would not recur, and that the work, if excessive, was certainly not dangerous. The General Report of the Commission stated that, if to meet the exceptional cases in which the men were required to work for an excessive length of time, legislation should become necessary, such legislation would require to be accompanied by many safeguards. The fact was that in scarcely any other employment was there such diversity as to the nature of the duties as in that of railway servants. The General Report stated that the men employed by the railway companies were the best available in the existing state of the labour market. That was true, and it was also true that there were no better-behaved class of workmen. And if the men behaved well it was because they were paid well and treated well. There was no class in this country better able to take care of themselves than the unskilled workmen. As was stated by one of the witnesses before the Commission, if those men were not treated well on the railways they would take up their jackets and walk away. The trades unions with which they were connected would not allow them to be "put upon." It was an injudicious thing to assert that the service of railways was conducted in such a way as to expose the public to danger. The general managers of a line with which he was not connected had sent him some statistics as to the number of persons employed on that line, and as to the number of hours during which they were on duty. The total number employed was 8,944. Of those 23 worked 7 hours a-day, 91 worked 7½ hours, 266 worked 8 hours, 123 worked 8½ hours, 265 worked 9 hours, 244 worked 9½ hours, 1,189 worked 10 hours, 858 worked 10½ hours, 929 worked 11 hours, 353 worked 11½ hours, 1,022 worked 12 hours, 89 worked 12½ hours, 62 worked 13 hours, 32 worked 13½ hours, 26 worked 14 hours, 11 worked 14½ hours, 16 worked 15 hours, and 2 worked 16 hours. The greater number of those who worked for long hours were employed at intermittent employments, and had not their attention on a constant strain. When men worked over hours they were paid for it at the rate of from one and a-half to two hours' pay for each hour. On week days, when worked overtime, they had an hour and a-half's pay for an hour's work, and on Sundays they had two hours' pay for one hour's work. A few years ago the railway servants agitated against overtime; but when the matter came to be examined into, it was found that they did not care so much about working overtime, as about securing that they should be paid for it. At that time they were paid by the day; but now they were paid by the hour for their overwork, and the noble Duke might take it from him that the railway servants would not regard him as their benefactor if he succeeded in passing this Bill. As to the engine-drivers, it was quite true that many of them worked over 12 hours a-day; but that was generally in the case of goods trains, which had to go a certain distance, wait a certain time, and then return, and which had also to get out of the way of the fast trains. He was not connected with the Great Western Railway, and he might, therefore, refer to it in illustrating the case. If, on the Great Western, a goods train started from Bristol for London it might find itself between Slough and London at the end of 12 hours. The engine-driver could not be relieved at the end of the 12 hours, because the manager of the Company could not know on what part of the line he would be found then, and consequently it would be an impossibility to have a relief ready on the bank. If the time was absolutely fixed at 12 hours, were the men to leave their engines at whatever spot they might be? The provision in the Bill enabling Railway Companies to proceed against negligent servants for damages already paid by a Company could have only a mischievous effect. As to signalmen, the number of hours per day during which they were worked was in populous districts 8 hours, and in less populous districts 12 hours. It was necessary occasionally to exceed that a little in order to make the day shifts and the night shifts fit in when there was a change at the end of the week. He had anticipated that his noble Friend would bring up the 37 hours' case, because it was the stock instance always referred to on those occasions; but if noble Lords referred to the evidence in the Blue Book they would find that the 37 hours' case arose from an agreement made between three signalmen themselves, unknown to the Company, in order to obtain a holiday. Some little time ago Railway Directors tried an eight hours' shift for signalmen instead of a 12 hours' one in agricultural districts. The result of it was that the signalmen hired themselves to the farmers, and came back to their shifts so tired from work in the fields, that the shortening of the hours was a source of danger to the public. The feeling expressed by the men generally was that railway work was hard, but that the hours, while well paid for, were not excessive. The Bill showed on the face of it great want of consideration and ignorance of details, and he could not conceive that their Lordships could possibly give it a second reading. If the noble Duke had consulted those who were acquainted with railway management, they would have told him that the Bill was altogether unworkable. The best way of remedying any grievance that might exist was to leave the matter to those who were responsible for the management of the Company's affairs.

An Amendment moved to leave out ("now,") and insert ("this day six months.")—(The Viscount Bury.)

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, the noble Lord (Viscount Bury) had treated the question from the view of the railway servants; he wished to say a few words in the interest of the public, who were constantly horrified by reports of accidents, which, on investigation, were frequently found to be attributable to overwork of the railway servants. It was an undoubted fact that in 1875 no fewer than 780 railway servants were killed, and over 3,000 wounded, of whom a large proportion perished by accidents occasioned by over work and exhaustion. That was the case as to the railway servants—now, as to the travelling public. In a case of accident it was shown that a boy between 16 and 17 years old had been kept for 14 consecutive hours managing a telegraph, and very probably it was in consequence of the boy's inability to perform the duty for such a length of time that he committed the error that was the cause of the catastrophe. What was the use in telling them that on some line or other the men were not overworked, if on another one's spine was injured or one's leg broken in consequence of overwork, such as that boy had to perform? The Government appointed a Royal Commission in 1874—he presumed that inquiry was thought necessary at that time, or a Royal Commission would not have been appointed. He took an interest in the work of the Royal Commission, and after about a year and a-half had elapsed he began to inquire what it had done. He was told that unfortunately the noble Duke who had been appointed Chairman of the Royal Commission (the Duke of Buckingham) had gone to India. Well, where was the Report? The noble Duke had taken the Report with him. Where was the Secretary? He had gone with the noble Duke. It was no wonder that the Railway Commission had been a little distracted in its proceedings, and that its Report required a very long time for its consideration. As to the responsibility of Railway Companies, there was much misapprehension. What did that responsibility amount to? It sometimes happened that when a Government Inspector went over a line he found the permanent way very defective. The next time the Company met it was announced to the shareholders and the public that gangers had been sent down the line to put everything in order. But what did the public know about the responsibility in this case? The only persons who could be held liable for the condition must be some of those who were connected with its management. To whom were they responsible? To the shareholders? But the shareholders were only anxious for a good dividend. So far as the Government were concerned, they might incur a responsibility by not interfering to protect the lives and property of Her Majesty's subjects. No doubt, the Government had great difficulty in interfering; but still there were cases in which Companies neglected to adopt improvements that were urged upon them; these were Companies that were worked on what were called most economical principles. When accidents happened on their lines, and it appeared that the lines were not in a proper condition, or the number of servants was insufficient, or their hours were too long, he hoped that juries would give heavy damages, proportionate to the degree of neglect that was established. He was afraid, from a speech which was delivered the other night, that there was little chance of the Government interfering on behalf of the public at present; but before long they would be obliged to interfere in some way, unless the Companies were wise enough to take the advice that had been given to them by increasing their break powers, taking care of their permanent way, and introducing the block and telegraph systems wherever they were required. Until the Government had done that which they seemed disinclined to do, the only way to bring home responsibility to the Companies was to make them pay heavy compensations to those who might be injured through their negligence or parsimony.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that though he admitted that there existed ground of complaint against the Railway Companies, still if the noble Duke in charge of the Bill went to a division, he should be obliged to vote for the Amendment. He understood the railway servants were disappointed at the little notice that had been taken of their case in a recent discussion; but it was very fully considered by the Royal Commission on Railway Accidents, before which their case was fully represented by their energetic secretary. The railway servants set forth six grievances—namely, excessive hours of labour, non-enforcement of rules, non-adoption of improvements, want of accommodation for the traffic, the employment of inefficient persons, and the insufficient number of railway servants. They did not succeed in making out all their case. There were exceptional cases of excessive hours, and there were rules, such as that against “fly shunting” which involved getting off and on carriages in motion, that were not enforced, and there was the non-employment of superior officers to enforce them. The non-adoption of improved appliances affected the public as well as the servants, and on this head the Commissioners recommended an extension of the powers of the Board of Trade. If the Government saw their way next year to legislate on this recommendation, that would meet the case of the railway servants and of the public too. The noble Earl quoted the conclusions of the Commissioners on these points, also the following passage from their Report bearing on the subject of the Bill:—

“In our opinion railway servants have some grounds for seeking exceptional measures for their protection, from the fact that owing to certain incidents of the law of Master and Servant, the law of liability, upon which (as the Royal Commissioners of 1865 say) ‘Parliament has relied for the safe working of railways,’ is practically a dead letter as far as they are concerned. But all such special measures are unequal in their operation in contrast with general laws, the influence of which is constant and even; and, therefore, we would recommend such a change in the law as will place railway servants in as nearly the same position with the public in these respects as is consistent with the law of Master and Servant. Whether these principles are wise and just we do not stop to inquire. We assume that they are so. But there are certain incidents in their application to railway labour, on account of which they press harshly, if not with positive injustice, upon the servants. There are other spheres of employment, no doubt, in respect of which this is equally true, but we confine ourselves to the precise question which concerns us. The distinction which the law of liability maintains between a master's liability to strangers and to his own servants is intelligible; but, at all events, to deal with the general law is beyond our province. But the grievance of the railway servants is not that they have, in common with all other servants, to prove what the law deems personal negligence on the part of their master in order to enforce a claim to compensation, but that in their case the law, instead of attaching this liability to a master who is, in fact, and not merely by a legal fiction, a person, and can, therefore, be reached and made amenable, confines it exclusively to a corporation so remote from them that proof of complicity with the wrong from which they suffer is almost invariably an impossibility.”

That was the substance of their recommendations. It was not to be expected that the Government would pronounce an opinion on this matter at once. For himself, he would be satisfied if in the present year they dealt with the subject of break power. He hoped the result would be that either by legislation, or some other means the public would soon be placed on some better footing than at present with regard to the numerous railway accidents that occurred.

EARL DE LA WARR said, he could not agree with his noble Friend who moved the Amendment (Viscount Bury) as to the very small number of overworked railway servants whose cases had come before the Commission. If his noble Friend referred to the Evidence, he would find there had been many such cases—among others cases of engine-drivers who worked 18, 20, and even 24 hours at a stretch. A case was mentioned by one of the Inspectors of the Board of Trade, where an accident on the Limerick and Waterford Railway was attributed to the fact that the engine-driver could not observe a distant signal in consequence of exhaustion, having been continually employed for 21 hours. He had entire sympathy with the noble Duke, so far as regarded the object he had in view—the regulation of the hours of work of railway servants; he feared, however, that the mode in which he proposed to attain that object was impracticable. He could not help thinking there was a certain laxity on the part of Railway Companies in enforcing their own regulations with regard to the length of time their servants should be employed. The men were, perhaps, too ready to work over-hours for extra pay; and if the Board of Trade would impress upon Railway Companies the necessity of carrying out their own rules and restrictions and enforcing better discipline, the evils they all desired to remedy would be very greatly diminished. He hoped the noble Duke would not think it necessary to press the second reading of the Bill.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he should oppose the second reading. The noble Duke (the Duke of Somerset) had rather objected to the line of observation adopted by his noble Friend (the Duke of St. Albans) in confining his remarks entirely to the case of railway servants. But there was the very best reason for this—namely, that the Bill under discussion only dealt with railway servants, and therefore the noble Duke himself was himself rather irregular in travelling out of the record with regard to railway passengers. He ventured to think if this Bill passed the comfort of railway passengers would be very much interfered with. It would be very dangerous to establish such a precedent as would interfere between the employer of adult labour and the employed as to the number of hours they should labour. This Bill, if passed in anything like its present shape, would so hamper Railway Companies as to render it perfectly impossible to carry on the traffic. As matters at present stood, every facility and comfort were given to the public; the utmost efficiency was preserved and the utmost speed maintained. Those who were in the habit of travelling to the North must be aware that the Limited Mail left Euston Square at 8.30 P.M., and arrived at Perth at 9 A.M., being under the charge of an experienced guard who saw to the comfort of the passengers and the regularity of the trains. But if this Bill passed, no such arrangements could in future be made. One important point was this—where any accident occurred in consequence of the employment of railway servants for an undue length of time, the fact was always reported on by the Inspector, and the publicity thus given to it operated as a very considerable check in the way of preventing Railway Companies unduly employing their servants. He was astonished to hear the noble Duke (the Duke of St. Albans) state that Railway Companies were actuated in this matter by the feeling that it was cheaper to pay damages than to take steps to prevent accidents by employing men at high wages and for shorter periods of time. That statement, in his opinion, was not borne out by the facts of the case. The noble Duke on the Front bench (the Duke of Somerset) did not think it possible for the Government, having so much business in hand, to bring in a Bill this Session to deal with the matter. He entirely agreed with the noble Duke on that point. As was stated the other night by his noble Friend at the head of the Government, the subject was one which was entitled to, and was receiving, every consideration; but they were not able this year to legislate upon it. As to the remarks of the noble Duke about break power, the Companies, he believed, were now endeavouring to ascertain which was the most efficacious and best continuous break with a view to prevent accidents. The noble Duke also alluded to the block system. That system was now in operation, if he was not mistaken, on all the great lines. But even with that system accidents did occur. As the noble Duke was aware, one of the worst accidents had occurred on a line which had the block system in operation and was one of the first lines to adopt it—the Great Northern. He opposed the Bill before the House because he believed it would be perfectly impracticable in its working, the Preamble to be incorrect and incapable of proof, and because, if the Bill were to pass into law, it would add to the present difficulties and not take away any of the dangers of railway travelling.

LORD ABERDARE thought his noble Friend (the Duke of St. Albans) was perfectly justified in bringing forward the Bill, though it would be wise not to press it. He confessed it was no satisfaction to him if an accident happened to know, as had been stated by the noble Lord who moved the Amendment, that the men who were worked 15 or 16 hours at a time were handsomely paid. This discussion would, no doubt, be of service, as the attention of the Government would be directed to the question of the number of hours railway servants might be employed; but he thought his noble Friend would take the best course in not pressing the Bill. The subject was one which, before any steps could be taken in the way of legislation, required inquiry by a Select Committee.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON wished it to be understood that he did not pledge the Government on the matter. He had only said it was one of great importance, and should receive consideration.

Then the said Amendment, Original Motion, and Bill (by leave of the House), withdrawn.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it were true, as stated in "The Morning Post" of April 25, that

"Mr. Layard had informed the Porte that England had guaranteed the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire only under conditions laid down by treaties stipulating for the exercise of control by the Powers?"

Though too much importance ought not to be attached to statements by newspaper correspondents, yet they could not be altogether disregarded, since Mr. Gladstone or Mr. Bright laid down last Autumn that those who read the penny papers were as capable of judging of foreign affairs as Cabinet Ministers; and as there were still to be found persons who upheld the exaggerations of The Daily News Correspondent, and considered them to have been entirely corroborated, notwithstanding the large reduction of the figures of that Correspondent by Mr. Baring's Report; whose figures had again been reduced to one-third by the report of Mr. Storey, who was charged with administering relief to the Bulgarians. That might be said to be fresh reason for not allowing erroneous newspaper statements to remain uncontradicted, especially after the recent remarkable exhibition of credulity and simple faith in newspaper statements on the last occasion their Lordships sat. He desired, therefore, to ask the Secretary of State, if the statement in The Morning Post of April 25 was true or not? He could not believe it to be true for three reasons—first, because there were no such treaties; secondly, because, so recently as the 8th of February last, the Secretary of State stated to this House

"that he did not conceive we had a Treaty right to do so—that was, exercise intervention

and, thirdly, because the language attributed to Mr. Layard would be contrary to that which he was said to have held only about a fortnight before. As he entirely concurred with the opinion of his noble Friend the Secretary of State as to the extreme undesirableness of his being called upon night after night to express opinions upon important subjects, he should not put the other two Questions of which he had given Notice.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I have no difficulty in answering the Question of the noble Lord. Mr. Layard has not reported himself to have used any such language as that to which the noble Lord has referred, and I feel certain that no such language as that ascribed to him could have been used, because no man is better acquainted than Mr. Layard with the state of the case as regards our Treaty obligations, and the statement contained in the extract from The Morning Post is not in accordance with the facts. Seeing the Notice given by my noble Friend, I referred to the article in question, and found that the language quoted was not ascribed to Mr. Layard on the authority of any person professing to have accurate knowledge of what he said or did not say; but the writer merely gave the language as ascribed to him in the reports current in Constantinople at the time. I apprehend that Constantinople is a place where a good many reports are current which are not true.

QUESTIONS.

RAILWAYS (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Postmaster General, If he can state how many posts run north and south across a line drawn on the map between the two towns of Cong and Athlone, and what is the distance between these two towns; and, to name the towns between which such cross posts run, and to state how many hours after the arrival of the post in Tuam, county of Galway, it is forwarded to Claremorris in county of Mayo?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: There are no mail lines which run north and south across a line between Cong and Athlone. Speaking generally, the district south of such a line is connected with the mail lines from Galway, and the district north with the mail lines to and from Westport. The distance between Cong and Athlone is about 57 miles. The post is not forwarded via Tuam, but by mail from Westport.

REGISTRAR OF BIRTHS AND DEATHS.
QUESTION.

MR. W. JOHNSTON asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, and, if so, under what circumstances, a Registrar of Births and Deaths is justified in refusing to give a certified copy of an entry in the Register under his care, at a cost not exceeding one shilling to the applicant, when such certificate is required for the purpose of enabling a member of a registered Friendly Society, or his representatives, to obtain payment of any sum due to him or them from such society?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: I am not aware, Sir, of any circumstances which would justify a Registrar in refusing to give a certificate of death for the purpose alluded to. The Friendly Societies Act of 1875 provides that a certificate of death shall be given on the payment of a fee of 1s., but application must be made in such form as is provided by the Registrar General, and some omission in that respect may have given rise to this Question. It is no part of the duty of the Registrar to fill up the form; but he is permitted by the Registrar General to do so on a charge of 3d. extra.

INDIA—THE CASE OF MR. WELD.

QUESTION.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he would lay upon the Table the Correspondence and Papers relating to the suspension in April 1876, of Mr. Weld of the Madras Civil Service, for, as magistrate of the Nagapatam Tanjore district, causing the exhumation of a body of a Saniyasi buried on the banks of a drinking water reservoir at that place?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, he had no objection to lay the Papers referred to by his hon. Friend on the Table of the House when they were complete.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—THE SUEZ CANAL.—QUESTION.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to how far the statement which had appeared in the newspapers is accurate, viz.—

"That the Suez Canal is closed to Russian ships of war by agreement between the Porte and the Khedive. The entrances to the Canal will be guarded forthwith?"

MR. BOURKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have heard that it is intended to close the passage of the Suez Canal to Russian war vessels; but, as far as we are aware, no definite regulation has been issued on the subject. It is not intended, we are told, to close the Suez Canal to other vessels.

THE DEBATE—SIR JAMES BROOKE.

EXPLANATION. QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I wish, Sir, to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, of which I have given him private Notice. There was a passage in the right hon. Gentleman's speech which he delivered on Monday night, which did not attract my attention at the time, but to which my attention has been drawn by a friend of Sir James Brooke—

"I cannot recollect a more shameful proceeding than the slaughter of the Dyaks by soldiers of Her Majesty and Sir James Brooke."

I have two reasons for putting the Question. One is that Admiral Sir Thomas Cochrane was the Commander-in-Chief in China, and that he gave the order for the attack on the forts; and the other is that there is a feeling among the friends of Sir James Brooke of pain and surprise at this observation, inasmuch as there was a Royal Commission, which inquired into the transaction, and the conduct of Sir James Brooke was highly approved. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether, by the phrase "a more shameful proceeding," or the phrase "the slaughter of the Dyaks," he intended to convey any censure upon the officers in Her Majesty's Service who acted upon the Instructions which they received from the Admiral, and on that distinguished man, Sir James Brooke?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, Sir, the words quoted by my hon. Friend are not precisely correct; but, at the same time, they do not very greatly vary the effect of the impression I wish to convey. I say they are not precisely correct, because I am made to state that it was the soldiers whose conduct I blamed. According to my recollection, at this distance of time, the operation was entirely a naval one; and my recollection, as far as it goes, is that it was performed with the guns of the ships, and not by a minor warfare in detail. I do not, therefore, accept the words as they stand, but undoubtedly my opinion of the act is that it was an act of great and gross cruelty. With reference to these officers referred to, the responsibility has been entirely removed from their shoulders. I had forgotten at the time I spoke the circumstances of the Commission; but I do recollect and I do now state in the most explicit manner—and I am glad to have the opportunity of stating it again—that neither the Commander-in-Chief, the admiral at the station, could be held responsible except to the extent of the general orders, nor Sir James Brooke, who was a man of great energy, great abilities, and high character, and who was very much esteemed by many persons who themselves are most worthy of esteem; and still less could the officers and sailors of Her Majesty's Fleet be held in any degree responsible. They acted, I believe, strictly under orders; and not only was there the Commission to which the hon. Member has alluded, but the matter was brought directly under the cognizance of the Government and the House; and in the division which took place a large majority of the House and the Government completely upheld the conduct of Sir James Brooke, and those who were concerned in those operations. Therefore, the opinion which I give I give as my own opinion, as one of the minority in the matter. I still hold that opinion; but I entirely concur with the hon. Gentleman that no blame or censure can possibly attach personally to any of those concerned in the matter after the responsibility has been assumed by the authorities at home, and after the House has affirmed in the most decided manner its approval.

THE EASTERN QUESTION — RESOLUTIONS (MR. GLADSTONE).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved—

"That the Order of the Day for the Committee of Supply be postponed until after the Order of the Day for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Eastern Question."

MR. E. JENKINS rose to appeal to the Government for an understanding that the debate should not be concluded that evening. He had, from a certain quarter of that House, that morning received a "Whip" informing him that there would to-night be a certain division; which showed that there were some hon. Gentlemen gifted with a prescience which was extraordinary and supernatural. He knew that there were still a large number of hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House, many of whom agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, and who desired to have an opportunity of expressing their opinions. For himself, he had been during the whole of last evening engaged in a series of calisthenic exercises with the vain object of catching the Speaker's eye. He was only a humble Member of that House, but he had a constituency, and they expected that he should endeavour to discharge his duty to them; there were others in the same position, and as they had had no opportunity of offering an opinion on the subject, he felt he was entitled to ask the Government and hon. Members not to interpose any obstacle to the free expression of opinion. His appeal to the Government gathered strength from the fact that a certain colour had been given to the debate by the many hon. Members who did not agree with the Resolutions, and a number of hon. Members whose opinions were entitled to respect were desirous of expressing their opinions in a contrary sense to the colour which had been imparted to the debate. More than all, when last night they were obliged to sit there while insults were offered to the Sovereign of a great State with which at present we were in amity, and his name and assurances were treated with derisive cheers from the opposite side of the House, there was good reason why a number of hon. Members on that side should have an opportunity of vindicating the public opinion of this country. He appealed to the Government that the discussion should not be concluded that night, and that the right hon. Member for Greenwich should have an opportunity to sum up that great debate on Monday or Tuesday at an earlier hour than he could otherwise get.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Whatever else may be done, I hope one thing, at all events, and that is that we shall not spend any great portion of the time we have at our disposal for discussion this evening, by getting into a debate as to when the division is to take place. I can assure hon. Gentlemen, so far as the Government are concerned, we have been most anxious to give as much facility as possible for hon. Members to speak in this debate. On the previous evening, no Member of the Government had risen to address the House; and on the present occasion, my hon. Friend (Mr. Bourke) who represents the Foreign Department in this House will feel it his duty to address some observations, yet no other Members of the Government, except myself propose to trespass on the time of the House. I most earnestly press upon the House the importance of endeavouring to bring this debate to a close to-night. We are perfectly ready to sit to a later hour than usual, in order to hear speeches which hon. Gentlemen are anxious to deliver, and we are under an obligation to the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan), who has given us the night in order that it may be made use of to the best possible advantage. I hope, therefore, we shall be supported by the House in endeavouring to bring the question to an issue to-night.

MR. WALTER wished to make a practical suggestion to the House at large, as well as to its Leaders on either side. He had always been of opinion that speeches in the House were a great deal too long. He was himself, on the present occasion, somewhat in the position of hon. Gentlemen behind him, for he, too, had wished to make some remarks upon the matter before the House, and had been unable to get an opportunity for so doing. He would, therefore, appeal to the good feeling of those hon. Gentlemen who in the course of the evening might, so to speak, get upon their horses, that they should not indulge in an unlimited gallop over the whole pasture which lay before them; and, to use another illustration, he would suggest that hon. Members, being in the position of a ship's crew who were running short of provisions, would do well to put themselves on half commons.

MR. ANDERSON said, what he and other hon. Members complained of was that the debate had not taken a fair direction, and that, whether by intention or by accident, the debate had taken such a turn and gone in such a direction that it would go to the country so as to show that the right hon. Member for Greenwich had only for his four Resolutions an extremely small following in that House, which was a false impression. As he (Mr. Anderson) had pointed out last evening, only two hon. Members who supported the Resolutions and were known to be warm supporters of them had been called upon in the whole of the three evenings, and he complained of that as unfair, whether it had been intended or not. It was perfectly well known that the following which the right hon. Gentleman would have, even if there had not been any attempt at "patching up," would have been a very large one, and it was unfair that the country should have been led to believe that it would only be a very weak one.

[Fourth Night.]

MR. GLADSTONE thought no one could complain of what was said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was naturally anxious to bring the debate to a close. They were all aware that everything that could be done to accommodate the House and all its Members by an impartial choice was done by the Speaker, although no doubt it was impossible for that right hon. Gentleman, remarkable as his gifts might be, to judge from the personal appearance of the Member alone what line he intended to take. He (Mr. Gladstone) hoped there was no absolutely foregone conclusion as to the closing of the debate, but by all means let them proceed, and make the best of the time they had at their disposal. It did not become him to recommend short speeches after the extent to which he had trespassed upon the House on Monday evening last; but he ventured to say that this was probably the very largest question of foreign policy, and one having the greatest amount and range of topics, that had ever been before the House. He was sure there would be no disposition of hon. Members, for mere egotism's sake, to intrude themselves upon the House. At the same time, he was bound to say there were several Gentlemen, well qualified and entitled by their position to address the House, who had not yet been called upon, and who ought to find an opportunity to do so, and therefore he hoped a fair discretion would be exercised by Her Majesty's Government.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON hoped the House would at once enter upon the debate, with a desire of, if possible, concluding it in the course of the present sitting. At the same time, he hoped it would not be a foregone conclusion that it must necessarily so conclude in any circumstances. There were several hon. Gentlemen on that bench who had been anxious to address the House, and it was due to his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt) and his right hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen)—as there was an inclination to take credit for the making of sacrifices—to say that though they desired to speak on the question, they would be willing to forego their respective opportunities of so doing.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Anderson

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

THE EASTERN QUESTION— RESOLUTIONS (MR. GLADSTONE). ADJOURNED DEBATE. FOURTH NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [7th May],

"That this House finds just cause of dissatisfaction and complaint in the conduct of the Ottoman Porte with regard to the Despatch written by the Earl of Derby on the 21st day of September 1876, and relating to the massacres in Bulgaria."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "declines to entertain any Resolutions which may embarrass Her Majesty's Government in the maintenance of peace and in the protection of British interests, without indicating any alternative line of policy,"—(Sir Henry Welford,)—instead thereof.

MR. BOURKE said, that holding the position he did, it had been his fate to have to wade through every document in the Foreign Office relating to this subject which had been written during the last three years, and he was sure that the House would sympathize with him when he said that it was no light undertaking to attempt to consider any portion of this great subject. He trusted, however, that the House would not be alarmed by that statement, because he could assure them that he did not intend to address them at any great length, especially after the observations that had fallen from the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter). The subject, indeed, appeared to him to have been very nearly exhausted, and the case of the Government had been put in a most satisfactory manner by his Superiors in office who had preceded him in the debate, and therefore it was his intention not to traverse the ground which they had already gone over, but to confine his observations to certain topics which had not yet been alluded to, or which if they had been alluded to, had only been touched upon lightly. Notwithstanding the great difference between the Resolutions of the right hon. Member for Greenwich as originally proposed and as they now appeared upon the Paper, to which attention had been directed by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), he did not think that any candid man could maintain that the Government, after all that had passed during this debate, could avoid looking upon these Resolutions as a whole. There was much in the speech of the right hon. Member for Bradford last night to which he (Mr. Bourke) had listened with most sincere pleasure. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the speech of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary as one calculated to dispel many dangerous delusions. Why those delusions came to be entertained it was not for Her Majesty's Government or himself to divine, and certainly no man of judgment who had read what the Government had written, or had heard what they had said from the beginning to the end of this discussion, would feel himself justified in charging them with having given the slightest ground for those delusions. The right hon. Gentleman also went on to say that he was satisfied with the interpretation which the Home Secretary had placed upon the word "neutrality." The position of Her Majesty's Government had from the first been based upon that interpretation of the word. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to say that he was strongly in favour of the maintenance and of the protection of British interests in case they were attacked. That also was one of the cardinal points in the policy of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman also spoke of the mediatorial duties which it might become incumbent upon this country to discharge from time to time while the war was going on. For his own part, he (Mr. Bourke) hoped that it would not be long before Her Majesty's Government were called upon to discharge those duties, and he could only say that they were fully impressed with the fact that those were among the most important of their duties, and he hoped that the earnest they had given with regard to Serbia was sufficient to satisfy the House and the country that they would never allow the slightest opportunity to pass of using their mediatorial offices when they could be usefully employed in order to restore peace to Europe. The right hon. Gentleman had also spoken of the duties which would be incumbent upon this country in reference to the arrangements which would follow when the war was brought to a conclusion. Her Majesty's Government were peculiarly alive to those duties, and it was in view of them that they did not wish to have their future action hampered in any way, because they felt that the events that might ensue might have a very vital and powerful effect upon the future destinies of this country as well as those of the South-eastern part of Europe. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that he had never been in favour of England acting by herself or of her joining Russia, and that there would have been great danger to the peace of Europe if she had gone to war against Turkey, or had joined the other Powers in going to war with her. That was the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, and that was the principle upon which they were acting; and there could not be a clearer exposition of the policy which had guided them from first to last. But the right hon. Gentleman then proceeded to make some statements in which he could not concur. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that he deeply regretted that Her Majesty's Government did not adopt the policy of calling upon Europe to put pressure upon Turkey, and, if necessary, to use coercion. He (Mr. Bourke) was totally unable to reconcile that principle, so laid down by the right hon. Gentleman, with the other one he had stated that he was in favour of; in fact, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman had been too anxious to hunt with the hounds and to run with the hare upon this occasion, and that this desire had laid him open to the charge of inconsistency. If the last principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman were correct, he ought to lay himself at the feet of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney), who had certainly never said anything stronger in favour of coercion than was contained in that principle. No one could well mistake the meaning of the very able and logical speech of the hon. Member for Liskeard—it meant the dismemberment of Turkey pure and simple. He (Mr. Bourke) based his objection to the dismemberment of Turkey upon the same grounds as were put forward by the Secretary for War. What commission, human or divine, had we to say to a country—"You shall be cut to pieces?" What commission, human or divine, had we to enter on a crusade against Turkey, or to attack a young Monarch, who certainly was not responsible for any of these acts of misgovernment and of cruelty which had of late disgraced the Government of Turkey, and to tell him that we were going to dismember his country for no reason in the world except for the misgovernment and the cruelties in which he had no part? The hon. Member for Liskeard had complained that we were in conflict with all the other European Powers in regard to these negotiations, as to putting pressure upon Turkey, and that the policy of Her Majesty's Government had been to keep them back from acting in the matter. There was, however, nothing in the whole history of this business that justified that statement. On the contrary, the concord of the European Powers, with the exception of Russia, with reference to the non-coercion of Turkey, was unanimous from first to last. The hon. Member further said that the question rested primarily with England and Germany, and that it might have been settled by the joint action of those two Powers, if we had addressed any communication to Prince Bismarck on the subject. He (Mr. Bourke) should like to know his authority for that statement. The hon. Member might know more of Prince Bismarck's mind than Her Majesty's Government. Prince Bismarck spoke his mind in the most candid manner to many persons, and it was quite possible that the hon. Member had had these confidences made to him by Prince Bismarck. If he had, he had been more fortunate than Her Majesty's Government, and he (Mr. Bourke) could not find anything in the Blue Books, or in any private letter which had been written, which would justify the statement that Prince Bismarck was ready to join them in the policy suggested. The hon. Member had then proceeded to draw a picture of the relations between France and Germany, which, in his opinion, was over-coloured. He (Mr. Bourke) hoped and believed that the feelings of animosity between those countries were not so strong as had been represented. France, great as she had been in the past, had a great future before her, and by pursuing the paths of peace she would attain greater glory and greater power than she had gained by pursuing the old ways of war. In regard to the Germans, he could not believe that a great and philosophic people, educated as they were—and they were the best educated people in the world—would long allow feelings of resentment towards France to rankle in their bosoms; and he sincerely hoped, notwithstanding what had been said to the contrary, that France and Germany would be united hereafter—and that in the course of a very short period—in the path of peace and progress. At the same time, he would point out that, if the unhappy state of feeling to which the hon. Member for Liskeard referred really existed between those two countries, it would manifestly have been futile to have gone to Germany and asked her to join in an European concert, when the first thing that would have happened would have been that the spirit described by the hon. Gentleman would have been evoked in France, and thus have utterly destroyed any hope of concert. The hon. Member for Liskeard went on to say last evening that the policy which he recommended—namely, that of coercion—would be a safe and an easy policy; but he could not agree with the hon. Gentleman, and he did not think that the remarks which he made on that point were worthy of a Member of his independent character and courage. He (Mr. Bourke) thought the course recommended by the hon. Gentleman to be one of a very mean character. What was his suggestion? It was this—"What is the Turkish Fleet without the head of an Englishman?" and he conveyed the impression that the Turkish Fleet was commanded by Englishmen; that there was not a single iron-clad in it which did not depend for navigation on an English engineer; and that if war broke out between England and Turkey, the consequences would be that the Ottoman Fleet would at once be given up to them. For his part, however, he could conceive no more dastardly conduct than that of a man who, having undertaken the responsibility of commanding a Fleet, should give over his ships to an antagonist, which would be the part of a traitor. The hon. Gentleman said, in effect, that the Fleet would be given up, and there would be an end of the question. Had recent events justified that opinion? Did the events of 1828 justify it? He did not believe it. Of course, if war were to take place between Turkey and England the English officers now serving in Turkey would leave that service; but if the Turkish Fleet were destroyed to-morrow, I do not think that it would in the least degree alter the opinion of the Mussulman population with respect to their duty to their country; and if the whole of the Fleet was sent to the bottom of the Black Sea to-morrow, it would not alter their character or determination one iota. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich the other day described the policy of Her Majesty's Government during the last 18 months as deplorable; but he (Mr. Bourke) would like to know exactly when the right hon. Gentleman came to entertain that opinion, and how long it had been shared in by those who sat beside him on the front Opposition Bench. He was glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) was in his place, for he wished to make his acknowledgment, the first time he had an opportunity, of the patriotic course which the right hon. Gentleman took last year, when he went in July with a deputation to the Foreign Office to see Lord Derby, and when, as the House was well aware, Lord Derby made an important declaration with regard to the state of foreign affairs which then existed, and, amongst other subjects, went minutely into the question of the Berlin Memorandum. That declaration having been made, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham very kindly said to Lord Derby—

"I think I shall only express the common and unanimous feeling of the gentlemen present by saying to Lord Derby that we are greatly obliged to him for the manner in which he has received the deputation, and that we have been greatly interested in the speech he has been kind enough to deliver to us. My own impression is that it will have a very salutary effect in all parts of the country. At this moment there is, other circumstances adding, from the political position, a great gloom over almost all the industrial and commercial interests of the country. It is impossible to say how much is due to one cause and how much to another; but no doubt the whole is greatly aggravated by the threatened war. I think the speech we have heard will have some influence in removing some of that gloom and in dispersing some of the clouds which are now hanging over us, and I think I may say that the speech Lord Derby has delivered to us is one calculated to give satisfaction to the country as it gives satisfaction to us, and we feel greatly indebted to him for it."

He quoted this not for the purpose of alleging any inconsistency on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, but in order to show how fully he had trusted the Government, and how thoroughly his views coincided with those of his departed Friend (Mr. Cobden), who told the House that he never gave a vote with more sorrow than he gave the vote which called Lord Aberdeen and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) into office, because he considered that event the cause of the Crimean War. It had been described by a graphic pen. [Mr. GLADSTONE: When did Mr. Cobden say that?] He was quite certain he had read it in Hansard. He was sorry he had not the extract, but pledged himself to produce it to the right hon. Gentleman in a very short time. So much for the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham. Mr. Carlyle, whom he was going to quote, described the circumstances that led to the Crimean War as "the greatest mass of stupidity, mismanagement, and folly which this country ever knew." He was sorry to see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) was not in his place, because in the course of his speech the other evening that right hon. Gentleman alluded to the Berlin Memorandum, and said that it seemed to him to be the turning point in the question; that it contained all the principles upon which a settlement could possibly be effected; and that we had refused to assent to it on the ground of a merely technical objection. The House would recollect that the right hon. Gentleman humorously spoke of some hon. Members of the House as having drunk the wrong beer; but he (Mr. Bourke) thought the right hon. Gentleman must have drunk of the Water of Lethe since he delivered his speech at Croydon, for what did the right hon. Gentleman say at Croydon on the 14th of September? He said—

"As for power, look at the power we exhibited lately. Why, three Emperors entered into a league to make a certain regulation with regard to Turkey. They sent it to our Government, and our Government most properly refused to join that league. What was the result? Did they carry it on without us? They did not think fit to consult us before they came to that resolution, and only asked us to assent to it as a matter of courtesy, but when we disapproved it the whole of their proceeding was rendered abortive, and England, I may say, was astonished at the amount of power she so exercised."

What was the opinion of the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman and of certain other Members of Parliament as to the Memorandum? As to the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington), there had never been any doubt of his opinion. The noble Lord had never concealed his view, which was that we ought to have rejected the Memorandum without argument, on the ground that it had been agreed to without consultation with England. And what had Lord Granville said? His Lordship said, as to the Berlin proposals—

"I stated in the House a month ago [on the 30th of July] that I could give no opinion till I had seen the document. After reading that Paper I agree that it would not have been wise to assent to that document."

So much for the opinions entertained by the Colleagues of the right hon. Member for Greenwich on that matter. He did not think it could be maintained, after what he had stated, that the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) with reference to that document were shared in by those Friends with whom he was accustomed to act, at least up to the month of September last. But the fact of the matter was, that there were defects in the Berlin Memorandum which rendered it perfectly impossible for Her Majesty's Government to acquiesce in that Paper. It would have been equally impossible, and it was admitted by Prince Gortchakoff himself, for the Turkish Government to execute all the engagements—such, for instance, as those with regard to building houses—which the Berlin Memorandum would have imposed upon them. What they wanted was that there should be an end to corruption and bad government in Turkey; but they were afraid that the effect of the Berlin Memorandum would have been to remove the responsibility of reform from Turkey, and place it on Europe generally. Even if other parts of the Berlin Memorandum had been deemed admissible, the last paragraph would have made it impossible for Her Majesty's Government to sign it, because it would have bound this country to take more efficacious measures in case those proposals did not succeed. The insurgents would never have laid down their arms; the refugees would never have returned, if they knew that Europe held out to them the hope that if they only went on with the insurrection she would come to their aid. The Government knew very well what efficacious measures meant. From the despatch at page 143 of the Blue Book of last year—[Turkey, No. 3, 1876]—they would see that before they received the Memorandum Lord Augustus Loftus told Her Majesty's Government what Prince Gortchakoff took to be the effect of the Memorandum, and also that he believed the proposal was made with a view to military measures being adopted in case other means did not answer. Therefore, Her Majesty's Government proceeded upon the assumption that the Berlin Memorandum really meant the partition of Turkey. With regard to Servia, he thought no one would accuse Her Majesty's Government of being remiss in their endeavours to put a stop to the war, or of being careless in bringing about a mediation. He did not think, moreover, that anyone would feel that, in the energetic arrangements which went on with regard to peace, Her Majesty's Government did not go to the very utmost in meeting the objections which were made by the Powers to their proposals. He could not help thinking that anyone who read the Papers would see that had it not been for the persistent perseverance of his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs those bases of peace would never have been considered at all. Then, as to the Conference, he need not say that Her Majesty's Government had great difficulty in obtaining the consent of the Powers to the basis on which it was held. Everybody knew that Austria objected strongly, as also did other Powers. However, the Conference met, and, as the House was aware, Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that Turkey had done most foolishly in not accepting the proposals made at the Conference. He did not believe that the acceptance of those proposals would have been a blow either at the integrity or the independence of the Porte. He did not think Lord Salisbury ever used wiser words, or words which could be more substantiated by great writers on

Jurisprudence and International Law than in saying that when they came to talk of the independence of the Porte, it was a comparative term. ["Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.] He did not know whether those cheers were ironical or not; but nobody could suppose after what Turkey had shown of late of two great attributes of independence—the power of making war and the power of making Treaties—that she was not an independent Power. But if she had accepted the proposals of the Conference—even the most stringent ones made by Lord Salisbury—they would not have been a blow at her independence; for they only asked her to give in trust for a time certain attributes of her independence; and if she had done that, he had no doubt she would have laid the foundation for internal peace, would have regained the sympathies of Europe, and would have lost nothing in comparison with what she had lost by misgovernment and through the transactions which had gone on in her States for the past three or four years. And if in after years a Power had attacked her independence and integrity, it would have been opposed by all the Powers at the Conference which had asked Turkey to make that sacrifice. The Conference, however, had failed, and the right hon. Member for Greenwich gave as a reason for its failure that Lord Salisbury had been powerfully counterworked by Sir Henry Elliot, and he also suggested that a party of the noble Lord's Colleagues at home were working in the same direction. There was not one syllable in the Protocols of the Conference which pointed to such a conclusion; and if any person would take the trouble to look through the Blue Book, he would see that Lord Salisbury was throughout the Conference supported in his policy by his Colleagues at home. The right hon. Gentleman and some of his Friends opposite had thought proper to bestow a lavish praise on Lord Salisbury, a praise in which he (Mr. Bourke) heartily concurred; but when they said that someone at home was counterworking against him, and that that was the reason why the Conference failed, he could not but think that they threw the greatest aspersion on Lord Salisbury's character. That alleged counterworking could not have occurred without Lord Salisbury knowing it. Therefore, the assertion came to this—that Lord Salisbury allowed himself to go to Constantinople to be the mere stalking horse of a policy before Europe when he knew that that policy was to receive its death blow from his Colleagues the moment he suggested it. How those who recognized Lord Salisbury's high character as much as he (Mr. Bourke) did could believe that he would have consented to play the part of a puppet in such an extraordinary way, he could not understand. Then, again, the right hon. Gentleman had referred to the communication made to the Porte which drew forth from it expressions of lively gratitude, and seemed to think that that was a dreadful crime on the part of Her Majesty's Government. That was, in truth, a very small circumstance, though a great deal had been made out of it, and he was very sorry to have to allude to it, considering that it had already been disposed of in "another place." It was really only an expression of courtesy made by our Minister at Constantinople when Midhat Pasha became Grand Vizier. It was a most commonplace expression, and had no political significance whatever. The right hon. Gentleman had further alluded to, and seemed to think it a great crime to have sent Mr. Layard to Constantinople. All he could say was, that ever since he had known anything of foreign politics he had always heard of Mr. Layard as a person eminently qualified to fill the position to which he was now sent. He would further add that when the House came to see the Papers relating to what was now going on, they would find that since Mr. Layard had gone to Constantinople he had done very good service to this country. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the sending of the British Fleet to Besika Bay, stating that it had prevented Turkey's enemies from appearing in the field. He (Mr. Bourke) denied that it had had that effect. In the first place, it was perfectly consistent with the position of neutrality which Her Majesty's Government had taken up. Besides, how could the sending of the Fleet to Besika Bay have had the slightest effect upon the provinces of Herzegovina and Bosnia, which at that time were the theatre of war? Then the right hon. Gentleman had said we allowed the lead to slip into other hands.

If that had been the case, it certainly was not the fault of Her Majesty's Government. How could that be made a taunt against the Government? They had done one thing consistently—notwithstanding that Turkey had gone to war with Russia—they had kept England at peace, and had abstained from taking that course which the hon. Member for Liskeard had suggested last evening, and which must have landed this country in war. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that he had reason to believe that the French Government at the time of the Conference did not agree with Her Majesty's Government, and that they thought it was an imprudent thing to have made the declaration that they would not have recourse to war. There was nothing in the Blue Books to warrant that statement; but, on the contrary, there was much to show that the French Government was entirely in accord with them on that subject. On that point, he would only quote the following passage from a letter in The Livre Jaune dated Versailles, November 19, 1876, written by the French Minister for Foreign Affairs to Messieurs de Bourgoing and de Chaudordy at Constantinople:—

“We should only separate ourselves from the other Powers should they wish to support the conclusion at which they have arrived by measures of material coercion, and if they should deem fit to proceed to a military occupation of either of the Provinces whose lot is concerned, or of other points of the Turkish Empire, we could not associate ourselves, even morally, with measures of that nature without departing from the strict neutrality which we have laid down for ourselves, and without the risk of being dragged into complications from which we are determined to remain aloof.”

Her Majesty's Government had never said anything more decisive than that in regard to abstaining from coercive measures, and therefore the right hon. Gentleman was entirely in error in saying it was ever entertained by the French Government that it should resort to coercion. That despatch, in his opinion, furnished a complete answer to the charge of the hon. Member for Liskeard that England had thwarted the other Powers at every step. [Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY inquired what was the date of the despatch.] It was dated Versailles, November 19, 1876. Nor was that the case with regard to France alone, and if England had been so rash as to propose any such step, he believed there was not a Power in Europe who would not have opposed it. Then, again, as to Italy, he found in the Green Book this paragraph—

“At same time, Minister said that the Italian Government were strongly opposed to any military occupation of any portion of the Turkish Empire.”

So that all the Powers of Europe, in fact, were in favour of the policy of Her Majesty's Government on that point. With regard to the Protocol, a short explanation was necessary. Prince Gortchakoff, shortly after the Conference, asked the opinion of Her Majesty's Government upon the state of affairs, but Lord Derby at that moment did not think it wise to write an answer. The wisdom of that course very soon became apparent, for before many days had passed Prince Gortchakoff requested that no answer should be given, as there would be another communication. That other communication was the Protocol, a very onerous and important document. Then came the negotiations which resulted in the signing of the Protocol and the appending thereto of the Declaration by Lord Derby as to the views of England in the matter. He wished to say a few words about that Declaration. The Protocol was, no doubt, put forward in favour of peace; but if England had signed it without making that Declaration, she would have signed a document put before her which might have been used afterwards in the case of war. For that reason it was absolutely necessary for England to take the precaution she did. They were anxious to make sure that a document put forward for one purpose should not be used for another. It was quite clear that the mobilization of the Russian Army greatly impeded the prospect of the reforms which were required of Turkey being carried out, and it was necessary for England to declare that, if demobilization were not carried out, the Protocol would be null and void. To that course Russia did not take the slightest objection. He was not sure, indeed, that it was not suggested by Russia herself. Russia, he believed, said something like this—“We are going to demobilize, but we do not want to say so in the Protocol. You are perfectly welcome to say that if war takes place the Protocol shall have no effect, and be null and void.” A great deal has been said about the last despatch written by Lord Derby. On that point he wished to say that if Her Majesty's Government sincerely differed from the Government of Russia, which was a friendly Power, upon grounds which she had stated in the Protocol, was this country to come to the abject state of being afraid to mention such a subject of difference? He considered that it was absolutely necessary not to preserve silence on that subject. It was not only necessary with regard to the other Powers of Europe, but it was only fair to Russia herself. It would have been grossly unfair to Russia, if Her Majesty's Government had allowed her to go on, and then, perhaps, subsequently to object to the course she had taken. What Her Majesty's Government had done had been done in the most friendly spirit to Russia, and they would have been guilty of the greatest insincerity and laches, not only towards England, but towards Russia and the rest of Europe, if they had refrained from expressing their opinion at that juncture. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Forster) had blamed Her Majesty's Government on the point; but he would ask the right hon. Gentleman what was meant by the Declaration of 1871, where it was declared that no Power could be relieved from the obligations of a Treaty without the consent of the other parties to that Treaty? That was the Magna Charta of the other side of the House, which they always put forward as a great diplomatic triumph. It seemed to him (Mr. Bourke) that, in sending the despatch referred to, Her Majesty's Government were only acting up to that Declaration, if that Declaration had any meaning at all. The great reason why the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had taken the course he had done was the way in which Lord Derby's despatch of the 21st of September last had been treated by the Porte. The right hon. Gentleman had said most truly that Shefket Pasha and others concerned in the atrocities had not only not been punished, but had been promoted. It was unnecessary for him to say anything on that question of the atrocities, as he had spoken as strongly as he could several times on the matter; but when they were asked to make that the main cause of a great future change of policy, he thought the House ought to recollect that there were other circumstances to be considered which ought not to be forgotten. He firmly believed that the demands made in that despatch of the 21st of September would have been acceded to had not the whole Ottoman race been firmly convinced that the Russian Army, which had then been for many months massed upon their frontier, was about to doom them to destruction. It was quite true that the despatch was written in September, and that the Russian Army was not massed on the Turkish frontier till November; but an inquiry was promised in September, and would have been carried out had it not been for the warlike preparations of Russia. Certainly there could be no doubt as to the evil effect of the conviction which possessed the minds of the Mussulman population that the Bulgarian insurrection was instigated and intended for their destruction, and as a justification of pre-determined Russian aggression. In that condition of things it was impossible for the Ottoman Government to deal with the question in the way which he believed they would have wished. However, he did not wish for one moment to excuse the Ottoman Government for what they had done. He believed they had acted foolishly and rashly; but he could not forget that, under the circumstances in which they found themselves for the last six or eight months, it would have been impossible for them, without danger to the Throne of the Sultan, to accede to the demands made upon them. Something had been said about Mr. Canning's policy in regard to Greece 50 years ago. Now, on that subject, he would point out that nothing was more likely to lead to error and bad consequences than to draw an analogy between incorrect parallels, such as between that case and the present. The condition of things in Greece in 1826 and the condition of things in Turkey at the present time were in some respects the same, but in some respects they were also wholly different. They were similar in this respect—that the pacification of Greece was an object of the Government of this country in 1826, and that there was a danger then that Russia would go to war without the concert of the other Powers; but if they looked at the whole course of Mr. Canning's policy, from the Treaty of Verona down to his death, the one principle running through it was his firm determination that nothing should induce him to use force in any shape or way if he could avoid it between the belligerents. When Mr. Stratford Canning, the present Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, went to St. Petersburg in 1824, one of the bases on which he was to proceed in the negotiations was the strictly mediatorial character of the proposed intervention. There was to be a complete disavowal of force. The negotiations broke off because Russia would not agree to that principle. Again, when the Duke of Wellington went to St. Petersburg in February, 1826, the instructions drawn up by Mr. Canning pointed to an abjuration, by all the parties concerned, of any employment of force against either the Turks or the Greeks, and also to an abjuration of any means of aggrandizement. In connection with the Protocol of April and the Treaty of July, 1827, the same principle was observed by Mr. Canning. From the first to the last—from the first intervention of Mr. Canning in the affairs of Greece, till the Treaty was concluded—there was nothing to show that he ever for a moment entertained the idea of this country using force in favour of either belligerent. On the contrary, he never seemed to lose opportunities of abjuring the employment of force. He held in his hand a very important document, and he would like the House to permit him to read a portion of it. It was a subject which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich put great stress upon, and he (Mr. Bourke) wished to state what he believed to be facts in regard to it. It related to the Conference which was held in September, 1825, between Mr. Canning and the Greek Deputies, on which occasion Mr. Canning told them—

“That their sanguine and enthusiastic friends, who suggested to them the supposed facility with which England, by her interference, might bring the struggle in which the Greeks are engaged to a favourable termination, deceived either the Greeks or themselves. They reasoned as if upon the assumption that the contest between Turkey and Greece was not only the only contest now existing, but would continue to be the only contest in the world after England had joined in it; and that it would have to be fought out by the Ottoman Porte, on the one side, and Greece, with England as her protectress and ally, on the other. They forgot that there existed between England and Turkey Treaties of very ancient date, and of uninterrupted obligation, which the Turks faithfully observed, and to the protection of which British interests of a vast amount were and are confided within the dominions of Turkey; and that all these interests must at once be put in jeopardy, and the obligation of the Treaties which protect them be at once advisedly broken by the first blow which Great Britain should strike, as the ally of Greece, in hostility to Turkey.”

Surely nothing could be much stronger than that. Mr. Canning went on to say that if the course recommended by the Greek Deputies was followed, the result would be that—“Every Power from henceforth would pursue its separate interests, without regard to previous connection or obligation. The war would spread to the West as well as to the East; it would soon become general throughout Europe; and long before its conclusion, whenever that might arrive, the separate interest of Greece, though the main cause of the contest, would be forgotten in the general confusion.

He might go on reading other portions of that important document, but would not trespass further on the time of the House. He was quite prepared to furnish a copy of it to the right hon. Member for Greenwich, if he wished it. [Mr. GLADSTONE: What is it?] The Memorandum of the Conference he had referred to. He felt certain that if the right hon. Gentleman traced the whole of the proceedings of Mr. Canning with reference to Turkey, from the Declaration of 1822 down to his death, he would not find a single word which justified the opinion that Mr. Canning ever for a moment contemplated the use of force. Then with regard to the Instructions which led to the battle of Navarino, he might remark that in the Treaty of July, 1827, there was not one word said about force. All that the Powers said was that they would concert measures, and Instructions were given to the Admirals, after Mr. Canning's death, to the effect that they were not to interfere between the contending forces. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to imply that the Duke of Wellington did not follow out the policy of Mr. Canning; but there was reason to think that if Mr. Canning had lived, he would have agreed with the Duke of Wellington in characterizing the Battle of Navarino as an “untoward event.” With regard to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, he would only submit further that it was absolutely necessary for the safety of the country that the Government should not be bound; but that they should be free to take the course which, as events proceeded, was best adapted for securing the honour and welfare of the people. If he had possessed anything like the eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman—most unaffectedly he said it—and if he could appeal to him with any hope of success, he would have sought even at that moment to impress upon him that, above and before all things, it was important in the present emergency, for the sake not only of this country, but of the world, to show Europe and the world that we were a united people. In particular was it needful that Parliament should show that it was not divided. He was afraid that that was too much to hope for, and that the attempt to persuade the right hon. Gentleman of that necessity would have been a hopeless task; but, at all events, he was certain that if anything happened which made it necessary for Her Majesty's Government to appeal to the confidence of the House of Commons in connection with this subject, that appeal, notwithstanding the strictures of the right hon. Gentleman, would not be addressed in vain.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER: I shall advert in a few moments to some of the remarks made by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; but before I do so I would advert more particularly to the position in which we on this side find ourselves in regard to the Resolutions moved by my right hon. Friend. I am one of those Members of the House who had no difficulty, as soon as I heard these Resolutions were put on the Table, in making up my mind that I would vote not only for one or two of the Resolutions, but for all the Resolutions, and not only for all the Resolutions, but for all exactly as moved by my right hon. Friend. I am not going to say that I do not think the proposed Amendment to the second Resolution is an improvement. But that by the way. It is impossible to conceal from ourselves that we have received a severe handling from the other side because of what happened on Monday last, when the right hon. Gentleman altered the second Resolution, and said he was not going to put two of the others at all. I think the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council (Viscount Sandon) was rash enough to say that the right hon. Gentleman's courage had failed him at the last moment. My experience of the right hon. Gentleman's courage is not such as would seem to corroborate the remark of the noble Lord. The hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) described his policy as that of "childish vacillation." I do not think that my experience of my right hon. Friend will bear out that remark. Various other things were said, and I regret that something was said by the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) in his able speech yesterday afternoon, when he used the remarkable expression that the action of the right hon. Gentleman was such as to make scoffers rejoice. I do not think I am a scoffer, but I certainly rejoiced, because it appeared to me that the transactions of Monday last were of an extremely simple nature, and I do not know why the hon. Gentleman should object to the course taken by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone). My right hon. Friend moved his Resolutions as an independent Member of Parliament. He had not consulted his Colleagues, but when these Resolutions were tabled my right hon. Friend found that certain alterations would enable a large number of his Colleagues and other hon. Members below the Gangway on the same side of the House to vote for his Resolutions. Was he to be blamed, because he so amended his Resolutions as to enable them to vote with him? It is what you all do every day—hon. Gentlemen on the other side, perhaps, not on so large a scale, but we all do it on a small scale. If Amendments to Resolutions before the House enable us to gain a large amount of support, we amend our Resolutions, and we do not think we have done anything to disturb the confidence of those who vote for us. Therefore, that my right hon. Friend should be blamed for amending his Resolutions to enable his Colleagues to support him, I cannot for a moment understand. Now, we come to what they are. The first and second are the only ones actually before the House. My hon. Friend who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Bourke) has spoken of the Resolutions as a whole, and has said they must be taken as a whole. I am quite willing to take the position laid down by the hon. Gentleman, and to take the Resolutions as a whole, and I will admit, for the satisfaction of my right hon. Friend, that although the terms of the Resolutions have been removed, the mind and soul of the Resolutions yet remain. Had the mind and soul not remained, my right hon. Friend never could have spoken his magnificent speech. Had they not remained, we should never have been able to give him the support we do. The whole country would not have been able to afford him that cordial support which we believe he has received. We are asked to say that this House finds just cause of dissatisfaction with the conduct of the Ottoman Porte in relation to Lord Derby's despatch. I think we may at least claim the vote of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State, who very justly stated in his speech that he could not defend the action of the Ottoman Porte for the way in which it had received Lord Derby's despatch. It is quite true the hon. Gentleman took a strong line of defence of the Porte. He maintained that the whole of the Moslem inhabitants of these Provinces looked upon the rising as intended for their entire destruction, and on that account it was impossible for the Sultan to bring the offenders to justice. And the hon. Gentleman excused the Sultan for not having done that. Now, it is remarkable that Lord Derby, in that very despatch, made a remark upon that very point, and it does much to dispose of the entire point raised by the Under Secretary of State. In paragraph 4 of the despatch, Lord Derby says—

"Moreover, it is conclusively shown that not only was the most culpable apathy displayed by the great majority of the Provincial authorities in allowing or conniving at such excesses, but that little or nothing effectual has been done in the way of reparation. While 1,956 Bulgarians were arrested for complicity in an insurrectionary movement which was at no time of a dangerous character, only a score or so of the murderers of unarmed men, women, and children have been punished."—[Turkey, No. 1, 1877, p. 237.]

Then my hon. Friend (Mr. Bourke) excuses the conduct of the Porte because the Moslems believed they were to be driven out. The Under Secretary of State has no other excuse for the Porte, and he must concede that he is bound, from the tenor of his speech, to vote for the first Resolution of my right hon. Friend. I may refer to one or two other remarks on the subject of coercion. As far as I understand, the remarks on that subject amount to this—My right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) did not recommend coercion by England alone. He did not even mean coercion by England and Russia together. What he desired to advocate was that what is required should be obtained by the whole of the European Powers. This is a very different thing. If the whole of the Powers unite in demanding or exacting from the Porte a certain course of proceedings, then, in the very nature of the case, the Porte must yield. What I desire for a moment or two to do is to comment on some of the speeches that have been made, and especially on that remarkable speech the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) delivered to us on Thursday afternoon. The remarks of the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire also (Colonel Loyd-Lindsay) and all the hon. Members on that side have been based on undisguised hostility to Russia. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Lincolnshire said Russia meant war all along. ["Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Benches.] I am much obliged to hon. Members on that side, who exactly confirm what I said as respects hon. Members below the Gangway at least.

MR. CHAPLIN: Perhaps you will allow me to say that what I said was it was generally said from what we know now that Russia had apparently meant to go to war.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER: I am glad to accept the correction of my hon. Friend, but I think his opinion can be gathered from another source. About a fortnight ago he made a brilliant speech at the Middlesex Conservative Working Men's Association, and in the course of that speech he said—

"If war arose, it would be due to the settled, deliberate, and determined policy of Russia, and to the criminal recklessness of those who last autumn so utterly misled her as to the true feeling of this country."

Was that a true statement of the case? I will concede at once that I have no more desire to see Russia mistress of Constantinople, in possession of the Suez Canal, and erecting a second Sebastopol on the Persian Gulf, than hon. Members opposite have. It appears to me that, either from prejudice or other causes, some hon. Members have not been able to take an unprejudiced view in that respect. I see the noble Lord the Member for South Northumberland (Lord Eslington) in his place, from whom we are accustomed to hear safe and wise counsels. In his speech last Tuesday he said that he would not believe one word of one promise made either by the Emperor or the Russian Government in the matter. I do not think that was a statesmanlike expression. I do not think you can suppose that people outside, and certainly not people abroad, will imagine that you are arguing this question in a calm and dispassionate manner when you say that you will not believe one single word of the promises made by Russia in this matter. I have looked through all the documents laid on the Table of the House in relation to this question. I will not trespass on the House, but I will say there is no evidence in the Blue Book of any desire of Russia from the first to go to war. On the contrary, if we take the evidence in the Book, there is much evidence to the contrary. From the very first, Russia has desired to act in concert with the Powers. I do not think there is any difficulty at all in showing that. As long ago as the 13th of November she declared, through Lord Augustus Loftus, to the Earl of Derby, that above all things the desire of Russia was to act in co-operation and concert with England. [Laughter.] Of course, it cannot convince hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House who do not believe one word of what Russia has said. I do not think that Russia showed in the Andrassy Note, in the Berlin Memorandum, and at the Conference, that she was not acting in concert with other Powers. In the Conference, she went with Lord Salisbury to such an extent that at last a report was spread abroad that she was not capable of going to war, that her armies were incapable of marching, that she had no men and no horses. All this showed her sincere desire to act only in concert with the Powers. All the proposals of the Powers were rejected, all the proposals of the Conference failed, and Russia acts by herself. Is she to be blamed for acting by herself? I ask the House to consider her position in regard to the Slav population. There are in all 100,000,000 Slavs. ["No, no!"] At page 646 of No. 1 of the Blue Books there is a letter from Lord Augustus Loftus to Lord Derby, dated the 4th November, where he speaks of a conversation with a Russian nobleman of high rank and position, well-known for his admiration of England and all things English, and most anxious to maintain a good understanding between England and Russia. His opinion is that the Eastern Question was viewed throughout the nation, from the highest to the lowest, as one of religion and humanity, and that the feeling of the Christian Slavs was so powerful that the Emperor could not risk any opposition. No financial or any other consideration could turn them from the policy they believed to be their duty, and that of the 100,000,000 of the Slavonic race who were determined to liberate their Christian brethren, from the yoke of the Mussulman. Well, I do not think it at all wonderful that the Slavs in Russia should desire to free the Slavs of the Provinces from the yoke under which they groaned. I consider every man in this House desires to see them released from the tyranny of those who rule over them. That being so, I cannot conceive that Russia is to blame in acting on the instincts of her people, who desire to relieve the Slavs from the Turkish yoke. Now, I am perfectly well aware that my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), sitting opposite, is prepared not only not to sympathize with her in the relief of the Christian Provinces from the yoke of the Mussulman, but he has further put an Amendment on the Paper in which he desires to take the opinion of the House upon this matter, and he proposes to move—

"That this House, while anxious to promote the well-being of the Christian subjects of the Sultan, and of all races under his rule, condemns the interference of a Foreign Power by force of arms in the internal administration of the Ottoman Empire."

Well, Sir, if you are not to interfere by force of arms, how are you to interfere at all? And now we come to the question of my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Courtney)—the question of coercion. I admit that I could not follow my hon. Friend in his argument where he spoke of the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire. I think he carried his argument too far, and I think he would not in that proposal find a large amount of support in this House. But it does appear to me that if you are to do anything at all, and not to rest satisfied with the position in which Her Majesty's Government are, you must be prepared to take a more active and decided line than you have up to the present time adopted. There is no use in trying to blink the matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Liskeard has been taunted because he complained that the Government have pursued a policy of inaction instead of action. What has been the result of their policy? It has been said that the true policy of the Government is to maintain the integrity and independence of Turkey. But have they done so? They have not. It has been said, too, that their policy is to maintain the peace of the world. They have failed in doing so; but the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State has said that if they have so failed, they have at least maintained the peace of the British Empire. The hon. Gentleman has taken credit to the Government for that; but that was not the programme with which the Government originally set out. The object they had in view was to secure the good government of Bulgaria and the other Provinces, and in that they have failed too. Now, ought they to have adopted any other course? This I believe—that if we are to come to any satisfactory conclusion, it will be necessary to arrive at a distinct and settled policy; and it appears to me that it ought to have been adopted at the time when Russia proposed an occupation of the Provinces. Prince Gortchakoff said that he believed those measures would avert war, and would ensure the better treatment of the Christians in Turkey. I think, Sir, we may rely upon this—that the Eastern Question cannot be settled without England; and the result of the policy which has been pursued by Her Majesty's Government is this—that the Power which is denounced from the other side as being all that is bad has been put by England into a commanding position from which you will hardly be able to move her. If Russia be all that hon. Gentlemen on the other side says she is, why have you allowed her to stand before the world as the only country that would make the smallest sacrifices in the interest of the Christians? Why is she in this position of protection, which you might have assumed if you had been so minded? You have by your own act put her into a position in which she has an immense advantage over you, if she desires to use it; and you will find that if she once makes her footing good in the Provinces, and you go to war with her, as some people wish you to do, you will find it exceedingly difficult to get her out of the Provinces; whereas, had you acted in friendly concert with her from the first, you would have been able to share with her all the benefits she would derive from the sympathy of the Slav races, of which she is the only friend, and you would have been able at once, if you found she was going beyond the bounds she ought to go, to say—"I have been acting in concert with you; I have gone with you; and I am prepared to go with you so long as you fight for the protection of the Christian subjects of the Porte only; but the moment you go beyond that, I am no longer with you, and I am prepared, if need be, to resist you." ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, it appears to me that, sooner or later, we shall have to intervene in some shape or other. ["No, no!"] If any hon. Member has any doubt on that subject he has only to read the despatch of Mr. Jocelyn, Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople, which was published on Saturday last. If what is stated in that despatch is correct, it will be impossible for this country to remain inactive, even if it was desirable. He says—

"There is no doubt that the present situation is an extremely critical one, and the country torn asunder by the efforts made in so many different directions under the factions I have named, is drifting to a crisis which cannot long be delayed. A few weeks may suffice to determine its character, and it is the opinion of all serious politicians here that the part intended to be played by Europe in dealing with this country should, in order to be effective, be at once declared."—[Turkey, No. 15 (1877), p. 250.]

There can be no doubt that the present situation is one of extreme difficulty; that the country is divided by factions; and that a crisis is fast coming and cannot be delayed. If the view I take of the position is correct, Great Britain cannot merely stand aside. I have heard it is desired even now that this country might join with other countries in bringing this war to a close, and I saw in The Times of yesterday an answer which was proposed to be sent to Lord Derby's reply to the Russian Circular, and from which I gather that even now the Russian Government is willing to co-operate with our Government and other Governments in bringing this war to an end, and securing the objects she has at heart. ["No, no!"] It may very well be that my views are wrong views. But they are my own, and I have to thank hon. Gentlemen on the other side for the courtesy with which they have received them. I also thank most heartily my right hon. Friend for bringing these Resolutions before the House, and obtaining an expression of feeling from the House which will do more, I believe, to bring about a satisfactory solution of the matter than anything else.

LORD ELCHO: My hon. Friend who has just sat down (Sir Robert Anstruther) has expressed his astonishment that objections should have been raised on this side of the House to the action which was taken on Monday last in reference to the original Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. He said that course was a very simple one, and it was an arrangement approved of and come to by the different Members on that side of the House as to what they thought best. For my part I confess that, looking solely to the interests of the country, and having regard to the course taken by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, I sympathize with the opinion so eloquently expressed by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan), when he said that at the present time, in the midst of events which might lead to such serious complications—as to which no man could foretell what the results would be—it was most desirable that the opinion and determination of England, which Europe is anxiously looking for, should be plainly and unmistakeably expressed as to what action she thought ought to be taken in this Eastern crisis. I think, with the hon. Member for Louth, it is greatly to be regretted that these Resolutions have, in the interest of a Party, not in the interest of the country, been altered, and partly withdrawn, their spirit, however, still remaining. If this had been done to prevent the position of England being misapprehended, I could have understood it; but what are we to say when we find that the object sought is simply to prevent further disorganization of the Liberal Party? Let us, then, hope that, whatever the result may be to the nation, the Liberal Party will not be further split up on this occasion; and that, at the end of this transformation scene, we may see the pleasing tableau of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich lying down in peace with the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, and the junior Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), while the senior Member (Mr. Bright) gives them his blessing. Such may possibly be the result upon the Party; but, as regards the question of coercion, have you succeeded in shirking it? Though the Opposition has tried to evade the question, they have practically failed to do so. I venture to think the course that has been pursued shows very clearly that the House of Commons as a whole would not entertain the project of coercion by force of arms. This is the feeling of the country as a whole; of this side of the House with one or two exceptions, and of the majority of those on the other side of the House. ["No, no!"] I repeat that, taken as a whole, the feeling of the Opposition is against coercion, and thus upon this point a large majority of this House will support the Government in the policy which it has adopted. The chief doubt that up to last Monday night existed in the minds of European statesmen was as to the attitude likely to be adopted by the English Liberals in regard to that particular branch of the question. That doubt was at once dissipated by the fact that the particular Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich which embodied the principle of coercion, and also another proposal to the same effect, were withdrawn at the instance of a majority of the Members sitting on the Opposition Benches. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members may dissent from what I am saying, but I simply express an opinion founded upon fact; and I venture to say further that the right hon. Gentleman was forced to abandon the coercive part of his own proposals and to minimize the remainder into something which it is not easy to understand. Indeed, I do not yet know whether we have reached the "irreducible minimum." As a whole, then, the House of Commons opposes the idea of coercion, and in so far they disapprove of the action of Russia. The Resolutions now before the House are but a small portion of the great question which was raised by the proposals as originally drawn. As a whole, they state a fact, and indicate a policy, the fact being that certain atrocities have been committed and that they remain unpunished, while the policy indicated is a policy of guarantees. I will not attempt to palliate the conduct of the Turkish Government in allowing the persons who instigated or committed the atrocities to go free; but I would ask the House to place itself, when considering a question of the kind, in the position of the Government affected. In the first place, you know how these outrages were exaggerated — [“No, no!”] — not in quality, but in number they were exaggerated. At the outset, it was said that 60,000 persons had been killed or deported; Mr. Baring subsequently put down the number at 12,000; but within the last few days the chief agent of the Bulgarian Relief Fund (Mr. Storey), who has lived much in the country, has stated that the number of persons, including Turks, killed in the course of the insurrection does not exceed 4,000. This is further confirmed by a letter which has been published from Mr. Hamlin, an American gentleman, who has resided in Constantinople for many years. Then, further, let it be remembered that if savage agents were employed in suppressing the insurrection, in deference to whose advice was that? In pursuance of the advice of General Ignatieff, who said that the outbreak was trifling and local—not worth the serious importance that would be given to it were Regular troops sent to deal with it, and that the Bashi Bazouks would be sufficient to cope with it. The means adopted may have been cruel; but do you think the Government of Turkey could afford to be very nice about the means of suppressing a rebellion which they thought might spread, especially when an alarming attack was made by a Circassian upon the Cabinet. Depend upon it, you will find every nation cruel in the use of means when it is frightened by having what it deems a great danger to confront, and that in its straits it will use whatever means are ready to its hands. The course taken by the English Government in regard to the insurrection in Jamaica and in India not very long ago are cases in point. In judging of the conduct of the Turkish Government as regards the non-punishment of those who have been condemned capitally, we must remember the state of public feeling in that country. The men who suppressed the insurrection were regarded by the Mahomedan population as having deserved well of their country, and the Government could not altogether overlook that feeling. Further, supposing it to have been easy to have confronted Mahomedan public opinion at the time by punishing the men who put down the rising, and to have executed Shefket Pasha, yet when the Conference was sitting, and our demand was made, somehow the Turks regarded its assembling as a proof that England was turning against them, and they felt that no good would come of attempts to conciliate English feeling at the risk of exciting Mahomedan hostility. The primary sentence passed upon Shefket Pasha has not, it is true, been carried out, but the secondary punishment has been imposed, and he has been banished to Bagdad. [Laughter from the Opposition.] That seems to excite the risible faculties of hon. Gentlemen opposite; but I can assure them it is no laughing matter for them or anybody else who goes there, for the plague at this moment is raging at Bagdad, and there is thus every hope for those who are thirsting for his blood, that in this indirect way the primary sentence of the punishment of death will be carried out. I do not wish to defend the action of the Turkish Government—in fact, I think that it would perhaps have been wise to execute the sentences passed in the first instance; but I ask the House as fair, straightforward Englishmen to consider what may be said on the other side of the question. So much for the first Resolution. The second involves questions of guarantees, and also involves a sort of negative policy of non-assistance, moral or material, to the Ottoman Porte. But this Resolution must be read in connection with the others; and I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman who has brought the Resolutions forward wishes, in reference to the revolted Provinces, to see guarantees established in the form of new Servias and Roumanias, or whether he would prefer a second Greece created by means of a second Navarino? The whole of this movement turns on the form in which guarantees are to be given, and on the mode of obtaining them. As regards the latter point, Her Majesty's Government are urged to adopt a variety of methods which hinge upon remuneration and moral pressure to military occupation and reform. I do not say that Her Majesty's Government have been at fault in the manner in which they have sought to obtain guarantees from the Porte: but I think they have been somewhat inconsistent in the view they took of the nature of the guarantees to be required. If hon. Members will look through the Blue Books they will find that up to the time of the Conference all the guarantees which were to be obtained from Turkey were to be guarantees granted of her own free will—guarantees the result of and contained in the measures of reform which Turkey herself promised. At the Conference, however, the scene so far changed that the guarantees to be demanded were to be external to Turkish reforms, and were to be forced upon Turkey by the moral pressure of united Europe. They took the form of the nomination of the Governors of Provinces and of the appointment of a Commission by Europe, to see that the proposed reforms were carried into effect. These guarantees Turkey naturally refused, and it has been said that the Government had counterworked Lord Salisbury. But so far from this being the case, Lord Salisbury and those who went out with him from the Foreign Office were entirely ignorant of the character of the Turkish mind and of the feelings and the sentiments of that country; they disregarded altogether the warnings of those who were acquainted with the position of affairs at the Porte, and who pointed out that Turkey would not accept these conditions, and therefore that it was needless to propose guarantees which would trench on their independence and authority. If there has, however, been any inconsistency in the conduct of the Government upon the question, there is much justification for it, and their difficulties have not been lessened by the meetings out-of-doors, by the pamphlets and letters that have been published, and of which we have heard so much, or even by the speeches which have been delivered in this House. The Members of the Government had had a very difficult task before them to bring matters to a satisfactory settlement and to maintain peace when the interests of European States were as divergent as they were. I recollect an anecdote of the old working man at the office that a coachman was a complacent regarding his driving by saying—"Ah, it is all very well for you to talk: but did you ever drive three blind horses and a butcher?" I believe that the difficulty of accomplishing such a feat is nothing as compared with that which Lord Derby has had to accomplish in trying to persuade the Powers of Europe to unite upon this question. I believe that Russia has intentionally embroiled in the different propositions made to Turkey, matters to which she knew it would be impossible for the latter to assent, and that she has used the Protocol, as has been well said by the House Secretary, as a pistol to present at the head of the Porte, and that she has done so with the purpose of bringing on war. I know a gentleman who is thoroughly acquainted with the Russian Army, who months ago told me almost to a day when war would be declared, and my relative, Lord Lucan, who served with the Russians in 1828, and in the Crimean War, and is familiar with the character of the country to be traversed, told the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs last October that there was no occasion for fear that war would break out during the winter, because it was impossible for the French to move, and that, therefore, we were perfectly safe until the month of April. And accordingly, in the month of April war has been duly declared. Therefore, everything goes to show that these negotiations were so many flies, thrown out to amuse this country and Europe until the roads became firm and the proper season for war had arrived. As regards the general conduct of the Government upon the question, it has been well described by a Whig statesman, Lord Portman, who said, after the Conference, that his impression was that Her Majesty's Government had, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, conducted the foreign affairs of this country as well as must, and better than some. Who the "some" are I leave it to right hon. Gentlemen opposite to ascertain from Lord Portman. I, however, go beyond that, and assert that Her Majesty's Government, especially in the recent despatch of Lord Derby, have shown a due regard for the interests of this country, and have given fair, bold, and outspoken expressions to the feelings of the English people upon this vital question. Reverting to the proposals of the right hon. Member for Greenwich, what he asks in his original Resolutions is a guarantee of autonomy for the disturbed Provinces of Turkey; but it appears to me that the autonomy thus desired is neither practicable nor desirable. Mr. Lawrence Oliphant, who was formerly Member for the Stirling Burghs, and well-known in this House, has an article in The North American Review, in which he says that there are 11 races and 11 religions in Bulgaria; that they hate each other most heartily; that the members of the different Christian sects are united only in one thing, and that is not in resisting the oppression of the Turks, but in the persecution of the Jews. These are the people you have to deal with, and if you want to test what Mr. Oliphant has said as to the state of Christian and Mahomedan feeling, you have only to refer to what took place at Constantinople at the close of the Conference. When General Ignatieff left Constantinople there was no address presented to him from the Christians of Turkey; but there was one to Sir Henry Elliot. In the popular Chamber, too, you have Christians voting against the interposition of Russia. As regarded the practicability of autonomy, even assuming that these different sects can be brought to unite for the purposes of autonomy, where does the right hon. Gentleman propose to draw his geographical line? Will he draw it North of the Balkans? If he does so, he will leave out the district which has suffered more than any other. Will he draw it South of the Balkans? If he does so, he will have the Greek element threatening war, as you will find from the address from the Greek community of Philippopolis presented to Lord Derby, in which they say that any delineation which placed their Province under Bulgarian administration, would provoke a new civil war between Greeks and Bulgarians. As regards Greece, it is a favourite dream with some politicians that she will yet acquire Constantinople; but this is the one thing which Russia has over and over again said she could never assent to. This was announced both to Lord Heytesbury and to Sir Hamilton Seymour by the Emperors Alexander and Nicholas. But the autonomy which the right hon. Gentleman desires is as undesirable as it is impracticable; for it is to be remembered that by the recent Constitution of Turkey, an autonomy has already been established of the widest kind—not an autonomy applicable to a Christian sect in a particular part of the Empire, but an autonomy extending throughout the whole Empire. Yet that is the sort of autonomy at which some Liberal Members sneer. [“Hear, hear!”] Yes, astounding as the fact may be, we find the Liberals sneering at this great gift of a Constitution granted by the Sultan to his subjects, such as the Emperor of Russia dare not dream of in his own dominions. I think we may pass by the sneers of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich—[Mr. GLADSTONE: Lord Salisbury.] I dispute Lord Salisbury’s authority upon this point, for I ventured to point out that if Lord Salisbury had taken the advice of those who knew the Turk, we should not have been landed in our present difficulty. But let us see what an authority whom the right hon. Gentleman will respect says about the matter. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, to whom the right hon. Gentleman dedicated his pamphlet—I believe he did so without his previous knowledge, and that when the noble Lord read it, he was surprised at its contents—speaks of the Turkish Constitution as a thing of undoubted and almost unbounded liberality. “The reforms were adopted,” his Lordship says, “under strong pressure from without;” and he adds—“Give them a fair trial, and it will turn out a reality.” A fair trial! This was all that Lord Derby and the Powers asked in the last Protocol. I will therefore set the sneer of the right hon. Gentleman and other extreme Liberals in the House—such as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands)—against the words of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. We have been asked to force either autonomy or guarantees upon Turkey; but I venture to think, if you once embark in the policy of interference in the internal affairs of other States, you will simply land yourselves in chaos. It is a most dangerous principle, and not to be thought of. People only talk about such interference when a country is weak, and they would not think of applying the principle to America. Moreover, in the present instance it appears that those who advocate interference would rather some one else did it, instead of doing it themselves. The Crusaders of old went out themselves, and those who preached the Crusade accompanied them. Thus, in old days 60,000 Englishmen went to the Crusades, but our modern Crusaders stay at home and urge others to do their work for them, thus proving their faith in the great doctrine of vicarious sacrifice. I protest against such a method of crusading. It is said, however, that Turkey is a special case, and that the right of interference is based on the Treaty of Kainardji. I hold in my hand, however, a document drawn up by an able diplomatist—not Sir Henry Elliot—who is thoroughly conversant with Turkish affairs, and who clearly points out that a falsehood which ought to be exploded is the old one that by the Treaty of Kainardji Russia had a right to interfere in the internal administration of the Turkish Empire; and that all it did was simply to give her power of interference so far as regarded the form and toleration of the worship in the churches. Now, nobody contends that the rights of free worship have not been enjoyed by the Christian populations of the Ottoman Empire. The only thing that can by any possibility be construed into restriction in that respect is that they have not been allowed to ring their chapel bells. But as to that, within my own recollection, the Scottish Presbyterians were not permitted to ring bells in London, and a similar prohibition was applied to those who worshipped according to the Episcopal form in Scotland. It may, however, be fairly assumed that if Turkey is let alone, in due time civilization will have so far advanced, under the new Constitution, that the use of bells will be allowed there, and, in any case, the prohibition cannot now be looked upon as an intolerable grievance. Then it may be said that there are special grounds for interference in Turkey, and that we undertook the Crimean War for the sake of Turkey. No doubt, you have interfered there. You have not done so, however, for the sake of the Turks themselves, but for the sake of yourselves and the rest of Europe. You have unquestionably conferred benefit on Turkey and kept her alive; but that does not now give you the right to interfere in her internal affairs. Such a contention would be absurd, for if the fact of your having done something for the advantage of a country gave you a future right to interfere in her internal affairs, Spain, Italy, Sicily, and Belgium, and France also, in short, wherever a British Army has been, would come under your influence. Turkey is, no doubt, in a special position, in regard to the rest of Europe being guaranteed by Treaties; but that special position is no argument for coercion; on the contrary, it is entirely against it. So far from interference with Turkey being justified by Treaty, it is all the other way; she possesses a Treaty which distinctly guarantees her independence, and provides that, in the event of difficulties arising, they shall be settled by concerted action on the part of the great European Powers. If hon. Gentlemen opposite, under the guidance of so brilliant a Leader as the right hon. Gentleman, once embark upon a policy of interference with the internal affairs of other States and of refusing to execute guarantees which they have given, and of twisting them to purposes they were not intended for, we shall be landed in a quagmire of dangers and inconsistencies from which it will be difficult to extricate ourselves. We should, moreover, endeavour to realize the position in which Turkey is placed, and appreciate the difficulties of her situation. Do not let it be imagined that in defending Turkey I am defending Turkish misdeeds, or that my humanity is not as great as that of hon. Gentlemen opposite; but my feelings of humanity are not confined to the Christian inhabitants of Turkey, they extend to other people, and to other parts of the world where acts of injustice are perpetrated. Let us, then, see what is the character of the much abused Turk? He has been described as anti-human, as "the only anti-human specimen of humanity," and it is said that he is unspeakable; but this is not the opinion of those who have come in contact with him and who know him. On that point I wish to quote the authority of my hon. Friend the Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs (Sir George Campbell), who has had much experience of Mahomedans in India, and who has, moreover, a well-regulated, well-disciplined mind, as in his Handy Book on the Eastern Question, from which I am about to quote, he says at its commencement that he agrees with every word in the speech of the Duke of Argyll. It is a case of "God Bless the Duke of Argyll." Well, he says, "there is a deal of good in the religion of the Turks;" that "our ideas regarding it are terribly coloured by ancient prejudices;" that "it is derived in a great measure from the same sources from which Protestantism eventually spring;" that "their religion affects their manners and daily life, perhaps more than does that of most Christians;" that "they worship God in a very earnest way"; and "that in the matter of sobriety alone, they have an enormous advantage over modern quasi-Christians." What the Permissive Bill may now effect the Mahomedan religion does effect; that many practical virtues are enforced by their religion in a high degree; that their prayerfulness and active belief in God much exceeds the easy-going religion so common among us. [Cries of "Question!"] I am speaking to the Question, because the policy of hon. Gentlemen opposite is very much influenced by the opinion which they entertain of the Turkish character, of which, perhaps, they have very little knowledge, except what they obtain from the columns of The Daily News. The high authority from which I am quoting goes on to say, that "it is, in a great measure, a mistake to represent the Mahomedans as fanatical;" that "it provokes him to hear people who ought to know better talk of this terrible Mahomedanism;" that "their supposed craving for Christian blood is a mere myth;" that "the freedom of religious belief and worship in many Mahomedan countries may be compared with the intolerance of many Christian countries;" that "the Moguls in India and the Turks in Europe exhibited the perfection of religious toleration." Can as much as that, I ask, with justice be said of the Russians? I do not wish to enter into the subject of Russian toleration; but, if I do, I may quote the testimony of Lord Shaftesbury in 1853, and our own Consuls in 1874, to show what is to be expected from it. It is well described in a pamphlet which has been put into my hand by Sir Patrick Colquhoun, in which it is asked what we should think if Dissenters of various denominations were driven between a line of policemen and riflemen to a church belonging to the Establishment, and there, with the gentle assistance of the sabre and the bayonet, forced to sign the abjuration of their faith, a sort of thing which occurs not unfrequently in Russia in the case of unorthodox Christians. But the subject of Russian intolerance is one upon which it is unnecessary to dwell, and I will pass for a moment to the present position of Turkey. If there is any disposition on the part of Turkey to be savage and fanatical, it should be remembered that she now finds herself face to face with her hereditary enemy, and that this result has been brought about by a system of intrigue on the part of Russia from first to last. That that is so is amply proved by the Reports of Consul Holmes and other evidence embodied in the Blue Book, and in referring to the subject I may be allowed to quote from the hon. Member for Poole's interesting Life of Lord Palmerston to show that that policy on the part of Russia is nothing new. Lord Palmerston, in reference to the Polish Insurrection, writing to Baron Brunnow, said—

Lord Elcho

"I am very sorry for you, but it serves you perfectly right for what you have been doing in Servia and the Turkish Provinces. Did you not send out agents provocateurs to stir up insurrection? Have you not imported into Servia and the Turkish Provinces, not by the high road, but through by-ways and mountain passes, 90,000 stand of arms?"

That is the opinion of Lord Palmerston as to the action of Russia at that time, and that is a pretty fair specimen of what has been going on ever since and recently. These are matters which, in dealing with the question before the House, ought not, I contend, to be left entirely out of sight. Now, as to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, speaking especially of the second, which provides that if the guarantees are not granted, we shall withhold all moral and material support from Turkey, it occurs to me that if those words mean anything they mean a great deal more than some hon. Gentlemen on the other side imagine, and perhaps more than even the right hon. Gentleman himself intended them to mean. If they mean that we are not to interfere for the sake of the Turks, no one will dispute with him, because none of us, as I understand, look to interfere for the sake of the Turks. But do they mean that under no possible circumstances are we to interfere? ["No, no!" from the Opposition.] Well, if that be so, then the Resolution is, in my opinion, open to the strictest scrutiny. I maintain that, under such circumstances, we shall be obliged to interfere, and therefore the Resolution is a snare and an embarrassment to the Government, to the House, and to the other Powers also. That being the view which I take of it, I shall unhesitatingly vote against it. There is not, I may add, a word in it about Russia or England; but the right hon. Gentleman asks the House to trust the word of the Emperor, to emulate Russia's noble conduct, and throw over our traditional policy. Now, I maintain that the traditional policy of this country, and of all our great statesmen, is a sound policy—a policy which is summed up in a leading article of The Times as one of “lively and deserved distrust.” For my own part, when I am asked to put confidence in Russia and in her moderation, all I can say is that I am unable to sing this new song. I cannot unlearn the history of the past; I cannot ignore the facts of the present; and that being so, I am not prepared to accept Russia as the Apostle of Christianity and civilization. I stand by the traditional policy of England, and I decline to sing this new song. I cannot approve the spread of Christianity and civilization by force and spoliation. We are told to trust to the word of the Emperor of Russia. I do not wish to throw any doubt upon the word of the Emperor; but it is well to remember that a Representative of the Emperor assured Lord Granville most solemnly that the Russians, if they went to Khiva, would not remain there. How has that promise been fulfilled? And when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich criticizes the words and actions of the Duke of Wellington in the despatches and letters written in connection with the Greek question in 1826 and 1827, where the Duke says—

“It makes me sick when I hear of the Emperor's desire for peace. If he desires peace, why does he not make it? . . . I put the honour of the individual out of the question, and I look at the case only as it relates to the powerful Monarch of a great Empire . . . I said I did not sit there to manifest confidence in any Sovereign, but to watch over the interests of this country.”

Those words, to my mind, have the true English ring of Britannia metal—[Laughter, and cries of “Britannia”]—I beg pardon, I mean sterling metal. And I would rather have written them than be responsible for the acres of type in speeches, pamphlets, letters, and post-cards with which this country has been deluged upon this question. There is not a word in the Resolutions about the interests of England, though there was certainly something on the subject in the right hon. Gentleman's speech. I listened to the first part of that speech, and considering the position occupied by the right hon. Member for Greenwich, for five years as Prime Minister of this country, I was astonished at the manner in which he sneered at and bespattered the fair name of England. [“Oh, oh!”] I venture to think that the interests of England should have something said for them, more than the “Previous Question,” and it was in that belief that I ventured to Table the Resolution which stands in my name. As a matter of form, I cannot bring the Resolution forward; but, practically, it is a counterblast to the right hon. Gentleman's Resolution. As he has changed his front, the first part of my Resolution is unnecessary, for the House has practically declared against the principle of coercion, and therefore by implication has condemned the action of Russia. As to the second part of the Resolution in reference to what the Government should do, I am perfectly satisfied with what I have read of the excellent speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department on the question of neutrality, and the despatch of Lord Derby in answer to the Russian Circular. In the latter part of my Resolution I express a hope, which I am sure every hon. Member will cordially reciprocate, as to the maintenance of neutrality in the war between Russia and Turkey. But I think every reasonable and rational man must admit there may be a time when you must draw the line. It may come sooner than you think. Persons cognizant of the state of the Russian and Turkish Armies, and the districts where they are engaged, believe that by the first week in July Russia will be in Adrianople, and by the first week in August in Constantinople, and others think even sooner than that. I have heard Count von Moltke maintains, from a military point of view, that if Russia crosses the Balkans she must go on. There is no position where she can stop with safety, and she must advance to Constantinople. It is not when Russia occupies Constantinople that it is time to speak. An informant has told me that the views of Russia are to take Erzeroum, Kars, and Batoum, and to descend the Euphrates Valley as far as the plague will allow, and even to advance to the Levant and occupy Scanderoon. The transference of the control of the Black Sea from Turkey to Russia will follow, and we may even have, as one of the conditions of peace, the transfer of the Turkish Fleet to Russia. Looking at all these things, and to the interests of England, which the right hon. Gentleman must admit he has disregarded—"No, no!" No? I think I have heard Sir Henry Elliot held up to scorn and odium by the right hon. Gentleman because he ventured to weigh in the balance the death of 4,000 of a Greek sect in the Turkish Empire against the interests of England. [An hon. MEMBER: 12,000.] Be it 4,000, 6,000, 10,000, or 20,000, I venture to say the interests of England are not for one moment to be weighed with the slaughter, sad and unhappy though it be, of these people. The interests of humanity, civilization, and Christianity are much more at stake in the maintenance of the Empire and interests of England than in the interests of a section of the Christian population of Turkey. I believe that the Government will stand by the interests of my country; while by maintaining a strict neutrality, so long as English interests are not affected by this war, that they will, in the words of my Resolution, take efficient measures so as to "enable them, should occasion arise, promptly to protect our interests and maintain our Empire in the East." And if they do this, whatever may be said to the contrary by a certain number of persons, who sympathize strongly with the Greek religion, and with the Christians in Turkey, Her Majesty's Ministers will, I am confident, be supported by the backbone and manhood of the nation.

MR. ANDERSON said, the House had just heard from the noble Lord exactly that pro-Turkish and anti-Russian speech which might naturally have been expected from him. He would admit that it was not an unfair speech from the noble Lord's point of view, with the exception of the remarks about the alleged sneers against this country by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, which remarks were in very bad taste. The noble Lord had spoken of Russia having all along intended to go to war, and he (Mr. Anderson) differed from him on that matter. According to the noble Lord, Russia had merely contrived to pass the time over until the approach of spring enabled her to take the field.

LORD ELCHO: I said that a relation of mine told me in October that the Russians could not go to war till April that they could not march till the roads were dry.

MR. ANDERSON said, he thought that was pretty much the same thing that he had said. He had understood the noble Lord to mean that Russia determined to go to war all the while, and that the Conference and all other negotiations were therefore futile. But that was not in accord with opinions which had been held by the Conservative side during the Conference. They then held out to the public that there would be no war, and the Government were grounding their policy on the certainty that Russia had no money to go to war with, and that therefore they were quite safe in following a policy which the Liberals called a weak vacillating policy, certain to drive Russia into independent action. The noble Lord said that the only reason we had for interfering with Turkey was that we had done her good; but the real reason interference was that while meaning to do Turkey good, we had done great and wrong to the Christian Provinces. We had taken the protection of the Provinces away from Russia, and left them to Turkey, and that was why we were bound to look after their welfare. The noble Lord had also quoted a passage from the book of the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). According to his (Mr. Anderson's) recollection, the remarks quoted were applied by his hon. Friend to the Turkish people. [Lord Elcho: Hear, hear!] But it was the Turkish ruler that was the "unspeakable Turk." There was a vast difference between the Turkish people and the Turkish ruler. Then the noble Lord said the second Resolution meant a great deal or a little; but he (Mr. Anderson) maintained that it meant exactly what it said—Turkey had forfeited all claim to our support. It did not say that we were not to interfere in her favour, if she chose to do so. It only said that had no claim on us for interference. He should have been content had the Resolution gone further, and said that we had no right to interfere, except for the defence of British interests. There had been a great deal of cavilling at the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. One line taken was a mean sort of questioning of his motives. That was pretty much the line taken by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel), who spoke of the right hon. Gentleman's conduct as being mischievous and ungenerous, and said that the agitation was most unbecoming, and that the right hon. Gentleman had divided his Party and had entered into closer communion with the Liberation Society. Then there was another class, of which the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) might be taken as an instance. The hon. Member did not impugn the right hon. Gentleman's motives at all, but thought him only weak, and said he got so excited by his own eloquence that he did things that were very blameworthy and wrong; he acted from the best of motives, but the blunder all the same was a grievous one. Well, he (Mr. Anderson) did not admit either of those lines of cavilling. He maintained that the right hon. Gentleman's conduct had been thoroughly right all along. The country had judged the right hon. Gentleman more generously, wisely, and justly, and recognized not only the grandeur and grasp of intellect, but the nobility of soul that was quite above everything small and mean. In the Autumn the right hon. Gentleman found a great outburst of national indignation, somewhat spasmodic, perhaps, somewhat unrestrained, but thoroughly genuine and spontaneous. He did not create it; he simply directed it into useful channels, and turned it to such purpose as to change the policy of the Government away from a national danger. It was because the country knew that he saved it from a danger then that it responded to him now. The right hon. Gentleman stood on far too high a ground to need any defence from him; but he wished such a defence could have come from some of the right hon. Gentlemen who sat beside him on the front Opposition bench; and he regretted that the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) did not take the opportunity of offering one last night. However, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) would be judged by the country and by posterity; and he was sure that the verdict would be that, moved by a lofty patriotism that could rise above mere Party, now as before, the right hon. Gentleman had saved his country from an imminent danger. The Home Secretary made a speech the other night which had been to a great extent the keynote of the debate, and had given a very emphatic denial, on the part of the Government, to the charge of callousness and indifference which had been made against his Party. He (Mr. Anderson) wished particularly to know if the right hon. Gentleman meant to exclude from that disclaimer his illustrious Chief? It looked almost as if he did intend it, and it was whispered no doubt in the country that he had thrown over his illustrious Chief in the Cabinet Council on Saturday. [An hon. MEMBER: "No, no!" and laughter.] Probably the hon. Gentleman who cried "No, no!" had been made acquainted with the Cabinet secrets. He (Mr. Anderson) thought the country would wonder, when it saw by that disclaimer that both sides of the House had all along been actuated by exactly the same feelings of horror at the Bulgarian atrocities, at the enormous difference between the two sides in the mode of expressing those feelings. The country would remember that when hon. Member after hon. Member on the Liberal side last Session had risen to denounce those atrocities, the other side were absolutely silent. So well did Lord Beaconsfield dissemble his feelings of horror that he succeeded in convincing the country that he really was callously indifferent. Lord Beaconsfield said when the agitation commenced that the statements which were made were nothing but coffee-house babble, and yet they were now told that the noble Earl had the same feelings of horror as anybody else all the time. If the noble Lord was simply dissembling his feelings, all that he (Mr. Anderson) could say was that it was a very unfortunate thing for him to do. He remembered that on the 7th August, Lord Beaconsfield, who sat where the Chancellor of the Exchequer sat now, received with what seemed to be an incredulous sneer the statements which he (Mr. Anderson) made with regard to the horrors afterwards proved to have occurred at Batak; but now they knew that the noble Earl was only dissembling his feelings. What had been the result of that dissembling and of that apparent incredulity. It was so terrible that it would take a whole life-time of good deeds to atone for it. The effect was to encourage the Turk in his policy of violation and carnage, to give the cue to Sir Henry Elliot in his policy of silence and suppression, and to guide all the Consular investigations, so that even now we had Consuls like Mr. Holmes sending in utter travesties of the truth. As for the rest of the Cabinet, the right hon. Gentleman said they felt as men and as Englishmen; but their private feelings did not matter. What the country wanted to know was, how they had felt as Ministers, and that could only be found in their policy; and he felt bound to say that but little trace of such feeling was to be found there. The past policy of Ministers, whatever their feelings were, had been one of favour to the oppressor and neglect of the oppressed, and there was little trace of sympathy in the despatches, except in the one to Sir Henry Elliot, referred to in the Resolutions, and in an occasional very mild protest by Sir Henry Elliot; neither despatches nor protests being followed up to any good end. And what of the followers of the Cabinet? If all their names were put in the ballot box on the Table, it would be hard to draw out one who had not had something to say in deprecation or in derision of those indignation meetings, which showed how the heart of the country was stirred during the Autumn. Coming to the Resolutions, he was one of those who cared very little what the special wording of them was. He could accept them all or more. All he wanted was, that the Liberal Party should speak out plainly, to show the country that they were still in opposition to the Government on this question. It had been said that the Resolutions meant coercion, and that coercion meant war. He was not sure that coercion meant war even in the future, but he was sure there had been a time, and a prolonged time, too, when coercion by united Europe—which was the only coercion in which Liberals believed—would have been effective and successful in procuring protection for the Provinces and in averting war. But it was Her Majesty's Government who had all along broken away from the concert of Europe. At the time of the Berlin Memorandum, Europe was united in favour of coercion, and England alone refused to join. Europe was again united with regard to a month's armistice, and Lord Derby then abandoned his own proposal, tried to force on the Powers a totally different proposal, got refused by Italy and Russia and snubbed by Germany, and then withdrew entirely and remained isolated for most of October, and thus became answerable for all the later bloodshed of the Serbian war. Her Majesty's Government were entirely to blame for the failure of the Protocol, and for the failure of the Conference to which Lord Salisbury was sent with his hands tied by the declaration by Lord Derby on 19th December, that it was the settled decision of Government not to coerce. That made the failure a foregone conclusion; and, in fact, all the time he was utterly unable to convince the Turkish Government that Great Britain was in earnest. But it might be said all that was over and past, and that as war had commenced, we ought to take care to keep out of it ourselves, and he admitted that there was a good deal in that; but that ought not to be our sole object, for we had a grave responsibility on account of those Provinces. The future policy of the Government must be judged by the past, and that was why it was necessary to look at the past. He believed the Government sincerely meant their policy to conduce to the peace of Europe, but the Liberals all along denounced it as weak and vacillating, and as certain to fail, and it had failed. The policy of the past was likely to be the policy of the future—a policy of open neutrality along with a secret leaning—he could hardly, after the answer to Prince Gortchakoff, call it a secret leaning—to the Turks. It was, therefore, necessary for the Liberal Party to make a stand against that policy. The Home Secretary had said that only for certain specified British interests would we go to war, and these were Egypt and Constantinople. He feared there was danger to the country in that statement—he took the strongest objection to the view that an attack on Constantinople by Russia would be sufficient reason for us to go to war. We had forced Russia into independent action by refusing to assist her in securing protection for the Christian Provinces; and if Russia now thought, as she well might think, that her best course, as a belligerent Power, was to aim a deadly blow at the heart of Turkey—and she could best do that by threatening Constantinople—he held that we had no right to interfere to prevent her from doing it. If the Government wished to go to war with Russia about her threatening Constantinople, he would join any section of the Party, however small, and oppose them by every means in his power by refusing Supplies, by obstructing Public Business, by anything that could be done to compel the Government to go to the country on the question, rather than see this country go to war with Russia for threatening Constantinople. The only British interest which he knew of at present, which he would admit of as being a sufficient ground for our restraining Russia, would be an attack on Egypt. He thought we were bound to maintain our way to India, but our way to India was through Egypt, and not by the Bosphorus and Constantinople. He maintained that the pro-Turkish feeling of the Conservative Party had justified the agitation got up by the Liberals, for it was inflaming this country against Russia, and if it were not checked, very likely the next thing would be that the sentiment of the fear of Russia would become a sentiment of love and favour for Turkey, such as was entertained by the hon. Members for Christchurch and Canterbury. Then there were other hon. Members who, if they loved Turkey less, hated Russia more; and these two classes were driving the Government towards war for Turkey. The danger of the public being excited into a warlike feeling had been greatly increased by the silence of the Liberal Party; and the taunt that the Liberals were silent in Parliament after having spoken in the country, was not altogether undeserved. But its motive had been misunderstood; they were told early in the Session that negotiations were pending, and that their speaking out would only hamper the Government. That was the reason why they were silent. Perhaps they allowed that reason to weigh too strongly with them. But if they had spoken then, they would now be told that their speaking had caused the failure of the policy of the Government. He thought, therefore, that there was some argument in favour of their not having spoken out sooner. But as soon as the negotiations were at an end there was no longer an excuse for silence, and there had arisen a determination to speak out, and the mere announcement of the Resolutions had been enough to awaken the country, and to let it be known that the country was ready to prevent the Government from going to war on the wrong side. That was the thing which they had feared. The country knew that to fight for Turkey was to fight for the empire of tyranny, of brutality, of slavery, and of every vile thing which was abhorrent to the honest instincts of our people. The country knew that it was for Turkey that the East African deserts were white with the bones of poor captives. The country knew that the horrors of the slave dhows in the Red Sea, in which some 50,000 slaves crossed that sea annually, were due to Turkey, and those 50,000 slaves which crossed that sea were a small part of those who were torn from their homes. Regarding those 50,000, he would say one more word. They were told the other day that the Egyptian Government had sent a ship of war down the Red Sea for the suppression of the Slave Trade, and no doubt they would be told through their enlightened Consuls that that ship of war had found no trace of any slave traffic; that not one single dhow had been captured; and therefore it was absolutely certain that no such traffic existed. Why, the Khedive took care to give information for weeks beforehand of his intention to send that ship down the Red Sea, and no doubt the slave dhows took care to be well out of the way. The country knew also that it was for Turkey that the infamous traffic in Circassian slave girls was kept up; and that being so, it would be contrary to all their deeds and traditions, contrary to all their duties, contrary to everything they thought right, for this country to fire one shot or to spend one drop of blood in support of Turkey until she had purged herself of all those abominations and of all their vile adjuncts. He, for one, rejoiced that this issue of slavery was likely to arise out of this war. Turkey had spurned our advice and laughed at our counsel; she had given us a soufflet in the face of Europe and the world. She had chosen the arbitrement of the sword. Let her take it. Once more it seemed to be a struggle of the North against the South—of freedom against slavery. True, the question of slavery had not arisen in the beginning of the war. Just as in the great struggle of North against South in America, the question of abolition was not the earliest object of that war, but was an after issue which sprung out of it; so he believed that the question of slavery would be one of the issues which would hereafter spring out of this war, and when the time came, as he believed come it must, when Turkey would have to sue for peace, he hoped this country would have something to say to the conditions of that peace, and that they would take care that one of those conditions should be the complete suppression of all slavery both in Turkey and in Egypt. They—the Liberals—had made their solemn protest, the object of which was that if they should be dragged into war they should not draw the sword in supporting wrong against right; that they should help the oppressed and the down-trodden, and that they should not fight for a tyrannical Government which they despised and for infamies they hated.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Mr. Speaker, as I am about to take a different course, when the division is called, from the great body of the Conservative Party which sits on these benches, I am anxious to address a few words to the House, assigning the reasons which actuate me in separating myself on this occasion from those with whom I have usually acted for so many years. I am about to take a rather prosaic view of the situation; and, first, I have to express my sense of gratitude to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich for having undertaken the Leadership of public opinion upon this Turkish question. I do not myself go quite so far as the right hon. Gentleman in the phase of opinion which he has expressed with such matchless eloquence. In 1853 and 1854, at the commencement of the Crimean War, I had occasion to declare myself a pupil and a supporter of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, and I have never found reason to regret my adhesion to a statesman who, for so many years, has manifested a greater knowledge of the Eastern Question, and a greater aptitude for dealing in an amicable, but decided, manner with the Ottoman people and the Ottoman Government than any other man; and at this moment I rejoice in the belief that there is no real difference between my own imperfect perceptions and Lord Stratford de Redcliffe's matured judgment. I know not what that noble Lord may think of the course I am about to adopt, but it seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, in the first Resolution which he has recommended to the House, in a speech that I do not remember to have been surpassed, either within these walls, or within the walls of the old House of Commons, distinctly affirms the policy enunciated by Lord Derby in his despatch of the 21st of September, 1876. And what is that policy? The despatch affirms the right of this country, as one of the Powers who were engaged in the Crimean War, and after all the sacrifices which this country made during that war, it affirms the right of England upon that score to express an opinion upon the conduct of the Turkish authorities towards their Christian subjects. Now, I have heard it disputed whether Russia had, previous to the Treaty of 1856, a right to intervene; but I can cite the authority of Lord Russell in 1853, to the effect that Russia possessed that right, and that the then evil was that she possessed it exclusively. I hold, Sir, that this is a matter for the exercise of mature judgment on the part of this House for the present with a view to the future. I approve of the discretion of the right hon. Gentleman in abandoning his two last Resolutions, because I contend that it is not the function of this House to interfere actively with the foreign policy of the Government. It is the function of Her Majesty's Ministers to conduct our foreign policy, to make peace, and to make war. It is our function to judge of their conduct after their conduct has taken effect; and by the two Resolutions which the right hon. Gentleman now proposes he asks that the House shall affirm the policy enunciated in the despatch of Lord Derby, to which I have referred; and, going beyond that, he also proposes that this House, after it has affirmed that policy, shall declare its opinion, that unless the Ottoman Government conforms to that policy, it is not worthy of and shall not receive either the moral or material support of this country. I confess, Sir, that I do not understand why Her Majesty's Government, who have of their own free volition proclaimed neutrality, should object to the House of Commons affirming their previous policy, which we have no reason to believe that they themselves are prepared to abandon, and on the rejection of which by the Ottoman Porte they declared the neutrality of this country. I do not understand, I say, why Her Majesty's Government should object to such a declaration on the part of the House of Commons. And when I look at the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), which is in these words—

"That this House declines to entertain any Resolutions which may embarrass Her Majesty's Government in the maintenance of peace and in the protection of British interests, without indicating any alternative line of policy,"

I cannot forget that the hon. Member for Christchurch found it convenient to abandon his original intention of moving the "Previous Question," because if he had moved the "Previous Question" upon these Resolutions, he would have proposed that the House should abandon its function of expressing a judgment upon the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers in their foreign policy after that policy had taken effect. It appears to me, then, that this Amendment of the hon. Member for Christchurch was drawn up with a view to the two latter, and not the first two Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, since the last two Resolutions contemplate a future policy. Now, I would not have voted for these two latter Resolutions, however I might agree with them in substance, for this reason—I hold that it is not the business of the House of Commons to dictate a foreign policy beforehand to Her Majesty's Government. I hold that that is beyond our function, and I regret that Her Majesty's Government should have given their sanction to this Amendment, because it appears to me to infer, that the House of Commons has no right to judge of the past and actual conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers. I, for one, will not consent, on the part of the House of Commons, to abdicate that great and important function of judging of the conduct of the responsible Ministers of the Crown. I listened attentively to the speech of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), and it seemed to me that the Crimean fire was still burning within him—his speech and those of some other hon. Members on this side of the House reminded me of what was once said to me out hunting in Northamptonshire—"Their regimental riding is perfectly terrific." It seems to me that they decline to review the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, but are satisfied with declaiming against Russia. I think it much to be regretted that Her Majesty's Ministers did not take action in co-operation with the three Northern Powers, as was proposed to them in the Andrassy Note—that they did not join in addressing Turkey in decided language in support of that document. [The hon. MEMBER: The Berlin Note.] The Berlin Memorandum was not issued till May, 1876; the Andrassy Note reached Her Majesty's Ministers in December, 1875; the Berlin Memorandum is dated May, 1876. There may have been reasons for Her Majesty's Government not accepting the offer which was tendered to them by the three Powers; but if there were such reasons I lament, that they delayed so long in originating some decided policy of their own for the prevention of these sad disturbances in Turkey, and for the avoidance of any pretext for a declaration of war on the part of Russia alone. My belief is, that decided action on the part of the Powers, when the Andrassy Note was issued, or even so late as on the appearance of the Berlin Memorandum might then have induced acquiescence on the part of Turkey. It is my feeling that the Ottoman Government have believed, that our remonstrances and those of Europe have not been made in earnest that induces me to vote for the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. What do those Resolutions imply? They imply this—that Turkey having been saved by the exertions of England, France, and Italy united, from subjugation by Russia between 1854-1856, and her position in the European comity of nations having been granted by those same Powers, that these Christian Powers have a right to intervene, when outrages are committed upon the

Christian subjects of the Sultan, which appear to have originated in differences of religion. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire has dilated upon the tolerant feeling among individual Mussulmans, and in the Ottoman Government. He even said—"Cite me a single instance of a refusal by the Ottoman Government of a site for a Christian church." The noble Lord can never have read—one might doubt whether he had ever heard of—the Treaty of Kainardji, one principal article of which stipulates for the right on the part of Russia to erect and to protect a Christian Church of her rite in Constantinople, while other articles in the Treaty of Kainardji were framed for the express purpose of insuring tolerance to the Greek Churches in the Turkish dominions. The noble Lord went so far, that he reminded me of the speech which was made by the hon. Member for Galway, last night, who, speaking as a Home Ruler, said he thought it was better, that occasional outrages of the Bulgarian type should occur than that the Russian form of government, than that the system of the Russian Church, should prevail. For my part I do not believe in the tolerance of the Mahomedan religion. For what, Sir, caused the liberation of Greece from the Ottoman dominion? Was it not that a series of outrages, of tortures and impalements, the violation of women, and the murder both of men and women, at last drew down upon Turkey the outraged feelings of Europe? Turn to the page of history and you will find that such outrages as these Resolutions condemn had repeatedly occurred before and during 1826 and 1827; before the battle of Navarino, and in a form quite as aggravated as that which we all unite in condemning. I desire, Sir, that it could become part of the International Law, that when any State exists by guarantee, and is thus rendered to a great extent irresponsible, that the Powers, who guarantee that State and, thus render it comparatively irresponsible, should have the right to exact complete religious toleration towards its subjects from the State so guaranteed. Now, how is International Law created? It is the embodiment of public opinion emanating from one State and adopted by others. It has not the specific sanctions of municipal law; but it has a much wider operation, and it seems to be that when several States unite to guarantee another State, and thus render that State irresponsible, because its existence thereafter no longer depends upon its own strength, it would be a wholesome and a peaceful principle, that this country should, in its own case and by its example, originate this system, that the guaranteeing Powers, who become responsible for the integrity and qualified independence of the State they guarantee, shall also become responsible for the toleration, that the guaranteed State shall, in all matters relating to religion, extend to its subjects. I thank the House for allowing me to express the grave and prosaic motives which actuate my vote in the present instance. I have observed that recollections of the war from 1854 to 1856 have induced many hon. Members of this House to forget what great changes have come over the Government of Russia since that Crimean War. The late Emperor Nicholas was a gallant soldier, but he was an intolerant Governor, and anything but peacefully disposed. He proposed to this country to join in the partition of Turkey. He offered England Egypt, if she would agree to his possessing Constantinople. But the present Emperor, made wiser than his father by experience, has striven to maintain peace, and, it should not be forgotten, he has accomplished the greatest act of liberation known in our days—the liberation of the serfs in his own dominions. I heard with sincere regret the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire rake up the melancholy occurrences which have taken place in Poland in order to use them as a set-off against the Turkish outrages in Bulgaria. The right hon. and learned Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) recently moved that a despatch with respect to Poland, written in 1863 by Earl Russell, should be reprinted, and placed in the hands of hon. Members of this House. That despatch was an indictment of the conduct of the Russian Government, and that indictment was issued by the English Foreign Secretary upon imperfect information. I, therefore, asked Her Majesty's Government to accede to a Motion for the reprinting of Prince Gortchakoff's despatch of 1867, to which they consented; and that despatch has been re-printed.

Mr. Newdegate

And why? Because any hon. Member who may take the trouble of reading that despatch will find that the severities in Poland, to the exercise of which the Emperor Alexander was reduced, were occasioned by an insurrection during 1863, 1864, and 1865, which had throughout been stimulated by the Vatican, while treacherously negotiating with the Emperor of Russia, who desired a Concordat with the Holy See, meanwhile fomented an insurrection during which his officers were poisoned. ["No, no!"] I say "Yes;" an insurrection, during which every means that malice could devise was used to destroy his authority. ["No, no!"] I speak from documentary evidence, when I say that the Emperor was obliged to resort to severe measures. I have no love for the Russian form of government; but I cannot deny that that Government is tolerant of the religions of different communities within its dominions. ["Oh oh!"] Yes, I repeat it. But, at the same time, the Russian Government will not permit this—it will not permit proselytism. I will not attempt to justify that prohibition to the Russian extent; but that is the law of Russia. Every community in Russia is protected in the exercise of its religion, but it must not proselytize; and it was because a system of proselytism and insurrectionary agitation, originating with the Court of the Vatican, as is proved in that despatch, was being actively carried on, that the Government of Russia resorted to repressive measures. But even, if you take what happened in Poland and set it against the outrages, the rapes, the murders, and the impalements in Greece of 1826, 1827, and even in 1828, and again the murders, the rapes, the impoverishment, the tortures, the cruelties that have been perpetrated in the revolted Provinces of Turkey within the last 18 months, there can be no doubt which aggregate of suffering is the greater. Russia may have been severe, but she has not been brutal. Still, while looking forward to the future, it seems to me probable, that it may be necessary that we should in some way again co-operate with the Turkish Government. I value the declaration of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary that, as a Member of the Government, he would be prepared to take every means for the defence of Constantinople, for the defence of the Suez Canal, for the defence of the highway of the world between West and East in which English interests are the most concerned. I do not, Sir, altogether trust the Government of Russia; but at the same time, I cannot forget that Russia was the great Ally of England in vindicating the freedom of Europe from the tyranny of the First Napoleon, and that without Russia we could not have vindicated that freedom, and that without Russia England could not have established, by the Treaty of Vienna a peace which lasted 40 years. I have not forgotten all this. At the same time I know that the Emperor of Russia is liable to be overborne by a military caste in the Russian aristocracy and other classes—a military caste, whose support he is obliged to cultivate in order to maintain the connection of his vast dominions. I know that the Empress Catherine is said to have declared that external war is preferable to domestic disturbance, and I know that Russia has acted upon that principle. Therefore, while not trusting Russia blindly, I am not prepared to join in the denunciations of that country, and her Ruler of which we have heard so much from these benches, and which I believe to be rather a remnant of the hostility against Russia, which was generated by a former state of things than dictated by statesmanlike views. I am not prepared to join in these wholesale denunciations of Russia, and I shall vote for the first two Resolutions proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, in order to affirm this principle—that, whenever England may guarantee the integrity of any State, she ought to be in a position to demand toleration for all its subjects.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that, while willing himself to support the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) he could not concur with the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) that his right hon. Friend was to blame for not pressing them in their original shape; for had he done so, the division would not have shown the real opinion of that side of the House. Neither was his right hon. Friend in error in that he had submitted too large a proposition to the House. His right

hon. Friend had not abated one iota of his policy. He only asked the House to divide on his first Resolution, but he retained the whole, and the discussion of three nights would be mainly on those propositions. A very great advantage had arisen from the discussion of this great subject. In the first place, it brought out that the opinion of the country, as manifested by great public meetings, was similar to what it was last autumn. It was said that these public meetings had been got up. He presumed that public meetings must be called by somebody, but then it did not follow that people would come. Something like 300 meetings had been held in different parts of the country upon the question, and that fact alone would give a fair idea of the state of feeling. It had also blown to the winds the war policy which had been lately woven by the Tory Press. It had compelled the Government to turn the peace side of its policy to the front, and he thought the Government ought to be obliged to his right hon. Friend for giving them an opportunity of eliciting the opinions of the country. Then, the discussion had elicited from the Home Secretary a speech with which most hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side agreed. Then there was another thing which the debates had elicited; there had been apologists for Turkey, but there was not one, except the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) who had ventured to rise and maintain that we should fight to preserve the integrity of Turkey and to maintain the Treaty of Paris. The policy enunciated by hon. Members opposite who favoured Turkey appeared to be a policy of general neutrality, tempered with a certain regard for British interests. That was what they sheltered themselves behind. But the Home Secretary had said that British interests were a long way off. [Mr. Cross: I hoped they were.] The right hon. Gentleman stated that British interests lay in the direction of the Suez Canal, of Alexandria, of the Bosphorus or the Dardanelles, but he cared very little about Batoum, or even Bulgaria. We had, therefore, no fear of being hurried into a war on behalf of British interests, and the Country would have time to consider the question. The Home Secretary endeavoured to prove that there had been no difference within the last few months in the opinion of his Colleagues; but the whole speech of the right hon. Gentleman showed a difference of tone from the earlier speeches of Lord Derby. It seemed scarcely possible that the right hon. Gentleman could have been a party to the noble Lord's despatch to Prince Gortchakoff. [Mr. Cross: I argued from it.] That there had been differences of opinion among the right hon. Gentleman's Colleagues during the last 18 months must be apparent to any one who read the papers and watched the question. The Government had either altered its policy, or there had been a difference of opinion, and of these two alternatives he thought the latter more charitable. What his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich proposed was, that the Government should endeavour to restore the European concert with a view to the protection of the interests of the Christians in the East, and in that respect he differed materially from the hon. Member for Liskeard, who would be ready to take action against Turkey without any European concert. The European accord was first impaired at the time of the Berlin Note. The Berlin Note was proposed by the Three Powers; and, as the Government said, it was rejected solely because this country had not been consulted. The Under Secretary of State for the Foreign Office had justified that rejection on the ground that the adoption of that Note would cost Turkey £3,000,000 in building the houses of the Bosnian refugees; but it appeared from the famous letter of September that Turkey was expected at any rate to re-build the houses of the Bulgarians. He would quote part of a despatch reporting a conversation between Lord Lyons and the Duc Decazes with reference to the Note. It appeared that the Duke had expressed his surprise and regret at the refusal of the British Government; that he feared that an armistice was then impossible, and took a gloomy view of the consequences which might follow in the form of a continued spread of insurrection, the ultimate dismemberment of the Turkish Empire, and a European war; adding that it would be a public calamity if England were to stand aloof. That was the opinion of the French Government, who had not been consulted any more than ourselves

by the Three Northern Powers as to the Berlin Note, yet that Government had given its consent without hesitation, and, in the opinion of the French Minister, our rejection of that Note had been most unwise. It was yet possible that all the consequences which had been prophesied by the French Minister might become true. The accord of Europe having been first broken by our rejection of the Berlin Note, then had occurred the atrocities, and he need not remind the House that Her Majesty's Government, after the Autumn agitation, yielding to the manifest feeling of the country, had changed its policy. He did not blame the Government, for he thought it a most wise change. Again, they had endeavoured to act in accord with the rest of Europe, and that had brought about the Conference and the Mission of Lord Salisbury. The Instructions of the noble Lord and his acts at the Conference had given universal satisfaction to the country; but it appeared to hon. Members on his side of the House that, though a very proper course had been taken in thus endeavouring to restore the accord of Europe, yet that attempt had been doomed to hopeless failure, because, although it was made known to the Turks that this country would no longer give them support, every act of the Government was calculated to make the Turks believe that we were not in earnest, and would not use coercion. First among these causes of failure came the Mansion House speech of Lord Beaconsfield, in which the friendly communications from the Emperor of Russia were suppressed. Next came the action of Sir Henry Elliot at the Conference. It was evident that the Ambassador had taken an opposite course to that of Lord Salisbury, and had acted as the marplot of the Conference—there was also the fact that Engineer officers had been sent to Constantinople to report on a scheme of defence for Constantinople at the very time when the Conference was sitting; and lastly, there had been the tone of the speeches of the Government supporters and of the Tory Press—neither of which had been checked by the Government. All these acts were calculated in every way to make the Turks believe that they might count on the assistance of England, and that the general tendency of the Government was in favour of Turkey. Nothing could have been more injudicious again than our informing the Turkish Government at a most critical period of the Conference negotiations, that whatever might be the result of those negotiations, England would not force the conclusions of the Conference upon her. That was a most grave diplomatic error, for it was throwing away the only chance which Her Majesty's Government had of inducing Turkey to give her assent to the conclusions of the Conference. He was of opinion that after calling the Conference, the Government ought to have used pressure to induce Turkey to assent to its conditions. It might be said that that would have been an act of war; but in his opinion it would have been the only way of avoiding war and securing the peace of Europe. It had been said by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that the other great Powers of Europe were unwilling to use compulsion against Turkey; but listening to the extracts which had been read to support that proposition, he (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had come to the conclusion that what the foreign Powers objected to was the territorial occupation of any part of Turkey. Austria had been cited as objecting to compulsion, but he would remind the House that it was Austria who, while she had objected to the occupation of Bosnia, had suggested a naval demonstration against Turkey, and there was no doubt both France and Italy would have united in such a demonstration, and that if it had been made the assent of Turkey to the conclusions of the Conference would have been obtained. From neglect, however, of using any one of the several modes which existed of bringing pressure to bear upon Turkey, every hope of success had been lost, and the Conference had proved a failure. When the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho), and other Speakers said that an opportunity should have been afforded to Turkey to work out her own reforms, and that the meeting of a Parliament in Turkey was a most important event, he would ask permission to quote an extract from a despatch written from Rustchuk by Consul Reade to Lord Derby. It ran as follows:—

“I have been making diligent inquiries as to the state of public feeling in this vilayet, and I am now in a position to lay before your Lordship the result up to the present moment. The employés of the Government in general are very elated from the results of the Conference, and are by no means dejected from the prospects of a war with Russia. They get their pay, and appear to think they have little to lose. It is very different, however, with the people, Mussulmans as well as Christians, who know they have everything to lose, and who continue to suffer as much as ever from the incorrigibly deplorable system of government which they are under. Indeed, if anything, the state of things is worse than ever. . . . I am assured . . . that were a foreign force (a Russian one alone excepted) to make its appearance in this Province, it would be received by the whole population, Mussulman as well as Christian, minus the employés, with open arms."—[Turkey, 1877, p. 188.]

Could anything have shown better the fiasco of the Conference, at which Lord Salisbury had been permitted to menace Turkey with a Russian war? It was consequently not fair now to abuse Russia for coercing Turkey. It could not be desirable to give Turkey further opportunities of reform, and the opening of a Turkish Parliament could have no important effect, considering that the Christian Deputies were nominated by the Government. The promises of that Parliament came to nothing, and certain decisions already were fatal to all reform. One of these was that no Christian Governor could be appointed, and another that no Christian should be in the Army. He wished to direct the attention of the House for a moment to the state of the Provinces of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which were the original cause of the insurrection, but to whom since the Bulgarian atrocities very little notice had been accorded. He did so, because the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had read a despatch from Consul Holmes describing the state of Bosnia in glowing terms. He (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) had been in constant communication with a relative in one of those Provinces, and from all the accounts he received, and which he believed to be of an authentic character, he was in a position to say that the statements of Mr. Holmes were wholly unreliable. He could not but think that the Government had been misled, but not wilfully, by that gentleman, who himself said he was reported to be a passionate Turkophile. Mr. Holmes only knew Turkish and was unacquainted with the language of the Native population, and whose communications with them were made entirely through the Turkish authorities. Consul Holmes had informed us that there was no insurrection at this moment in Bosnia, that the few so-called insurgents were a mere band of brigands, and that the refugees from Bosnia had been driven away, not by the atrocities of the Turks, but by fear of the insurgents. In both these respects Consul Holmes was completely misinformed. Upwards of two-thirds of the whole Christian population of Bosnia and Herzegovina had fled across the frontier. There were about 110,000 in Austria, and nearly the same number in the two Provinces of Montenegro and Serbia; they had been driven away from time to time by bands of Bashi Bazouks, who committed every kind of atrocity. He was informed, on good authority, that no fewer than 1,700 villages in Bosnia and Herzegovina had been burnt. [Mr. Bourke: Name!] He would give his authority to the right hon. Gentleman, but he must decline to state it to the House. He might, however, mention one authority—namely, Mr. Evans, the author of a book of travels in Bosnia. If the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had any doubt on the subject, he would refer him to the despatch of Vice Consul Freeman, dated March 17. Mr. Freeman spoke of the atrocities committed by the Turks, of the great extent of the insurrection, and of the refugees having been driven away by the atrocities of the Turks. Numerous refugees had, doubtless, been permitted to return to their country; but in almost every case in which they had returned, they had been received with such dreadful acts of cruelty that they had been driven back over the Austrian frontier. The condition of Bosnia and Herzegovina was so terrible that measures should be taken to ameliorate it. He asked whether some responsibility for that condition did not rest on England? It appeared to him that it was the duty of this country in every respect, as a matter of honour and justice, to do something for the unfortunate Christian population in these Provinces in the East. In conclusion, he would simply say that the honour of the country and the interests of peace of Europe were involved in proceeding further in the direction pointed out in the Resolutions of his right hon. Friend, and therefore he intended to give them his cordial support.

Mr. J. R. YORKE said, if he had believed that this country could at the present time do anything to ameliorate the condition of the unfortunate Christian population of Bulgaria, he should have listened to this debate with more interest and pleasure than he had been able to do. The debate had been protracted and important, but he submitted that between the two equally harmless propositions which they had been debating there was hardly a penny to choose. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) in which he so eloquently denounced the Turks, could not possibly in the present crisis do either good or harm. It reminded him of the celebrated curse in the "Jackdaw of Rheims"—

"He cursed him in living, he cursed him in dying—

Never was heard such a terrible curse;
But what gave rise to no small surprise,
Nobody seemed a penny the worse."

Two years ago he (Mr. J. R. Yorke) brought a Motion before the House, which he thought at the time might have been of some service. At that time the right hon. Member for Greenwich was engaged in pelting the Pope with pamphlets, and did not come down to do him the honour of listening to the arguments with which he supported his Motion. He at that time called attention to the threatening condition of affairs in Turkey, and strenuously urged the Government before it was too late to try what urgent remonstrances might do with the Porte. The only official support he obtained was that given him by his right hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), who came forward manfully and supported the statements which he had made. Possibly there was then time, though not too much, to save the Porte if active measures had been taken. The Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs stated on that occasion that the progress of Turkey was slow but sure, and that he did not think the Christian subjects of the Porte had much to complain of. The progress of Turkey might have been sure, but it certainly was not slow, for within three months from that time the bankruptcy of Turkey was announced, and within four months the rebellion in the Herzegovina broke out. What an age separated them now from two years ago. They were somewhat in the position of the friends of an estimable gentleman, the late Mr. Odger, whose remains were recently followed to the grave by several hon. Gentlemen opposite. Mr. Odger not being a good financier, lived and died in poverty, and his body was accompanied to the grave by a large number of admiring friends, who, if they did not assist him during his life, were anxious to show their respect for him after his death. In the same way when they in England could have done something to save the Porte from impending bankruptcy they held their hand, and now they were called together on that solemn occasion to shriek over the grave of the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire. He also endeavoured on the occasion to which he referred to point out the numerous grounds of hope, some of which still existed, for the restoration of Turkey. It should be remembered that she had passed through severer trials than the present. After the battle of Navarino her fleet was destroyed, her integrity was interfered with by the creation of the Kingdom of Greece, she had lost her ancient military force by the destruction of the Janissaries, and her very existence was threatened by the revolt of Mehemet Ali. Yet she had survived these calamities, because in primitive Oriental societies recovery followed more quickly on misfortune than in societies of a more complex character. If, at the time Sultan Abdul Aziz was dethroned by a successful revolution there had been secured for Turkey a short interval to take breath, it was possible she might have reformed her ways and peace been secured. But the ambition of Russia was the obstacle that stood in the way. All who had followed the various phases of the Eastern Question would agree with what was stated in the Turkish manifesto as to the machinations of Russia and especially of her Ambassador, General Ignatieff. In his opinion the manifesto of the Turks was both dignified and true, and as a proof he would refer to a despatch dated December 10, 1876, from Sir Henry Elliot to Lord Salisbury to show that the former believed it to be an entire delusion on the part of the English newspapers to suppose that, provided the Marquess of Salisbury and General Ignatieff could come to an understanding upon the measures of reform to be expected from the Porte, no further difficulty need be apprehended, as the acquiescence of the Imperial Government would be a matter of course. Sir Henry Elliot added—

"The united action of Great Britain and Russia must have immense weight with the Porte, but the influence of Her Majesty's Government as a friendly adviser is not what it was a short time ago. The declaration of important personages that the Turks must be driven out of Europe causes a feeling of distrust against anything we may recommend in concert with Russia. Convinced that Russia intends to attack it, the whole nation has resolved to offer the best resistance in its power, and that resistance will certainly be stubborn, though possibly futile; but the Turks say there would be less discredit in being driven by force from their territories than in being cajoled out of them."

In a conversation, too, between Captain Ardagh, R.E., and a Turkish gentleman it was remarked pointedly that

"the confidence which had long been reposed by the mass of the Mahomedan population in England as their best friend and adviser was rudely shaken by the expressions employed by Mr. Gladstone in regard to them, and that, although they were convinced of the friendly attitude of the present Government, they were bound to consider that, in a Constitutional country like England, Mr. Gladstone's Party, as they described it, might any day come into power and reverse the policy of their Predecessors."

There was one subject to which he wished to refer before he sat down, and that was, he wished to call attention to the undignified position in which we stood with regard to the Tripartite Treaty, by which France, Austria, and England guaranteed the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and agreed that any attack upon Turkey's independence would be considered by them a casus belli. Now if the second Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman were carried, what position would this country find itself in, supposing—which he admitted was not very likely to happen—that we were called on by France and Austria to make war under the provisions of the Tripartite Treaty? We would find ourselves in the ambiguous position of having passed a Resolution in the House of Commons at once in contravention of Her Majesty's Declaration and of our international obligations. He was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman did not make this Treaty the object of his attack, for on a former occasion he made a statement in reference to the Treaties and the different guarantees by which this country was bound, and he said there was not an immense difference in them, and he said that he was of opinion that the Tripartite Treaty was the one of all others from which this country could not liberate itself without the assent of France and Austria. He contended that in bringing forward these Resolutions the right hon. Gentleman had taken a course which might embarrass the Government, while, on the other hand, the conduct of the Prime Minister had been made the object of continual attack by hon. Members opposite, for he had been accused of regarding the Bulgarian atrocities with cynical sneers and with having concealed evidence in his possession as to the feelings and disposition of the Emperor of Russia; and yet it had never been imputed to him that at any critical period in the history of the country he had come forward to embarrass the Government of the day with Resolutions such as those before the House. In his speech at Glasgow in November, 1873, Mr. Disraeli said—

"Whenever this country is externally involved in a difficulty, whatever I may think of its cause or origin, those with whom I act and myself have no other duty to fulfil but to support the existing Government in extricating the country from its difficulties and vindicating the honour and interests of Great Britain."

In his opinion the conduct of Lord Beaconsfield during these negotiations had been wise, patriotic, and dignified. He (Mr. J. R. Yorke) did not wish to impute to the Emperor of Russia throughout these negotiations any intention to deceive. He was, no doubt, honourable and true in his declarations; but few persons had less control over the destinies of the future than a despotic Ruler. On the other hand, the Prime Minister of a country like this was powerful because he had the people of the country at his back, and was supported by a great Party, whereas the Emperor of Russia was a despotic Ruler, and though he might desire peace he might by force of circumstances be driven into war. To rely upon his intention, therefore, was to rely upon a broken reed. He was sorry he had detained the House so long; but he hoped that when they went to a division the House would show that the Government still retained the confidence of the country, and that the majority would be an inducement to the Government to pursue in the future, as in the past, that course with regard to their foreign policy which would best serve the interests of the country, and, at the same time, be worthy of public support.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that in the few remarks he was anxious to address to the House, he should not discuss the question before it in any Party spirit. Indeed, he was as anxious as the hon. Member for Christchurch (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) that the House should not pass any Resolution which would be likely to embarrass the Government. But he could see nothing in those now proposed which could have such an effect, and the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary seemed to him to be as strong an argument in their favour as any which had been delivered from the Liberal side of the House. Before, however, he proceeded to consider the course which this country, under existing circumstances, should pursue, he trusted he might be allowed to express the pain with which he listened on Tuesday evening to the accusations brought by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) against the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, who had done so much for the benefit of his country. For his part, he begged to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the conciliatory course which he had adopted. He should hardly have thought it possible for any one sitting on that side of the House to forget the splendid services he had rendered to the country, and the numerous victories to which he had led the Liberal Party during his long and illustrious career. As regarded the Resolutions now before the House, it appeared to him that there were three principal questions before the country—should they join Russia and go to war against Turkey; should they join Turkey and go to war against Russia; or should they maintain a strict neutrality? As to the first point, whether they should join Russia and fight against Turkey, the second Resolution in its original form stated that, until the conduct of the Porte

“had been essentially changed and guarantees on behalf of the subject populations had been given, the Porte had lost all claim to receive the material or moral support of the British Crown.”

These words, however, clearly implied that Turkey would have, if not a legal, at any rate an indirect, claim on this country for material aid under certain conditions. If we were to pass this Resolution in that form, and if, then, Turkey punished the offenders and gave material guarantees for improved government, surely it would have been very difficult for us to refuse to assist her. How could we have said—“It is true you have fulfilled all our conditions, but still you must not expect any help from us?” This Resolution in its original form, in fact, took the decision of peace or war out of the hands of this House and our gracious Sovereign, and transferred it to the National Assembly of Turkey and the will of the Sultan. He was glad, however, that the right hon. Gentleman himself thought the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for the Border Burghs (Mr. Trevelyan) to be an improvement. He (Sir John Lubbock) considered it to be most important from their point of view, and that, in its amended form, it represented the opinions of an immense majority of the people of this country. As it at present stood, it clearly expressed that the Porte, by its cruelty and misgovernment had forfeited all claim on us. Then they came to the second question, should we join Russia and coerce Turkey? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, in his fourth Resolution and in his speech, called upon us to “exact” certain reforms from Turkey. Exaction, however, implied force, and Her Majesty’s Government had pledged themselves to Turkey to use no force. He regretted very much that Her Majesty’s Government should have made any such announcement. After that had been done, there was certainly very little chance of bringing the negotiations to any satisfactory termination. But, whatever course it might have been advisable for us to take when Turkey rejected all our representations, if we had been free to act, it seemed to him that, under existing circumstances, when war had broken out, and after the solemn assurances given by Her Majesty’s Government to Turkey that we would not use force, the House could not call on Her Majesty’s Government to make war on Turkey. Even those who most regretted, as he did, that such assurances should have been given, must feel that we were bound by them. He had avoided entering into any criticisms of the past, nor would he speculate on the future. There was much to be said for uniting Bulgaria to Roumania, for annexing Bosnia and Herzegovina to Austria, and for a large addition to the kingdom of Greece. These questions might arise hereafter, but they were not before them now. For the present, there remained the policy of a strict and watchful neutrality. He had listened with much pleasure to that part of the Home Secretary's speech in which he announced that Her Majesty's Government were unanimously in favour of that course, an announcement received with great and general satisfaction throughout the country. He thought it was desirable that nothing should be said in that House which could inflame the feelings of the people of this country against Russia. A strong feeling of irritation was, he feared, springing up, and those who said anything calculated to fan it, took upon themselves a very serious responsibility. They had heard much of English interests abroad, but were not English interests much stronger at home—upon the shores of the Thames and the Mersey, rather than at Batoum and other places in Turkey? They ought to remember that Russia co-operated in freeing Greece, Servia, and Roumania. He thought that at present it would be wiser, more generous, and more politic to suspend their judgment, than to condemn Russia, though Russia must know that this country viewed her conduct with distrust in consequence of what had occurred in the past. Still they ought not to forget that the Emperor Alexander had liberated the serfs, and therefore he hoped that the Czar would now show that in the present crisis he had been acting a loyal part: that his object was to benefit the unfortunate Christians of Turkey; that he had not been so base as to use their sufferings as a mere excuse for his own aggrandizement. If the Emperor Alexander fulfilled the pledges he had given, he would add a bright page to the history of his country, set a noble example to the world, and do more to promote the true interests and prosperity of Russia, than if he added many millions to his subjects and annexed even the fairest provinces of Asia to his already gigantic dominions.

MR. GRANTHAM said, he approved more of the plain-spoken principles of the hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) than of the vote-catching policy enunciated by the hon. Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who supported the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, because it would add to the numbers at the Liberal side on the Division List. Probably that would be the case, for though the House knew, yet the people outside would not know that the division was taken upon one of the Resolutions, for the speeches delivered by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite had been directed to the five Resolutions as they were placed on the Table of the House by the right hon. Gentleman, and the people outside the House would naturally assume that the division was really upon them. Hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House had been most unjustly taunted with being indifferent to the atrocities which had been committed in certain of the Turkish Provinces. For his part, he could say that he should not have risen to address the House, but for the taunts which had been cast at hon. Members on that side of the House, because of their apparently inconsistent opinions respecting the atrocity meetings of last Autumn. They agreed on that side with hon. Members opposite in rejoicing at the outburst of national indignation when these atrocities were heard of; but they were also all agreed on that side of the House in a feeling of national indignation against those who had used those atrocities for the purpose of endeavouring to rally the broken forces of the Liberal Party. The sufferings of the poor Christians had been more a cry for the purpose of catching votes for the poor Liberal Party of England. He (Mr. Grantham) had attended one of the Autumn meetings at which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University (Mr. Lowe) delivered that remarkable speech in which he declared that the policy of England must be changed, and that, while begging forgiveness of Russia for what was past, England should ask to be allowed to join her in the future. It was true that there was some talk about Turkish cruelty at that meeting; but there was much more about Tory coldness and want of sympathy, and that nothing would satisfy the people of England but the substitution of the right hon. Member for Greenwich and his Friends for Lord Beaconsfield and the present Ministry. He felt justified in publicly denouncing there the false pretences under which he had been inveigled to that meeting. Never was there a time when the irresponsible intellect of the country had such a dangerous power as at present, never was there a time when one man by his pen or his voice could have such influence in the country for good or ill; and he therefore asked the people of England to take warning by the lesson of last Autumn, and not always to believe in the speeches and writings, however brilliant, that were made by those who were not responsible for the government of the country. He believed that the wise and prudent conduct of Her Majesty's Government had, at a most critical time, steered the country clear of an imminent danger, and he therefore heartily supported the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Christchurch.

MR. WALTER said, he should follow the advice which he had ventured, somewhat presumptuously, to offer to the House at an earlier period of the evening, and condense his remarks into the space of a few minutes. His object was to offer a few observations, founded on what he might call the key-note of the evening's debate, which was sounded by his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He referred to that which had, in his opinion, been the mistaken policy of Her Majesty's Government during the earlier part of the negotiations which had resulted in the present war, a policy which he would describe as one of international coercion. His hon. Friend, following in the line of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, spoke strongly and emphatically against the right or expediency of using coercion under almost any conceivable circumstances, but especially under the circumstances to which their attention had been recently and painfully called. He proposed to submit to his hon. Friend who opened the evening's debate certain reasons which induced him (Mr. Walter) to think that the policy was mistaken, and those reasons were proved by one of the objects which the Government had in view—namely, the maintenance of peace. He held that no State could, by virtue of any Treaty or other obligation, divest itself of its natural right to interfere, if necessary, by force of arms, with any other State, if circumstances justified such interference. And he held that the circumstances which, in our case, could justify such interference were such as would interfere with the peace of Europe or would involve the maintenance or suppression of some gross system of tyranny or persecution. There was a remarkable instance of this international interference which occurred within the recollection of himself and of many Members of the House—he referred to the interference of England and France in the separation between Belgium and Holland. That was a case in which the English Government pursued a policy precisely opposite and different from that which she had seen fit to adopt on the present occasion, and which was advocated by his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Bourke). In the year 1814 this country, in conjunction with Russia, Prussia, and Austria, solemnly created and guaranteed an union between Holland and Belgium. They did it by virtue of conquest, and for the purpose of maintaining a certain balance of power in Europe. That Treaty was further confirmed by the Congress of Vienna, and the state of things, so settled, subsisted for 15 years down to 1830, when France, England, Prussia, Russia, and Austria, as the result of Conferences held, determined upon the separation of Belgium and Holland. But that was not all. The separation was assented to by the King of Holland, but subsequent arrangements were necessary in order to carry the Treaty into effect. A Conference was therefore held in London, and various bases of separation, which were called "irrevocable bases," although they were repeatedly changed, were laid down for the purposes of the arrangement for carrying the separation into effect. The conditions were extremely hard upon Holland, whose King naturally objected to Belgium agreeing to them. Other bases still more severe, strict, and harsh were then laid on Holland, and when Holland declined to accept them, England and France, without the concurrence, and, indeed, against the wish of the other co-signatories to the Treaty united, used the force of arms, and by besieging Antwerp compelled the King of Holland to accept the terms. He did not complain of that act of interference, although he remembered that, in this country, the excitement at the time exceeded anything that had occurred in connection with the present war. But if that act was justifiable, it was surely a far more high-handed act than that which Russia had performed on the present occasion, and incomparably more high-handed than that which Her Majesty's Government would have performed had they taken a more sound and correct view of their international obligations—he meant the step of enforcing upon Turkey the law and the will of Europe. The mistake which had run through all the negotiations and policy of the Government from the very beginning of these unhappy transactions had been their settled determination on no account whatever to entertain the idea of a concerted interference of Europe in order to carry out its will. England interfered in the case of Holland in order to preserve her and Belgium from civil war, and if it was justifiable to interfere for such a purpose, there was surely a better ground for interference in the cause of humanity and of a country misgoverned and Provinces so tyrannically ruled as had been the Turkish Provinces during many years. A great deal had, and more might be said about the non-acceptance of the Berlin Memorandum by the Government. Its acceptance would, undoubtedly, have given a good basis for the concerted action of Europe; but at the time when it was presented it was fair to urge there did not exist the same means for bringing pressure on the Turkish Government that there had since been, for the Bulgarian massacres had not yet occurred. Had they only occurred before the Memorandum, public opinion would have forced the Government to accept it. The Conference followed upon the non-acceptance, and he believed the failure of that Conference was predestined to be a failure. The mission of Lord Salisbury reminded him of the mission of two very eminent Ambassadors to another great tyrant in a much earlier period in the world's history than the present. Two Ambassadors were sent to Pharaoh, King of Egypt, with regard to the liberation of the chosen people from bondage; but the difference between their mission and that of Lord Salisbury was that Moses and Aaron were armed with the power of plagues, while the noble Marquess who represented England at Constantinople had no such power. In spite of this, however, it might turn out—and he should not be surprised at it—that the very policy adopted by the Government—a policy which had landed the Turkish Empire in war—might, though not at once, be the means of determining the existence of that Empire. Looking at the Resolutions, he entirely concurred with the opinion of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that at the present moment England had only one policy—namely, a policy of observation and neutrality. It must be borne in mind that in debating this question they were in the position of persons who, having only seen two acts of a drama, proceeded to construct theories as to its close. The second act of this drama was now proceeding, but how that act might develop itself they could form only a very imperfect opinion. With regard to the third act, which related to the negotiations that must inevitably follow the war, they were in total ignorance. How could they, therefore, attempt to pass a judgment satisfactorily to themselves, or to form now any judgment at all upon transactions of which they only knew a part? Years hence the historian of those events might have very great reason to say how blindly and impotently the whole subject had been treated. For his own part, he devoutly hoped that it might be simply the threshold of the Eastern Question—a question which had been the terror and bugbear of statesmen from the beginning of this century. What was that question? Surely, it did not mean a continuance and maintenance of the Turkish Empire, nor did it mean a substitution of Russian for Turkish rule. Neither of these was the problem which statesmen had in their minds when they talked of the Eastern Question. The real question was the true mode of dealing with the dismembered elements of what now constituted the Turkish Empire. In his view, speaking under clouds of uncertainty, the problem was one that must sooner or latter be solved, but it could not be solved by statesmen who said—“Don't mention it in my time; let it be reserved for those to deal with who will come after me.” He should not be surprised if he lived to witness a solution of this question. He believed that, at all events, their descendants would look back upon this whole period of Turkish domination in Europe as the most disgraceful and miserable period of this century. He had lived to see changes which 50 years ago the strongest statesman would have scouted as impossible. He remembered that when he first entered upon public life the problem was how to create an united and independent Italy; and he also remembered the look of surprise and compassion with which that eminent and sagacious man Mr. Charles Greville received a suggestion that such a consummation was possible. After a few years had elapsed, however, that dream became a reality. He had lived to see the settlement of another question, which one of the cleverest men in England had declared would remain to be settled a hundred years hence—namely, that of the abolition of the temporal power of the Pope. He had also lived to see the re-construction of the German Empire, which was regarded as being one of the greatest problems of the age. The fourth problem of our time, and one which still remained to be solved, was the Eastern Question, and it was one which statesmen must face. Whether it would be solved in our time He only knew who determined the fate of Kingdoms; but that it would be solved, and solved at no distant date, he had not the slightest doubt. He would not detain the House longer, but would merely quote the words which he had read the other day in Sir Gardiner Wilkinson's work to the effect that—

“The Turks came into Europe as a horde, they gained power as a horde, and they remained as a horde, and they are the only instance in the history of the world in which a nation has gained the zenith of its power and is hastening to its fall without ever becoming civilized.”

He believed that the Turkish Government was incapable of civilization, and he was convinced that that was the opinion of the wisest and the deepest thinkers who had given their attention to the subject. He should give his vote in favour of this Resolution, not because he thought that it conveyed any censure upon the Government, but because it embodied the views he had just expressed, and which amounted to a distinct declaration of the present diplomatic attitude of the country towards the Eastern Question. That attitude was one of strict neutrality and observation; but with no intention whatever of supporting the Turks. He did not blame the Government for not having used coercion. If they thought that to use coercion would occasion greater evils than now existed; if they thought that it would bring into play dangerous complications between Germany and France, and would perhaps bring about the massacre of the Christians in the Turkish Provinces, they, acting under a sense of their responsibility, were quite right not to use it. Had they used it he should have praised them; but he did not blame them for not having used it. He was prepared to vote any money which the Chancellor of the Exchequer might ask for keeping the Russians out of Constantinople, but he would not vote one shilling to keep the Turks in it.

MR. HERMON thought it was scarcely sufficiently understood that the people of this country were not inclined to go to war, either on behalf of Russia or of Turkey. Connected as he was with trade, and with a part of England which was dependent entirely upon the commerce of the Kingdom, he could bear testimony to the fact that the warlike speeches, resolutions, and meetings of which so much had been heard had a tendency to upset that revival of industry of which they were sanguine enough to believe they had seen some evidence. On behalf of those whom he represented he was prepared to say that the constituency of Preston were not prepared to go to war in support of either Russia or Turkey. They were not prepared to go to war either in defence of a declining Empire, which was unworthy to exist in its present state, or in support of a Government which sought to enforce upon another country which was too weak to withstand the pressure principles which were abhorrent to Englishmen. For his own part, he admired the character of neither the Russian nor the Turk. When, however, the necessity for maintaining the honour of the country arose, or when a struggle for existence had to be made, the country would give its full support to a bold policy on the part of the Government. This debate had shown the feeling of the country on this question, and had proved that the nation was now convinced that the great Power which was now invading Turkey was doing so, not altogether for the sake of relieving the oppressed Christian inhabitants of the Turkish Provinces, but for its own territorial aggrandizement and selfish purposes. He felt confident that the manly declaration of the Home Secretary the other night, that the Government were entirely wedded to a system of strict neutrality, would win the confidence of the country. We were not inclined to rush into war for Russia or Turkey. Neither of them, he thought, deserved our confidence or esteem. If the time should come when the Government felt it necessary for the protection of our interests, he believed they would receive a generous support from the other side. But he hoped that any step in that direction would be well-considered, as it might lead to trouble or disaster to this country. He thought the Government was entitled to the thanks of the country, and he trusted they would stick to their policy of neutrality.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he would not have risen if he did not believe that Her Majesty's Government fairly understood that, looking to the great interest which had been taken in this debate on both sides of the House, to the number of Speakers who still wished to address it on both sides, no division would be taken that evening. His noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) stated early in the evening that if there should be any chance of bringing this debate to a conclusion, he (Mr. Goschen) would willingly surrender any claim he might have to address the House, with the view that the debate might be brought to a conclusion. But those who had attended the debate through the course of the evening, and Her Majesty's Government itself, must recognize that it could not be concluded this evening, and, therefore, he proposed to make some observations if the House would permit. The debate had, on the whole, been satisfactory. He believed there were many hon. Members on his side of the House who believed that this four nights' debate had been most distinctly of advantage to the country. And he believed that opinion was shared even by hon. Members opposite, for it had been an advantage to the country, as was said by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that in the course of this debate many illusions had been dissipated. He had said that the debate had been satisfactory to the Opposition. They had seen a distinct change of tone come over the Government. ["No!"] That was a matter of opinion, and he clearly thought a change had been expressed. He believed his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich would be satisfied that in doing what he thought his imperative duty in bringing this matter before the House, he had assisted to a great extent in dispelling the fears which might have been entertained of our going to war. Those fears had existed. They might have been unjust. If they were unjust, it was well that they should have been dispersed—that the atmosphere should have been cleared, and that we should know better where we were. He thought we did know better where we were. As he had said, he believed the course of this debate had been satisfactory in most quarters, but there was one quarter where this debate he believed would not be satisfactory, and that was at Constantinople. More warnings had been addressed to Turkey, not only from his side of the House, but from the other, than were contained even in those voluminous Blue Books which they had all been studying. He believed that by the effect of this debate the voice of the country would be understood, both at Constantinople and in Europe. He must allude, as so many other hon. Members had alluded, with satisfaction to the manly, straightforward, and precise speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department. By what an interval they seemed to have been removed from the time when the Secretary for War addressed the House in a bellicose speech, and, without defining British interests, poured out a torrent of words with regard to vague interests which none of them could measure or appreciate! The Home Secretary had taken a different line; he had defined British interests, and he (Mr. Goschen) trusted that before this debate closed, as hon. Members on his side recognized that hon. Members opposite were not pro-Turkish in the sense they were sometimes stated to be, so hon. Members on the Ministerial side would recognize that hon. Members on his side were not pro-Russian in the sense in which they were said to be. He hoped there would be reciprocity on both sides. He trusted it was not necessary in a debate of this kind for hon. Members on his side of the House to indulge in the splendid "Rule Britannia" perorations which they had heard from some hon. Members. Some of those perorations had been magnificent and sublime. The noble Lord the Vice President of the Council (Viscount Sandon) wound up with a glowing description of the rugged peaks and the distant seas over which the flag of England waved; and he assured them that never would those rugged peaks and distant seas be ravaged by the sword. Then the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) had trotted out the British Lion, and not only trotted him out, but had jumped upon his back and galloped him up and down the floor of that House amid the enthusiastic plaudits of his Friends. For himself, he (Mr. Goschen) had thought that noble beast was too noble an animal to be used for such circus riding. He turned with pleasure from such perorations as those to the steady and prudent peroration of the Home Secretary. That right hon. Gentleman had defined British interests and told them what they were; and in most of his definitions hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House had been able to agree. The Home Secretary had spoken of Egypt and of the Suez Canal, and no one, he believed, in that House would deny that that was a British interest. He had spoken also of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles, and no person on either side would deny that England had an interest in the Dardanelles and the Bosphorus. They therefore found common ground on those British interests, and it would be idle to say that hon. Gentlemen on his side of the House were one whit less keen or less zealous in their regard for those interests than hon. Members opposite. But he would not pin the right hon. Gentleman—it would not be fair—to any statement or idea that in enumerating those British interests he had made an exhaustive catalogue. No English Minister could do that. And, therefore, he freely admitted that there might be other British interests which this country might be bound to watch over which were not included in the right hon. Gentleman's catalogue. But he remarked that there was one British interest—he was wrong—there was something which once used to be considered a British interest, which had not been enumerated by the right hon. Gentleman. He had noticed its absence, the House would notice it, and he was sure Europe would notice it. In mentioning what were British interests the right hon. Gentleman had not chronicled amongst the number the maintenance of the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire. He wished to emphasize that fact. The right hon. Gentleman had rightly, as he considered, omitted that from his catalogue of British interests, and, if he had not omitted it, and if its omission were not the view of the Party opposite, there would have been a clear issue between those sitting on that (the Opposition) side, and hon. Members opposite. Because he believed he should not be disavowed by a single hon. Member near him when he said that the maintenance of the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire was no longer an article of their creed. He ventured to say it was well that the Turk should know that that was the view of the House of Commons and also of the Government. He believed that the Turk had taken a different view; that the Turk throughout those proceedings had said—possibly he was saying it to himself at that moment, but he would not say it at the conclusion of the debate—"I, the Turk, am a British interest." It was his profound conviction that this idea in the Turk's mind that he was a British interest had been at the bottom of half the misfortunes and disasters which had occurred in those negotiations. Even although in the present Resolutions the House was asked to declare that Turkey should have no claim to the moral or the material support of England—"Never mind," said the Turk, "I am a British interest. I may—in fact, I know, I have no claim for support, but I belong to the category of British interests. I am asked to punish the authors of the massacres. Why should I do so? I can refuse; I am a British interest. Am I not the door-keeper of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles? Why should I mind the remonstrances of England? I know they do not love me for my own sake, but they must have me; I am necessary for them, and I shall be defended." Now I ask the House, in all common sense, if this was the opinion of the Turk, was it not natural, even when we reduced the irre-

ducible and minimized the minimum, that he should say to himself—"I am safe; I can refuse everything, because I am a British interest. Every officer of the Navy or Army of England believes me to be so. Public opinion in England for me is strong; and on that I take my stand." Well, he believed that the main upshot of that debate would be to explode that theory and view in the eyes of the Turk. Whether there was a majority for the Resolution of his right hon. Friend or not was comparatively immaterial, and was not the real point at issue; but the real point was, that the Turk should know what was the judgment pronounced on him by that House, and that was a result well worth a four nights' debate. That judgment was that we did not regard the maintenance of the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire as a British interest, and that we would not give Turkey moral or material support. He entreated the House to give him its attention on that point. For years past—since 1854 and in 1854—Turkey believed, and had a right to believe, that we fought for her independence and to maintain her integrity and her power. The idea that that power was necessary for British interests had been so rooted in the mind of this country and similarly in the mind of France, that the Crimean War occurred; and he wished hon. Members on both sides of the House now to consider the position and to appreciate the motives of his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich. What had been the position that his right hon. Friend had placed before the House? He had said—"I, among others, have a certain responsibility in connection with the Crimean War; the people of England have a certain responsibility in connection with the Crimean War, and having caused the Christian populations to remain under Turkish sway, we have a certain responsibility with regard to them." The question had been asked over and over again in these debates—"Why should England, animated by a merely humanitarian spirit, make this crusade?" His right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich had given the answer. It was, because we had maintained that Power by our arms, our treasures, and our Treaties, under whose sway the Christian populations were now placed, and were now suffering. And that argument had not been dealt with by a single hon. Member who had addressed the House. He had closely watched the debate, and he said boldly that that argument as to the special responsibilities of England towards the Christian Provinces of Turkey had not been met. Had we not that responsibility? [An hon. Member: That is a very old point.] Yes; that was a very old point. It dated from the Crimean War. But though our duty in that matter was old, we had not yet discharged it; and it was because the country felt its responsibility that it was so excited. It was a sense of that responsibility resting upon us as a nation which had induced his right hon. Friend to say that as long as he had a pen that would stir the masses of England, a voice that could be heard in Parliament, and a name that would command attention, he would labour to have justice done. He (Mr. Goschen) wished to remove the impression that we were going upon an imaginary crusade. There was the Secretary of State for War, who wanted a commission from on High before he would take in hand to deal with the insurgent Provinces. There was no need for any commission from on High when there was an historical responsibility which had been incurred by the country; and he trusted that, since war had broken out, the special duties of England to the Christian Provinces of Turkey which were still under her sway would not be forgotten in the din of arms. It might fairly be said that Turkey had been deposed from the position of a protected and favourite ally of this country to that of a deserted offender. Could it, then, be maintained that the Autumn agitation had borne no fruit? He would be frank in regard to that agitation. There was a time when he had some misgiving as to the agitation. He did not know whether it would bear fruit, or whether it would remain barren; and he did not like to think that the agitation should exist in the face of Europe without bearing fruit. But it had borne fruit, and the fruit it had borne was this—we had changed our traditional policy. We had sacrificed what used to be an article of our political faith, and we had done that because Turkey had refused the advice and remonstrances of England, and had continued in a course which the English Government itself had advised it would lead to peril and to ultimate disaster. Lord Derby wrote in September that if Turkey did not meet the demands of England, Her Majesty's Government would find it practically impossible to interfere in defence of the Ottoman Empire. Those were very curious, very extraordinary, and very significant words. Anyone reading that despatch would say—"But for the atrocities, Her Majesty's Government would have undertaken the defence of the Ottoman Empire." That would, no doubt, have been our traditional policy. Lord Derby had written that in the event of a war between Russia and Turkey, the sympathies of the English nation would be found to be in opposition to its Treaty engagements. The event had actually occurred, but he thought it would now be admitted that Lord Derby had been wrong in his reading of our Treaty engagements—that in fact, there existed no Treaty engagements binding us to defend the Ottoman Empire. It was evident that at the time those words were written it was in the mind of Her Majesty's Government that in the extreme case of war with Russia they might, but for the discovery of these atrocities, have found it necessary to interfere on behalf of the Ottoman Empire. Well, they had not so interfered, and in place of any interference, we had a satisfactory declaration of the absolute neutrality of Her Majesty's Government. He had rejoiced to hear speaker after speaker on the opposite side of the House expressing satisfaction at that declaration, and he entreated hon. Members opposite to observe the neutrality not only in that House, but out of it. He hoped that wherever they had influence, in their constituencies, in the Press, or elsewhere, they would enforce and maintain that idea of absolute neutrality. It was one of the outcomes of that debate. They had been told time after time that the natural and logical result of the Autumn agitation would be coercion in concert with Russia. That he denied. There had been a result already achieved, and that had been the change in the position of Turkey in the heart and mind of this country. It was not fair to say that war would be the only natural result. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) said that the Opposition did not wish to coerce Turkey, and that if they did not wish to do so themselves they must also disapprove of Russia doing so. In using that argument the noble Lord seemed to forget, like so many others, that there was a certain work to be done in the East, which all the Powers of Europe together had been anxious to see done—namely, that the Christian Provinces of Turkey should be relieved from Ottoman misrule; and that it did not follow that because we did not wish to coerce Turkey ourselves, therefore we ought to discountenance any other Power which undertook the work. It was clear that Her Majesty's Government had really expected all along that Russia would go to war with Turkey. That had been the one distinct point from beginning to end, and yet they now wrote a despatch to Russia as if they were perfectly surprised at the course she had taken, and had never thought such an event possible. If he was not mistaken, Lord Salisbury himself had alluded to the gathering of the Russian Forces on the Pruth as one of the facts which would assist in bringing the Conference to a successful close. He would not go further into the matter at that late hour, but would just remark, as had been pointed out by several speakers, that there was a question of coercion by this country alone, in addition to a question of coercion in concert with Russia—there was the question of a European concert, and lastly, the course of absolute neutrality. The hon. Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) had argued forcibly in favour of coercion in concert with Russia. This was a course which might have been adopted at some previous time, but it was now too late. He could not admit the arguments which had been urged by the Vice President of the Council respecting the future, in which it was said that coercion in concert with Russia would have been difficult, because our aims and our interests would have been different. True, it might have been difficult, but would it not be equally difficult to arrange with a victorious Russia at the close of the war? In one way or another, it would be necessary for us, when that time came, to seek to settle the question in concert with Russia. It had also been asked how it would have been possible to bring the European Powers to act together with a view to coercion. Would not

Mr. Goschen

[Fourth Night.]

Europe have to take that concerted action at the end of the war that she had refused to take at the beginning? We might say we would observe absolute neutrality; but we could not wash our hands of the matter, and it would be absolutely necessary that England should deal with it more or less in the future. The arguments adduced against the concerted action of Europe had not been strong, unless the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was right in saying that the States of Europe would have refused to join us. The hon. Gentleman referred to and made quotations from Green Books and Yellow Books, but it was impossible to form an independent judgment without seeing the despatches. All these had not been seen, nor was it known what passed between Lord Salisbury and Prince Bismarck, and between Lord Salisbury and the French Ministers; and one of his difficulties in voting for the third and fourth Resolutions would have been that sufficient was not known of the conflicts of European interests to enable one to judge whether such concerted action as they contemplated would have been possible or practicable. We might desire it, but it might be impossible to procure it. If he had spoken of "silent and cynical Germany," as the hon. Member for Tamworth said yesterday, he did not speak of the German people, which were neither silent nor cynical; but he applied the word cynical to the German Government, and the remark was neither libellous nor unfair, for the German Government had shown considerable cynicism during the last four or five years. He should like to know what Her Majesty's Government thought in their hearts, though he hoped they would be discreet enough not to say it, with regard to the part played by Germany during these transactions. The direction in which the force of Germany might be employed in this Eastern Question was an unknown fact, and it was a grave matter, which caused considerable alarm and anxiety to all European statesmen. To Her Majesty's Government must be left the responsibility of securing concerted action, as they alone could know whether it was possible; but they could be kept up to the mark by being reminded that without concerted action it would be impossible to solve the question. At present it was not likely that the country would know more than they did now. For the greater portion of the last month it had been the duty of both sides of the House to severely criticize and to discuss the action of the Great Powers with whom they were in alliance. Great freedom of speech had been employed with regard to the action of Russia, and the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, referring to Lord Derby's last despatch, had asked, whether Her Majesty's Government were to be so abject as not to address their opinions to Russia about her conduct? but he (Mr. Goschen) was not aware it was necessarily abject to refrain from writing such a provocative response. We were entitled to pronounce a strong opinion on this point; but not when Russia had done that which she had led us to expect and given notice that she would do during the last eight months. More especially was it the case since she had complained that it was not the Russian, but the English Declaration which destroyed the effect of the Protocol. The English Government placed Russia in a position in which she had an advantage she ought never to have had, and it was open to Russia to say that, after all her declarations, no course was open to her but to declare war. They had criticized the action of Turkey. They had spoken their views of Russia, and surely they might state that Russia had no other course to pursue after her many declarations than to go to war, without its being fair on that account to bring the charge against the Opposition of being pro-Russian in their tendencies. Was it because they had fairly stated their opinion of the Government? Was it wise, or patriotic, or just, of hon. Members opposite to declare that a great Party in this country was pro-Russian? They were in a minority, he knew; but still they were a great Party, and had great influence in the country; and was it right to declare before Russia and Europe that the influence of that Party was to be used in a pro-Russian direction? It might be useful as a party manoeuvre to create the sense of some anti-national disposition on their part—it might help them at an election or to get up a cry; but was it likely to be of use in the councils of Europe? At all events, the Liberal Party in that House would be prevented from taking the part which they thought their duty as Englishmen demanded by any such charge as that. He ventured to think that the Government, at all events, would agree with him in this—that the atmosphere should be cleared, and that they ought not to be stigmatized as anti-English in their views because they thought that Russia had a perfect right to do what she had done. There was another point on which he wished to say a few words. There might be Russian victories—they could not tell—and he wanted to know what would be the bearing of hon. Gentlemen opposite and of the Government under these circumstances? Would they stand—he hoped and trusted that so long as those interests, which were truly English, as referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, were untouched, they would stand steady, and not allow the country to become jealous or excited because there were Russian successes. This was a matter of extreme importance. He ventured, in conclusion, to appeal to the Government that they would, even when this debate was closed, remain staunch to the letter, and not only to the letter, but to the tone of the speech of the Home Secretary; that they would use all their influence in and out of Parliament to maintain that tone. He hoped they would not forget that there was still work to be done in the East in favour of the oppressed populations of the Turkish Provinces—work which might be easily forgotten or overlooked if there were Russian victories and Russian successes. He trusted this country was great enough and strong enough not to feel jealous of any Russian victories, which might be in favour of the Christian populations in Turkey. Let them remember the story of the Suez Canal. They were jealous of that great work; but they ended by buying it, and now they looked upon the Suez Canal as one of the greatest of English interests. Let them remember the work to be done which they themselves had recommended during many months of weary labour. That redress which they could not wring or wrest from the Porte might come, and he trusted they would not be jealous if it did come, by Russian arms. He was not saying anything anti-English in giving utterance to that sentiment. He hoped that redress would be given which they had asked for in the name of the Queen, but which they had not got. They wished redress to come, because they thought it the duty of England to ask for redress and for the punishment of the oppressors. The Government itself had given eloquent expression to the demand. Then he thought it was not anti-English to say that if that redress should come—from whatever quarter—he trusted the Government would not run national jealousy against national duty. He said shame on the men who attempted to raise the fierce fires of national jealousy, which so often blood alone could quench, on such an occasion. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department had done much to clear the air. He trusted that in the months to come no fresh cloud might gather to sweep across the clearer sky.

DR. KENEALY said, that he was unable to regard this great Eastern Question from a Bulgarian point of view, neither could he consider it from a Muscovite standplace; he looked at it only as it affected England, her interests, and human liberty. He therefore would, with the leave of the House, direct particular attention to the Resolutions which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had placed before them. The first Resolution was a Vote of Censure upon the Turkish Government. He would feel obliged to the right hon. Gentleman, when on Monday he should come to review the debate, if he would give one single instance in the whole Parliamentary history of England where the House of Commons had passed a Vote of Censure upon any foreign Government for its internal policy. The next fault he found with the right hon. Gentleman was that he spoke of guarantees, but did not give the House the least information as to what he meant by guarantees. When the right hon. Gentleman called upon the House to say that it was essential that guarantees should be given, he was bound to state what, in his mind, constituted such guarantees as Turkey ought to give. The House had heard something about a joint occupation of certain Turkish Provinces by Russia and Austria, and about sending fleets of all the Powers to the Bosphorous. But surely the right

hon. Gentleman never would consent to such a joint occupation by Russia and Austria, because that would mean permanent possession; and the united fleet could only be regarded as a blockade of Constantinople. There was another portion of the second Resolution which seemed to cut the ground from under the feet of the right hon. Gentleman and his supporters, for it said that if the Ottoman Porte did not do certain things, it would be considered by that House to have lost all claim to receive either the material or moral support of the British Crown. That implied that if the Ottoman Porte should do certain things, it would be entitled to receive our material or moral support. But he understood the right hon. Gentleman and those who had engaged in the autumnal campaign to have based their action on this—that Turkey had already forfeited all right to the material or moral support of England. How would the right hon. Gentleman reconcile these opposite views? Upon the third and fourth Resolutions he did not like to say anything, because he did not know whether they were before the House or not. The right hon. Gentleman had advocated local liberty and practical self-government in the disturbed Provinces of Turkey; but it was not clear what he meant. As for “local liberty,” every person in Bulgaria had at this moment as much local liberty as was enjoyed anywhere. He objected to support a Resolution which the right hon. Gentleman had not fully explained to the House. Again, what was “practical self-government?” Did that mean autonomy? [Mr. GLADSTONE: That was Lord Salisbury’s phrase.] He did not care whose phrase it was if he could not understand it, and he had little respect for Lord Salisbury’s Mission, which had been disastrous to the interests and character of England. Lord Salisbury appeared to know no more of the Oriental Question than the most ignorant man in the country, and ought never to have been sent to represent us in the Conference. It seemed, however, that he had used those words, and he supposed that practical self-government was what the Irish people looked for—namely, the right of passing their own laws. He hoped, then, that they—the Irish Party at all events—would not believe in the sincerity of that Party which demanded this self-government for Bulgaria and refused it to Ireland. When the Irish people asked for their undoubted right, then the right hon. Gentleman said that it involved the dismemberment of the Empire; but when the Bulgarians asked for the same thing, he did not say that it meant the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire. He and his followers had no right to pass a Resolution for that object when they refused to pass a Resolution for the dismemberment of the British Empire. He proposed next to criticize in a friendly spirit parts of the right hon. Gentleman’s speech, and some sentiments of those who were prepared to back him. The hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) had declared that he supported the right hon. Gentleman because “he had never done anything to tarnish the fame of England.” In his (Dr. Kenealy’s) judgment that reason was not well founded, for he had always considered that the right hon. Gentleman had done so, both in the Alabama surrender and in the tearing-up of the Black Sea Treaty, which we had gained by spending oceans of blood and gold. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) supported the Resolution on the ground that this country “was not afraid of Russia.” He remembered when the late Mr. Cobden made a similar declaration, stating that we could easily crush Russia. He used an illustration with a piece of paper in his hand, and declared that we could crumple her up as easily as he did that piece of paper. The comparison was unfortunate, for it afterwards turned out that she was a most formidable opponent, and but for the assistance we received from the late Emperor of the French we should probably have been defeated by her. He was not afraid of Russia; but he did not think it wise to despise her. A great deal had been said about the atrocities; but the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) had proved that the number of persons destroyed by the Bashi Bazouks did not exceed 4,000 or 5,000. Why should we reproach Turkey with causing such a loss of life in repressing a most wicked rebellion? We considered ourselves to be at the head of civilization and Christianity, and yet the number of persons we had massacred in putting down various rebellions would amount to millions. Yes, how many had we destroyed in successive Irish rebellions? The sum total was beyond counting. During the late Irish Famine we were confessedly responsible for the sacrifice of more than 1,000,000 of lives by our cruel and ignorant, and often perverse, legislation. He saw the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), the Leader of the Home Rule Party, present, and he, if he liked, could testify to the truth of what he had stated. As to Turkish misgovernment, he could only say that there was no more tolerant Power in the world than the Ottoman, and the truth was that the real persecutors of the Christians were Christians themselves. Those were the persons in whom the odium theologicum really existed. The English Legislature it was that in the last century passed a law setting the same price on the production of the head of a Roman Catholic priest as on that of a wolf. These Resolutions were not politics, but faction, and the whole outcry raised against these Turks was faction of the lowest and basest description; nor were the Penal Laws repealed until 1793. The Turk, as a general rule, was a mild and more Christian governor than many Christian governors generally were, and if he suppressed insurrections with severity, he only followed the example of other rulers. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had for 30 years been engaged in connection with Coercion Acts, and he was surrounded by seditious men, who said that the hangman and the gaoler were the pillars of English power in Ireland. These were the associates and friends of the right hon. Gentleman; but there was not one of the men to whom he had referred who would get up and say that the hangman and the gaoler were the pillars of Turkish power in the Principalities. The seditious character to whom he alluded could not, however, do much harm—noted as he was for being a liar. Russia was a great aggressive Power, and if she ever became the mistress of Constantinople, she would become the mistress of Europe. He asked the House not to be led astray by the newspapers, which were usually written by persons who knew nothing—persons who lived from hand to mouth in garrets, coffee-houses, and public-houses, and pretended to be the great “we” of the Press. Let them not be led astray by those ignorant people. They should study the subject for themselves, and they would see that English statesmen for the last century, from Pitt to Palmerston, held the opinion that if Russia became the mistress of Constantinople she would become dominant in Europe. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) determined to go to Turkey, so he packed up his “bag and baggage,” and went to see for himself. The right hon. Gentleman was as active as a second Peter the Hermit. He passed over the Continent of Europe like some fiery comet, shaking portents from his hair. But what did he discover? He supposed nothing; for the right hon. Gentleman had been silent up to the present debate; and he had heard little from him of the dreadful massacres which had frightened all the old women, or of the subjugation of the Christian races, of which so much had been heard. The noble Lord, too, the nominal Leader of the Opposition—he wished he was the real Leader, because then they would see the Opposition conducted with sense and statesmanship, not by oratorical phrases and sophistical arguments—the noble Lord fled to Turkey also. They had all read of Howard, the pilgrim of philanthropy in the last century—the noble Lord might be regarded at one period as the Apostle of Atrocity. He went to Constantinople and, no doubt, impressed upon the Sultan the vast advantage of union and harmony in his dominions, the necessity for subordination and respect for authority, and the great evils of divided allegiance; but he returned to England a perfect Turk. He had most wisely seceded from the wild and frenzied movement of last Autumn, and had declined to advocate the coercion of Turkey, because he was not a Russian, but an Englishman who had the interests of his country at heart. The Secretary of State for War had been sneered at by the Opposition for claiming also, and truly, to be a Minister who had his country's interest at heart, while the Party who so sneered praised Lord Salisbury to the skies, because he had made himself the cat's-paw of General Ignatieff. Their hypocritical praises reminded him of the old line—Timoo Danaos et dona ferentes. Sir Henry Elliot had this inestimable advantage over Lord Salisbury—that he knew all about Turkey, and that Lord Salisbury

knew nothing about it. Her Majesty's Government, however, with a weakness for which he blamed them, frightened by the turbulent meetings of the Autumn, had practically censured Sir Henry Elliot by recalling him who was the truest, most honest, and also the bravest Representative that England ever had in Turkey. But it seemed that Mr. Baring had sent in a Report. He was informed by persons who were in a position to judge, and who were quite as accurate as Mr. Baring, that there was an amount of exaggeration in that gentleman's Report that had scarcely ever been equalled. But when that Report was published, every conventicle in the country was aroused. The Rev. Simpson, the Rev. Jobson, and the Rev. Dobson, who knew nothing about the Eastern Question—very good and pious and sincere men in their own sphere, but not to be followed on a great matter of politics like this—got up their little meetings, and they howled and they hooted, and they made the greatest noise ever known, and he was sorry to say that the Government was frightened by their tumult. Several Members of the Government made speeches, and when he heard of that he said—"Oh, that mine enemy would make an after-dinner speech!" and they did so and they committed themselves. The Government ought to have relied upon the common sense of their countrymen, and should have seen that the whole of this autumnal disturbance was founded upon fraud and folly. He knew the people of England as well as any man, and he knew that they were prepared to back Her Majesty's Government in keeping the Russians out of Constantinople. He did not believe in the infamous charge brought against the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich by a small official of the Government, that he was actuated by "vindictive malignity." The course he had pursued had been too considerable to allow them to suppose he was actuated by such a base spirit as that. He believed the right hon. Gentleman was simply led on by the inconsistency of his nature, that he could vary, flit about, and adopt ten thousand different colours, and still imagine he was the same consistent statesman. The right hon. Member for Greenwich had been everything by turns, and nothing long. He reminded him of a well-known political waverer and wanderer of a past age, of whom it had been written—

"A man so various, that he seems to be,
Not one, but all mankind's inconstancy."

The autumnal meetings would have been beneath our notice but for the tremendous results they produced. They fomented insurrection, they encouraged Russia, and misled her, as she had been misled in 1854 by a deputation of English Quakers from this country, who told the Czar Nicholas that England was resolved on peace. This advice led him headlong into the struggle which ended in defeat and in his own death. He feared the Quakers of our own time were giving equally rash counsel; and it was a curious thing that if ever we were carried into a bloody war, the friendly, peace-loving Quakers should be at the bottom of it. The Turks were no liars in their public documents; he could not bestow the same encomium on the Russians. If one of the public documents of the Turks was true, Russia was one of the greatest criminals that ever rushed into a wicked war. That document stated that the Christian populations in Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Bulgaria rose in insurrection solely at the instigation of Pan-Slavic Committees paid by Russia. After that solemn declaration of the Turkish Government, which all knew and confessed, was it not farcical, was it not insulting, for the House of Commons to be told that the inhabitants of those Provinces rose in insurrection because they were suffering untold oppression? when, in fact, they were goaded by the priests and the agents of Russia—an aggressive and wicked Power—to rebel against their just Sovereign. Lord Beaconsfield had been denounced for his Guildhall speech, because in it he had warned the Czar, about the time when he was mobilizing his forces, that England would fight through two, three, nay, a dozen campaigns, sooner than allow her Eastern possessions to be wrested from her. He honoured Lord Beaconsfield for that patriotic speech; it was absolutely necessary, as an English statesman and as a Chief of the Government, for him to make it at the time he did; for the Autumn meetings had persuaded Russia that England meant "peace at any price," and that she would submissively assent even to the conquest of Constantinople. And now from his place in the

Dr. Kenealy

speaking the voice of millions, he repeated, with the single exception of the hon. Member behind him—[Renewed laughter]
—that if she attempted to take Egypt, Constantinople, or the Euphrates Valley, England would resist her to the last drop of her blood. The Emperor of Russia delivered his Moscow speech to what was described as a very enthusiastic audience. He (Dr. Kenealy) did not know whether that enthusiasm was purchased; but he knew that enthusiasts could be obtained in this country at half-a-crown a-head for any “Liberal” meeting in Guildhall. And what did the Czar say at Moscow on the 10th of November? He declared that he “would act independently,” and he immediately mobilized his troops in immense masses. Let him act independently. We also here in England shall act, if need be, in the like manner, and we shall see whither his independence will conduct him. As for the Berlin Memorandum, it meant war, and its rejection would be the brightest jewel in Lord Derby’s crown of glory. The right hon. Member for Greenwich had proposed coercion for Turkey, and by an extraordinary Nemesis of Providence, his Party had imposed coercion on him. It was to be hoped that his Party would take other opportunities of coercing him, for there was no man in this country who needed more than the right hon. Gentleman the strait waistcoat of moral restraint. In conclusion, he warned the Government that rapidity of action in war meant success, and that Russia was taking great strides towards the object of her ambition. Already she was marching onward with immense energy. The noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire had told them that a friend of his had calculated that she might reach Constantinople by the 1st of August. He believed that she would attain it before that time; and he implored the Government to lose not an hour in sending the Fleet into the Sea of Marmora. In the name of our commerce, which Russia stopped by prohibitory duties, wherever her sceptre waved; in the name of religion, which Russia threatened while she pretended to be its protectress; in the name of humanity, outraged by that Power in all lands where she swayed; in the name of liberty, which this cruel despotism trampled down in her dominions—he implored the Government to be prompt. He saw this mighty Power advancing surely but rapidly—a very ocean of blood, in which they might all be overwhelmed; and he called upon the Ministers of England to lose no time in saying to her in tones of thunder—“Thus far shalt thou go—but no farther.”

Motion made, and Question proposed,
—(Mr. Waddy.)

MR. GREENE objected to the adjournment of the debate, which he said had been moved merely for the purpose of pleasing a few hon. Members on the opposite side of the House when they had decided upon war, whilst hon. Members on his own side of the House had decided in favour of peace. The subject had been thoroughly thrashed out, and the House was quite prepared to go to a division.

MR. OWEN LEWIS said, that he had endeavoured to speak on the last two nights, but was unable to do so; and, as an Irish Catholic, he thought he ought to get an opportunity of taking part in the discussion.

MR. WHALLEY thought an opportunity should be afforded for replying to the unmannerly and unjust charges which had been brought against Russia. They had had that night an exhibition of utter recklessness on the part of the hon. Member for Stoke (Dr. Kenealy) in the name of the people of England. The hon. Member had made an unfounded and scandalous statement against Russia, whose just claims to their notice had been lost sight of.

MR. MACDONALD rose to Order, and asked whether the hon. Member was speaking on the Question of the Adjournment of the Debate?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought the House would be glad to come to a decision as to the Adjournment as the hour was getting late. It was obvious that a great many more hon. Members were anxious to take part in the debate, but he must appeal to hon. Members to come to a decision on Monday night. The Government had given up two Government nights, and he supposed Monday must be given up too, and he thought it only reasonable to ask that the debate should end on that night. It was intended that the holidays for Whitsuntide should be from Thursday next to the Thursday following, no unreasonable time to take, considering the shortness of the Recess at Easter and the severe debates which the House had lately had; but he feared it would not be possible to propose that the holidays should be so long unless the Government should get a day next week instead of Monday. He would then give Notice that on Tuesday he would move that Government Orders of the Day should have precedence, and if that course were not acceptable to the House, he feared that it would be necessary to curtail the Whitsuntide holidays.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER, as one of those who wished to speak on the question, said it would be impossible for him and others to do so unless hon. Members made shorter speeches, and that being so, he hoped no hon. Gentleman would on Monday night be allowed to speak over half-an-hour, or to send for water.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he had heard some dark rumour that it was the intention of the Opposition to carry the debate over Whitsuntide, and he trusted that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not move the Adjournment for the holidays until this debate was carried to a conclusion and a division had taken place.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON trusted, from the short discussion that had taken place, that this long debate might be closed on Monday. The suggestion about Tuesday appeared to be a reasonable one under the circumstances; and he trusted that those hon. Members who had Notices of Motion on the Paper for Tuesday would give the suggestion their consideration.

MR. R. POWER said, he had prepared a very beautiful speech, and if he could not deliver it to the House, he intended to issue it in the form of a pamphlet.

BURIAL LAWS CONSOLIDATION BILL WITHDRAWAL OF AMENDMENT.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: My Lords, I wish to inform your Lordships that it is not my intention to move the Amendment in the 74th clause of the Burials Bill of which I have given Notice. I found that it would have no support on this side of the House, and I could not expect support for it from the other side. I shall, therefore, not trouble your Lordships with a useless discussion and still more useless division.

SOUTH AFRICA—ANNEXATION OF THE TRANSVAAL.—THE PROCLAMATION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, it may be interesting to your Lordships that I should read a telegram which I received about 20 minutes ago from Sir Bartle Frere, which gives an outline of the Proclamation of Sir Theophilus Shepstone. The telegram is dated Capetown, April 25, and is in these terms—

"Sir Theophilus Shepstone issued Proclamation 12th April. Recites commission, sketches history of existing disorder and anarchy, refers to wishes of inhabitants that country be taken under British protection, declares territory henceforth British, continues existing Courts. Transvaal will remain separate Government, Queen's new subjects to enjoy reasonable legislative privileges, arrangements for optional use of Dutch language, existing laws to remain until altered by competent legislative authority, equal justice to all races, private rights to property respected, Government officers able and willing to serve continued in office, bond fide concessions and contracts of State to be honourably maintained, payment of State debt to be provided for. Another proclamation notifies assumption of office as Administrator of Transvaal, a separate address to Burgher population, the war tax suspended. Inhabitants reported to acquiesce willingly in new order of things."

My Lords, about an hour or two before the reception of that telegram, another reached the Colonial Office, from Sir Bartle Frere, dated the day previous—the 24th of April. It does not supersede the telegram I have just read, but I will read the last paragraph of it to your Lordships—

I have also to inform your Lordships that, from information received through a private source, and which is dated April 25, it appears that the Proclamation was recognized as being in a conciliatory spirit, and that the state of affairs in the Transvaal was one of quiet. Of course, all this information is only an outline, and I reserve any positive opinion as to the measure of annexation until I have not only the Proclamation itself, but a statement of the ground on which Sir Theophilus Shepstone acted in the matter.

THE EASTERN QUESTION—THE TRIPARTITE TREATY OF 15TH APRIL, 1856.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY, on rising to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which he had given Notice, and which had reference to the Tripartite Treaty of the 15th April, 1856, said, he had no intention of making a speech on the Eastern Question or of saying anything which would call forth such a speech from any noble Lord on either side of the House. Indeed, he would not have made the inquiry which he was about to make if it had not been for a statement addressed to their Lordships last month by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), in reply to some observations of his. In the discussion raised on April 19, he drew attention to the dangerous nature of the Tripartite Treaty, and he got this answer from the noble Earl—

"It was a Treaty between England, France, and Austria; and any obligations which we may be held to have contracted under it are obligations to those Powers alone. That being so, the first and most material question is, Does there exist at present, or is there the slightest probability that there will exist, any intention on the part of the French or Austrian Governments to call upon us to fulfil our Treaty obligations? To that question I can give an unhesitating answer. I am perfectly convinced that neither the French, nor the Austrian Government has the slightest intention of calling upon us to fulfil what we are bound to under the Treaty of April, 1856; and consequently I have not thought it necessary to take any steps in regard to that Treaty, or to free ourselves from the obligations which it involves."

Now, if that answer had been given by the Austrian Secretary for Foreign Affairs, it would have been satisfactory; but coming from the English Secretary for Foreign Affairs, it required some further explanation before it could be regarded in that light. He could not see how the ipse dixit of an English Minister could abrogate a Treaty to which two Powers besides England were parties. The confidence in the matter displayed by the noble Earl reminded him of what was not an uncommon occurrence outside that House. It sometimes happened that a person was asked to back a bill merely as a "matter of form;" but at the end of three months it became evident that the thing was a reality. Thinking over the noble Earl's answer, he came to the conclusion that it could only have been based on one of four hypotheses. First, that Austria would not in any case be embroiled in the present contest; second, that, in that case, she would prefer to fight alone to fighting with the help of Great Britain; third, that she had no right to compel us to go to war under the disputed Treaty; fourth, that she had given Her Majesty's Government her assurance that she would not call upon us under that Treaty. In answer to the first of those hypothetical reasons he might remark that it was a very delicate subject to launch upon—the liability of Austria to be embroiled in the present contest; but he might say thus much without unduly trenching on dangerous ground, that no person of ordinary sense could cast his eye on the map of Eastern Europe without perceiving that it was very difficult for Russia to strike a blow at Turkey without touching one of those numerous interests of Austria, interference with which might make it necessary for the latter Power to interfere in the contest. As to the second hypothetical reason—that Austria would prefer to fight alone to fighting with the help of Great Britain,—it was undoubtedly true that any contingent of land forces which we might send to her assistance would be numerically very trifling as compared with the troops which she herself could put in the field; but we must remember that aid in such a way was only one of the sinews of war. A short time ago the Prime Minister, in a very remarkable speech, said that the resources of this country were practically inexhaustible, and that if England once drew the sword she would not sheath it again until right had been done. That being the view of Her Majesty's Government, he could not think that Austria would prefer to fight alone rather than have the aid of Great Britain. He now came to the third hypothetical reason, which he thought was the most intelligible of them all—namely, that Austria had no right under the Tripartite Treaty to compel us to go to war. As their Lordships were aware, the Tripartite Treaty contained two distinct provisions—first, the three Powers which were parties to it guaranteed jointly, severally, and, as far as he could see, unreservedly, the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire; and, secondly, they agreed to treat any infringement of the Treaty of March, 1856, as a casus belli. What was the situation at the present moment? The Russian Army was marching into the Provinces of the Ottoman Empire. How, then, could it be maintained that the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire had not been interfered with? With regard to the second point the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) had set out in a despatch his views of the Treaty of March, 1856, and according to that view we could not say that there had been an infringement of that Treaty. It was perfectly true that no Power had as yet thought fit to treat that infringement as a casus belli; but we had no security that during the progress of the war between Russia and Turkey no Power would treat it as a casus belli; and if at any time one of the other Powers who were party to the Tripartite Treaty did think fit to treat the infringement of the Treaty of March, 1856, as a casus belli, we might be called on to interfere. With regard to the fourth hypothesis—that Austria had given Her Majesty's Government her assurance that she would not call upon us under the Treaty—that, of course, was a matter beyond his cognizance; but if she had given such an assurance their Lordships ought to be informed of it. If the Treaty had been voided in that way, let the fact be declared. He knew this was a most delicate matter. He believed that connected with the Eastern Question there was none graver than the point whether the Tripartite Treaty was at this moment operative or inoperative. If it was inoperative let the Government declare that it was so; but if it was operative, he held that it was a source of serious danger. He did not believe that any Government could ever engage this country in a war on behalf of the Ottoman Empire; but we might through this Treaty drift into the quarrel, and then not on behalf of English or even Ottoman but of Austrian interests. The noble Earl said the other day that in his opinion Treaties were not eternal. Well, he supposed that was true. Treaties were not eternal any more than Protocols; but he would like to know from the noble Earl what period of existence he assigned to Treaties. Would he give them the average life of man? If that was to be their term, let them be decently buried, and consigned to the sepulchre of archives when they reached it; but let them not sneak out of existence under the impression that nobody was to act upon them. He thought that in the present circumstances it would not be difficult to make an arrangement to free ourselves from the Tripartite Treaty, and he believed that if we did not do that, the day would come when that Treaty would involve us in the alternative of a war on the one hand, or—he would not say dishonour, but a very discreditable proceeding—on the other. He begged to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether in their opinion the time had not arrived for entering into an amicable arrangement with France and Austria by which this country may be released from the engagements of the Tripartite Treaty of the 15th of April, 1856?

VISCOUNT BURY said, he could not think that the noble Earl had adhered to his pledge of not saying anything which ought to give rise to a speech on, or a discussion of, the Eastern Question; but he did think there was every reason why something should be said from the Conservative side of the House, to show that those who sat on that side reposed the fullest confidence in the Government. Their Lordships could not but have observed that there had been many discussions recently in which the policy of the Government on the Eastern Question had been attacked by noble Lords on the Opposition side, but in which no utterance of approval or disapproval had come from the benches behind that of Her Majesty's Ministers. That silence had arisen not from distrust, but by reason that those sitting on the Ministerial benches reposed the most absolute trust in the discretion of Her Majesty's Government. While negotiations were pending noble Lords on his side of the House did not wish to make speeches; but their silence might be maintained too long, and now that war had actually broken out, Parliament and the country ought to encourage the Government to continue in the policy they had pursued. To his mind no part of that policy had met with a more distinct and expressive approval than the manly and straightforward despatch of Lord Derby in answer to the Circular of Prince Gortchakoff, which had been made the occasion of a flank attack on the Government by the noble Duke (the Duke of Rutland). The noble Earl who had spoken that evening had spoken in the Russian interest.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY rose to Order. He had never said a word about Russian interests. Besides, he submitted that the noble Viscount was exceeding the proper bounds in entering on the whole Eastern Question.

VISCOUNT BURY thought he was strictly in Order. He accepted the noble Earl's disclaimer; but he would like to know in whose interests the noble Earl had spoken? British interests were certainly involved in the struggle; and it was no discredit to Russia, from her point of view, that she should want Constantinople; and we knew in our hearts that she wanted it. Her principal ports were in the Black Sea; her great arsenals were in the Black Sea; the mouths of the Danube were in her hands; and it was perfectly intelligible that she should wish to have the command of the Black Sea. Would any one say that British interests were not involved in that? We knew that for three generations the Russian Government had aimed at making Russia a great naval Power. Why else had the seat of government been removed from Moscow to St. Petersburg? Nature had set a barrier against her in the Baltic; but if she could obtain the command of the Black Sea she would be able to achieve the object of her ambition. She made use of soft and honeyed words; but her acts showed that she was bent on an aggression in the direction of the Mediterranean, which the interests of England and the interests of Europe could not allow of. No one could look at the map of the seat of war in the Library without seeing that within a week not only English interests, but the very existence of England might be at stake. ["Oh, oh!"] Was not the Euphrates Valley the road to India? The Russians were constructively at war with Egypt. They had a Fleet in the Red Sea; and what was to prevent them from sending their ships to the mouths of the Suez Canal? English interests were at this moment most desperately involved, and England should not change front by an abrogation of the Tripartite Treaty.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he agreed with the noble Viscount who spoke last (Viscount Bury) rather than with his noble Friend (the Earl of Rosebery), as to the attitude which their Lordships' House should assume at that moment. When the whole of England and the whole of Europe had been watching with interest a debate on the Eastern Question which had already extended over nearly a week in the other House of Parliament, he thought the voice of their Lordships' House ought to be heard on the question also. The House of Lords was concerned in the discussion of that question equally with the Commons. There was a time when the great issues of foreign affairs were raised far more in their Lordships' House than in the other House of Parliament. There was a time when the voices of the greatest orators of their Lordships' House were heard; and he would be glad to see a renewal of it. He could not fall in with the suggestion of his noble Friend (the Earl of Rosebery), that the proceedings on the present occasion ought to be confined to an oratorical duel between himself and the noble Earl the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. England and Europe in general ought to be enlightened by the wisdom and experience of their Lordships' House. He could not, indeed, support the Motion of the noble Earl, but if it elicited a discussion good could not fail to be the result. Upon the immediate question before the House he was bound to say he saw extreme difficulty in the course suggested by his noble Friend—namely, that there should be an abrogation of the Tripartite Treaty. Having taken some little pains to inform himself on the point, he believed that it would be as entirely contrary to precedent as it would be discreditable to honesty and common sense to maintain a Treaty as long as it did not carry with it any peril or any complication, but the moment it did to ask for its abrogation. Such a course would not be consistent with the honour or with the custom of England. He remembered a very eminent officer who resigned his commission before the Crimean War broke out. After the declaration of war a reverend friend said to him—"How very grateful you ought to be that you left the Army before it became dangerous." Now, that was the position in which his noble Friend wished to put this country—he asked that she should give up the Tripartite Treaty the moment it became dangerous. Their Lordships knew that the great Treaty of March, 1856, was signed by all the Five Powers. By Article 30 of that Treaty it was recited—

"His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias and His Majesty the Sultan maintain in its integrity the state of their possessions in Asia such as it legally existed before the rupture."

Now, that was not exactly the present state of affairs. In anticipation of a particular event, three of the Great Powers determined to draw up the Treaty now known as the Tripartite Treaty. Why the Five Powers did not join in that act he did not very well understand. Perhaps it was that as Italy was then only Sardinia, and Prussia was not Germany, the Three Powers determined that the second Treaty should be one confined to the two great military Powers, Austria and France, and the great naval Power, England. There must have been a strong belief on the part of the Three Powers, and of our own Minister, Lord Clarendon, that Russia was not to be trusted in respect of the maintenance of the conditions of the Treaty of March, 1856, and that the time might come when she would free herself from the obligations of that Treaty. That being the case, the Tripartite Treaty was not a complement or a supplement of the Treaty of March, 1856, but was a special and separate document with a special and separate meaning. That meaning was that if the interests of Austria on the Danube were seriously in danger England would not be indifferent to that danger. Mysterious Germany spoke but little, but she spoke enough to make us understand that she would be unwilling to see the mouths of the Danube fall into the hands of Russia. He was not one of those who believed that India would be lost if the Euphrates Valley were in the hands of Russia; but he did believe that there would be the greatest danger to English interests if Russia became so dominant in Persia as that Persia was at her beck and the Persian Gulf in her hands. These were questions of ultimate danger, though not of pressing danger. Supposing that Russia had no design of territorial aggression, then the Tripartite Treaty would be perfectly harmless; but, on the other hand, suppose that, having entered on what many persons said was a most unnecessary war, and what Her Majesty's Government declared to be an aggressive war, and that her design in making it was territorial aggrandizement—then we stood on the firm ground of the Tripartite Treaty, and we could call on the other Powers who were parties to that Treaty to assist us in vindicating it. That being the case, he did not see any reason for asking for its abrogation. He did not think we could do so without a breach of honour. He was sure we could not do so without a breach of neutrality. We were in a position of neutrality, and it was our business to maintain it not merely in form, but in reality, and he could not conceive a greater breach of neutrality than for England to come forward and ask the two other Powers to agree to an abrogation of the Tripartite Treaty.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY : When the noble Earl (the Earl of Rosebery) asked Her Majesty's Government to abrogate the Tripartite Treaty, on the ground that it was not for the protection of British, but of Austrian or Turkish interests; he, by implication, impeached the conduct of the Government which in 1856 negotiated and concluded that Treaty. The noble Earl said nothing of what would be the effect throughout Europe if Her Majesty's Government were to assent to his Motion. It would greatly discourage France, which was at present divided between a desire to maintain the alliance with England, and a desire for an alliance with Russia. But it would still more discourage Austria, which had stood by us through these negotiations, and it would furnish a fresh occasion to Prince Bismarck to launch epigrams against England for showing the white feather, and on her complete effacement.

LORD HAMMOND said, that at a time when the Turkish Empire was struggling for existence it would not be consistent with the neutrality which we professed, to relieve Russia from the check which the existence of a Treaty, the object of which was to secure the integrity and independence of Turkey, was calculated to impose on any views of territorial aggrandizement at her expense. He did not think that the noble Earl who had brought the question forward (the Earl of Rosebery) had so established his proposition as to induce their Lordships to accept it. He apprehended that before we made any such application to France and Austria as that which the noble Earl suggested, we ought first to ascertain in what way such an overture would be received—for if it were rejected our position would be a very painful and difficult one. Neither France nor Austria might be prepared at the present moment to call upon us to fulfil the engagements of the Treaty; but, at the same time, Austria especially might feel very reluctant to release us from the obligation of joining her in maintaining the independence and integrity of Turkey—for in the course of the war demands might be made by Russia which would be both unpalatable and even dangerous to Austria. England and France might not be so much interested as Austria in the territorial question; but they were both interested as regarded the occupation of Constantinople and of the Bosphorus and Dardanelles by Russia. Any such occupation would not only be dangerous to them, but also to every Power on the shores of the Mediterranean. We must not disguise from ourselves that if Russia were once in possession of either of the shores of the Bosphorus and Dardanelles she might defy the united navies of Europe. It might be that Turkey had forfeited all claim to material or moral support; but there were other interests affecting England and Europe at large, which we could not disregard, although, in providing for them, we incidentally contributed to support the Ottoman Empire.

THE EARL OF DERBY : My Lords, I have waited to see whether any other noble Lord would address the House on this question; but, as no one seems inclined to do so, perhaps it may be as well that I should at once, and without entering into the larger and more general question, proceed to answer the inquiry made by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Rosebery). Now, I am bound to say that though the subject of his Question is one of extreme delicacy, yet it is one of such great importance that I am not surprised the noble Earl should have thought it right to bring it forward; and I must further say that the observations he made in putting the Question were in a spirit of temperate and impartial criticism. I have nothing to complain of in the Question or in the manner in which it has been put; but when the noble Earl says he is not reassured by the explanation which I gave the other night, and that it is impossible to know how soon we may be called on to fulfil our engagements under the Tripartite Treaty, and when he illustrates the position by a circumstance of which I hope many of your Lordships have not had experience,—that of persons who, having put their names on the back of a bill as a matter of form, find that their having done so was anything but a matter of form—I must, in reference to that illustration of the noble Earl, say that the names on the back of this particular bill are not those of persons with whom I have the honour to act in political life, and therefore whether it was wise to contract an engagement so stringent is a question which I must leave the noble Earl to settle with those who represented the Liberal Government in 1856, and those—happily more numerous—who represented the Liberal Government in 1871, when what was done in 1856 came under revision, and when the Government of the day did not think it necessary to ask for the abrogation of this Treaty. If I were to answer the noble Earl's Question generally, I should have no objection to go this length—I would willingly admit that any engagement which, like this Treaty, binds the parties to it to regard a certain condition of things as a casus belli, and binds them to that in circumstances which it is impossible to foresee, may cause grave and serious inconvenience, involving as it does an engagement to go to war at a time when it is possible we may be engaged in hostilities elsewhere, or at a time when the state of public feeling in this country would make it impossible for us to act up to our engagements, or at a time when there would be no English interest to be served by your doing so. If, therefore, the question were whether I should or should not be ready on behalf of the British Government to enter into an engagement like this Tripartite Treaty, I frankly admit, for my part, that I should hesitate a long time before I should take that course. But I do not agree with the noble Earl when he went on to say that the practical risk of our being called upon to act on this engagement was greater than I represented. The noble Earl argued the question very logically when he put hypothetically these four conditions, as those which alone could give us security against being so called upon:—first, that Austria will not in any case be embroiled in the present contest; second, that in case she were she would prefer to fight alone rather than to fight with the help of Great Britain; third, that she has no right to compel us to go to war under the Tripartite Treaty; and, fourth, that she has given the Government her assurance that she will not call upon us under that Treaty. Now, I admit at once that Austria is not free from the possible danger of being embroiled in the war which is at present being waged.

The Earl of Derby

Next, I agree that if she were embroiled in it, obviously it would be to her advantage to fight with this country for an ally rather than alone. As to the third point, the question, what claim Austria might have under this Treaty to call on this country, involves various considerations, difficult to discuss in a merely speculative manner. The Treaty having been framed to preserve the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire, the question might not be unfairly raised whether, if the contracting Powers had allowed that integrity or that independence to be violated, and war having broken out between Russia and Turkey, one of those contracting Powers, at a later period of the war, would have the right to call upon the others, not on the ground that the interests originally defined had been attacked, but on the ground that other interests had come to be involved. I am not giving an opinion on that question—I only mention it because the noble Earl touched on circumstances which might hereafter arise to induce one of the contracting parties to call upon the others. I think it might be a question whether, having allowed the time of action to pass, Austria would be entitled to call upon us later under the Treaty, on the plea that her own interests were concerned. Then as to the fourth assumption of the noble Earl, which raised the question whether Austria has given us an assurance that she will not call upon us under the Treaty—well, my Lords, I cannot say that in so many words we have had any assurance of that kind; but so far as one can judge by the language and actions of Austria what her course is likely to be under circumstances which have long been foreseen, I think I may say that in the attitude of the Austrian Government throughout the long and complicated negotiations which everyone at least knew might end in that war which unhappily has broken out, we have seen nothing to lead to the idea that Austria has any intention to stand on her Treaty rights in this matter. To the French Government the noble Earl did not allude, and perhaps with regard to that Government it will be enough to remind your Lordships that, like ourselves, France has announced her intention of observing a strict neutrality; and I apprehend when a Government announces its intention to maintain a strict neutrality, though the case has arisen in which it might call upon the other parties to the Treaty to join in action, it may be assumed that by such announcement it foregoes any claim to ask at a subsequent period for assistance in war. Then there remains the question whether it is expedient at the present moment to take the step proposed by the noble Earl and communicate with the other Powers with the view of withdrawing from the engagements of the Treaty. I do not think this would be the moment to take that step. You have to consider in dealing with these international engagements, not only what will be the actual effect of the thing you do, but what will be the interpretation put upon your acts and what will be the conclusions drawn from them. It is one thing to say that we are not going to war to maintain the Ottoman Empire, and another to take a step which might be understood by Europe—and not unreasonably—as a formal announcement of our indifference to whatever might occur. We have been and are in very confidential communication with the Government of Austria—there has been a confidential interchange of ideas between us—and I have not, for my own part, the slightest idea that the Austrian Government will call upon us to act on the conditions of this Tripartite Treaty in a manner which might be a cause of embarrassment to us. When the war now unfortunately being waged shall have come to an end, it will no doubt be necessary to reconsider and revise the engagements of the several Powers as set out in the various Treaties now existing, and which an altered condition of affairs may render no longer applicable. When that time comes it will be a fair question to consider whether the engagements of the Treaty of 1856 should be longer continued; but I think that at present to adopt the course suggested by the noble Earl would be injudicious and impolitic.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that by what on a former occasion he ventured to describe as “the destructive criticism” of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) he had rather challenged a defence of those whose names were to the Tripartite Treaty. He (the Duke of Argyll) was not going in their defence to say that distant and contingent promises were to be evaded. He remembered that some anxiety which had been raised by a Treaty entered into by the noble Earl himself was at once relieved by an explanation from the noble Earl that the document meant nothing at all. However, this was too grave for mere repartee, and from this he passed as unworthy of occupying the attention of their Lordships. He could not, however, but feel that in the discussion tonight there had been on the noble Earl's part a total suppression of the real arguments and facts which were determining our position in respect to the Treaty of 1856. Let their Lordships remark the position of embarrassment with which this country and the other Governments of Europe were placed in respect to those great instruments which were deemed the determining instruments of the public policy of the year 1856. It was a position of embarrassment, not to our own Government only, but to all the other Governments that were parties to those Treaties. And why? Because they were crumbling beneath our feet, and the very parchments on which they were written were scattered in fragments along the shores of the Black Sea. Why, then, were the Governments silent at such a time? They were silent because those Treaties were breaking down through the infamous conduct of the Government of Turkey. Her cruelty and her breach of every solemn promise she had given to these Powers, made it impossible for us to defend her from the consequences of her own acts. He did not intend to say a word in hostile criticism on the Government; but since the Papers were distributed only last week war had broken out, and the public attention would be exclusively directed to the future, and not to the past. Some of their Lordships might read these Papers, together with some Members of the other House and a few members of the Press; but practically they would be dead letters. The impression they had left on his mind was that they did not afford the slightest ray of hope of improvement in the internal government of Turkey. Our own agents reported that things were, indeed, worse than ever. Mr. Reade, our Consul at Rustchuk, declared that the oppression exercised by the Mahomedan officials over the Christian populations was worse than ever it was before, because they now flaunted in the face of the people that the Turkish Government had successfully defied all the Powers of Europe. That despatch was, he believed, only a few weeks old. It was said on behalf of Turkey that she had been prevented from reforming her internal administration at first by the fear of war, and now by the presence of a hostile army on her frontier. But Turkey might, notwithstanding, have taken some steps towards improvement—she might have appointed some Governor over the disaffected Provinces whose name would have given confidence to Europe. When Russia or Turkey wanted an effective naval officer for any particular service, they came to the British Admiralty; and if Turkey had desired to give a pledge to the Powers of Europe she might have appointed a Governor over Bulgaria in whom Europe felt confidence. On the other hand, evidence was not wanting from the Commissions of Philippopolis and other transactions that the Turkish Government had used every endeavour to foil justice and to prevent the punishment of the miscreants who had committed the Bulgarian atrocities. And what thanks did the British Government get for their patronage of this iniquitous and detested Government? Lord Derby, who had humbly and with bated breath recently made some recommendations to the Porte, received a most insolent answer from the Grand Vizier, who told him that Turkey wanted no foreign interference. Those were the thanks the Government obtained from the Grand Vizier for their protective kindness for the Turkish Government, and those were the reasons why the Government could not and dared not enforce the Treaty of 1856. There was a maxim equally true in politics as in private life, that honesty was the best policy—and it would be a monstrous injustice and a crying shame to do anything to keep such a Government as that over 14,000,000 or 15,000,000 of the Christians of Europe. He repeated that no ray of hope could be held out that if war had not been resorted to there was any prospect of amendment in the Government of Turkey. This Blue Book had informed him of a fact which he had learned with amazement—that the Government of England was not only a party to the Protocol of March 31, but almost as much a party to the Declaration that accompanied it. The facts were these—When the Protocol was first communicated to the Government, Lord Derby said that he had no objection in principle to the signature of such a document, but the price to be paid for it was a promise on the part of Russia that she would disarm. What was the language of Russia? He (the Duke of Argyll) denied that she had “sprung a mine” upon England or upon Europe. The Russian Government said distinctly that they would not disarm for the signature of the Protocol. Lord Derby thereupon said that he must consult the Cabinet, and he took some time before he gave his answer. He then told Count Schouvaloff that the Cabinet objected to sign the Protocol, except on the condition of disarmament. Count Schouvaloff stood firm, and said, “We cannot and will not disarm until we have obtained from Turkey certain securities for the improvement of the condition of her Christian populations.” A separate sketch containing three conditions was placed in the hands of Lord Derby, and he said he would consult the Cabinet whether they would sign or not. The Cabinet, after knowing the intentions of Russia the nature of the Declaration, and the separate terms she demanded from Turkey, determined to sign the Protocol. He (the Duke of Argyll) said that under these circumstances the Government of England were a party to that Declaration, and that this was one transaction—the Protocol, with its accompanying Declaration. He ventured to think that the Government had taken a wise course, and that they did right in supplementing that demand on Turkey. That was followed by a despatch, dated April 5, from Lord Derby, urgently requiring that Turkey should accept the Protocol in conjunction with the Declaration. He said the Turks would be most unwise if they did not accept this Declaration, and that if Turkey did not do what was required she would be put in the wrong in the eyes of Europe. In all these transactions the proof was incontestable that our present situation with regard to the Treaties of 1856 was due to the absolute refusal of the Porte to make any and every concession—even the most reasonable, and urged in the most modified and temperate form. He (the Duke of Argyll) must break his promise not to criticize the conduct of the Government to do so only with regard to one point, which was this—In the answer which the noble Earl made to the Russian Declaration of War he had used this argument—the Protocol asked no new guarantee from Turkey. Was that a fair statement? He quite agreed that the Government of England was free to answer that Circular perhaps they were called upon to answer it, without consulting the other Powers of Europe. England had a position which entitled her to speak independently, and she ought to speak when she did speak with no bated breath. He did not object to the independent tone of the answer; he did not object to the answer because it was insulting to Russia, but he did object to it because it was incorrect in its statement of fact. It was not true and fair to say that the Protocol demanded no new security for the Christians of Turkey—it was a mere verbal quibble to say so; the Protocol did not, but the accompanying Declaration did; we were parties to both, and we urged both upon the Government of Turkey. Under these circumstances the Declaration did demand of Turkey securities for the better government of her Christian subjects; and in supporting that view we did rightly, and in refusing to recognize it we did wrongly. Our position—our embarrassing position as regarded Treaty rights, resolved itself into this at last: we were dealing with a Government utterly barbarous, utterly faithless, and which it was impossible for us to save.

LORD DENMAN said, that Treaties such as those of 1815 might for a time be inoperative as to parts of them; while, in the main, such as in the great principle of the abolition of the Slave Trade, they remained intact. During the 21 years in which he had been a Member of their Lordships' House, he had been most respectful in his language towards foreign Potentates; but he must remind their Lordships of the speech of the 14th Earl of Derby, on the 18th of April, 1859, on the refusal of a Congress, at the instance of Russia, in which that noble Lord said—

“I am quite sure, also, that the maintenance of peace will be materially strengthened and supported by the knowledge throughout Europe at large that this country will not be allowed to remain a helpless or a feeble spectator of events that may compromise her dignity and her honour; and that a serious responsibility will rest on the head of that Power, whichever it may be, that without due provocation, and without the most urgent and imperative necessity, merely to gratify its own ambitious aims, precipitates the evils, the dangers, and the crimes of war.”—[3 Hansard, cliii. 1857.]

He (Lord Denman) would also call their Lordships' attention to a speech of Mr. Cobden, also to be found in Hansard, and to the words of the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, in answer to it—

“The present, like previous Administrations, have deemed it a matter of general European concern, and therefore of British concern, that Turkey should not be made the subject of foreign intrigue and of foreign aggression. My hon. Friend used very strong language on this subject when he said that the people of England—I forget the exact words—had been in a state of disgraceful panic and cowardice with respect to apprehended designs of Russia on Turkey. It is not now necessary to go back to a discussion of the causes of the Crimean War; but I am bound to say when we speak of non-intervention in Turkey—when we speak of repudiating all ideas of resisting the natural and general development in force, numbers, and intelligence of the Christians of that Empire—we by no means mean to assert that the ancient policy of this country is to be repudiated, and that we hold it henceforth a matter of indifference what schemes are formed by any foreign Power against the existence, or against the territorial independence, of the Ottoman Government. And I am bound to say also, that while a real and lively sympathy does exist throughout the country for the Christian population of Turkey, on the other hand there does exist a belief that the principles on which the Crimean War was waged were sound principles, and that the question whether wholesale aggression from any European Power on Ottoman territory is to be permitted or not is a fair subject for consideration by the British Government, and for the adoption of such measures, whether of diplomacy or force, as circumstances may appear to the Government to warrant. My hon. Friend, towards the close of his speech, drew a deplorable picture of the general condition of the Turkish race. I ask not whether the description is in all respects accurate, or in some degree exaggerated. I am afraid, as regards the history of the Turks from the time of their first appearance in the Western world to the present day, he would be a very bold man indeed who was prepared to contend that their conquests and dominion have been favourable to the happiness of mankind or the progress of civilization. But, however that may be, what is the use of drawing these highly coloured pictures, unless you recommend a particular policy?”—[3 Hansard, clxxi. 145-6.]

He (Lord Denman) would further call their attention to a speech of Mr. Gladstone on the Neutralization of the Black Sea, on March 7th, 1871, in which that right hon. Gentleman said—

"It will be beyond the power of the Government adequately to discuss that subject while the Conference was sitting."—[3 Hansard, cccvii. 1605.]

Further than that, on March 9th, Sir Charles Dilke was against the acceptance of that Conference, at which France could not be represented. This Motion was withdrawn; but it was now the custom to discuss the whole Eastern Question, out of Parliament and in Parliament, whilst negotiations were going on, and the conduct of the Government of the day in declaring on 14th of February, 1871, that the Treaty was only intended to last for 20 years, or only during Lord Palmerston's life, showed that they were ready to patch up a hollow peace with a mental reservation, and not to give that fair play to Her Majesty's Government which they had obtained for themselves. As the Treaty of Paris, instead of claiming any compensation, was of itself the only fruit of the Crimean War, it could not be abrogated without the most serious co-operation of all the parties to it.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I can of course speak again only by your Lordships' indulgence. An entirely separate question has been raised by the noble Duke. I do not at all object to the course he has taken, because, no doubt all the questions that have been discussed this evening are more or less connected one with the other; but, at the same time, I may say that there is a certain inconvenience in discussing the correctness or incorrectness of language held in diplomatic documents when you are not aware that a discussion is to be raised, and you have not the documents before you. I do not want to argue any of the matters touched upon by the noble Duke. I only rise utterly to repudiate and disclaim the construction which the noble Duke has placed upon the transactions in connection with the Protocol and the Russian Declaration. The noble Duke argues that because we are responsible for the Protocol, therefore we are responsible for the Declaration, which was the sole work of Russia. My answer is simply this—The very fact of a Declaration being made by one Government alone, upon its own account, and not in a collective document, is a sufficient indication, to my mind, that only the Government that issues the separate document can be responsible for its contents. I should not contend that the Russian Government could be held in any manner responsible either for the general tenour or for the language of that Declaration, which, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, I appended to the Protocol. I cannot, therefore, either exercise any control or accept any responsibility for that other Declaration which was made by the Russian Government.
